The dark face lightened as he spoke, and the eyes, somewhat too stern for boyhood, softened like the black waters of a mountain-tarn touched by the moon, as he strode gayly from the sunken chamber, and through vaulted passages to the hall, whistling his merry tune. So blithe he shone amid the general gloom, it seemed as though the haunting shadows of the place fled at his sprightly step, and gathered together after him more darkly than before, like clouds behind the sun.

Ralph Clifford was no bookworm like his elder son, and yet no sportsman like his younger. Now, for a man of fortune to live in the country and be happy, it is almost essential that he should be one of these two things. If he took to reading, it was a portent, a course of proceeding so altogether abnormal and uncanny, that it was not much spoken about; but if he was neither sportsman nor scholar, people set him down as mad. Ralph Clifford was not mad, but he was possessed with a devil—the fiend of family pride; not a reasonable sort of disease with any folks, but in his case unaccountable in the highest degree; for there never had been a Clifford, from Bryan the Founder—a freebooter—to Cyril, the shell of whose rayless mind had not been yet put underground, of whom their descendants had any cause to be proud; on the contrary, that generation was an exceptional one the record of which was unstained by gross vices.

The Cliffords had plenty of timber, and all things fitting beside; that jewel of fancy price, their ancestry, was splendidly set, and had a gorgeous casket. It had never, in the most perilous times, been stripped of its surroundings, or even forced for a season to conceal its far-darting lustre. The sort of chivalry that had animated Norman Bryan had been transmitted through all his line; "the good old rule, the simple plan, that they should take who have the power, and they should keep who can," had been preserved in its integrity. The Cliffords had had no need to marry heiresses; their shields bore no escutcheons of pretence; their prosperity had grown like a river, but, unlike it, had needed, no foreign feeders to sustain it. There had been dry seasons, when it had fallen a little, and there had been times of civil commotion, when it had even been dammed up; but the obstacle removed, the broad stream of prosperity had only poured forth in the greater volume. They had cared nothing for Roses, Red or White; but each had smelled the sweeter in the nostrils of wise Sir Mark, as it had prevailed over the other. They had loved King Charles and monarchy, but not with such a perfect love that it had cast out the fear of Cromwell and his Ironsides. Sir John, indeed, had made a wrong cast in that matter, and defended Cliffe against Lambert. The blood of Cavalier and Roundhead had not refused to mix in the castle-moat, for four long weeks of siege. The west wing had sorely suffered. You might see even now the scars upon the stubborn stone. Many a shock of battle had that front withstood, and often listened to the roar of culverin and ring of steel, which now regarded the trim garden only, and the sleeping waters, and listened to the mowing of the scythe and the leap of fish. It had done with war for ever; and swallow-haunted, ivy-clad, it looked like one who, having had his days of trouble, henceforth spends a life of leisure among friends. Even the trouble had been short-lived. Without storming and without surrender, the banner of the Parliament had been quietly substituted for that of the king upon the round tower of Cliffe Hall, and General Lambert had dined with Sir John at the same table, in the banqueting-room, under which the royal legs of the Stuart had condescended to place themselves only a few months before.

It was of such ancestors as these that Ralph Clifford was proud; and of far worse than these. He was by no means a bad man himself; there was not one of his long line, perhaps, who, being compared with him, would not, upon the whole, have suffered by the contrast.

Looking upon Ralph Clifford's haggard but not ill-favored face, and the plaited hair that fringed it, one could not but wonder what he could have been in his youth. Could he ever have been a trustful child, saying his prayers at a mother's knee? A light-hearted boy, enjoying the sports of the hour with all a boy's capacity for enjoyment? A young man courting the smiles of beauty, his pulses throbbing with the fullness of the spring, had he ever experienced those palmy days which, long or short, fall to the lot of almost all mortals? Most of us have met such men, and tried to picture them in the cradle, in the playground, or at the altar with their brides—and failed. Their past is not to be imagined; and even those who witnessed it, can tell us little. Of Ralph Clifford, men knew only that he had been a dutiful son under circumstances when it was not easy to be dutiful; that a kind heart lay somewhere within him, notwithstanding his haughty and austere behavior; and that in his first marriage he had pleased his father, and in his second pleased himself. He had been brought up at Cliffe from his infancy, but not, of course, as its heir. He had never desired to be so; and had driven the very thought of it away from him as far as possible. Not only did his childless uncle Roderick look like to live for a score of years to come, but his own father Arthur, the younger brother, was alive, a stout man, too; and what was still more to the purpose, there was Cyril, a hale boy, but a twelvemonth older than himself. Yet even then Ralph was fully persuaded that he would be master of Cliffe, for that the curse of the Cliffords must needs fall.

THE WRECK OF THE ROYAL GEORGE.

For more than half a century the wreck of the Royal George, sunk at Spithead, off Portsmouth, England, in 1782, with all her guns, stores, and crew, had baffled all attempts to raise or remove it, when in 1839 Colonel Pasley undertook the task of blowing it up with gunpowder, a plan hitherto unknown in such operations. The story of this famous wreck has long been familiar but the chief facts may be recapitulated here.

The Royal George had long been an object of pride, not only to the navy, but to the English public. She was the oldest first-rate in the service. She carried 108 guns, and it was said had borne more Admirals' flags than any other ship in the British navy. She carried the tallest masts and the squarest canvas of any English built man-of-war, and may have been considered as the embodiment of the naval glory of England, then at its height. At the period of her disastrous end she had just returned from a cruise off Spithead, where Lord Howe's fleet of between 30 and 40 sail of the line, many frigates, and 200 or 300 merchant vessels were riding at anchor. It was on the 20th of August, 1782, as she lay here quietly, that the carpenter discovered that the pipe which admitted the water to cleanse the ship was out of repair. As the orifice of this pipe was about three feet below the surface of the water, it was necessary to heel the vessel slightly over, so that the pipe could be raised and examined. This simple operation, which had frequently been performed in the navy with impunity, was the chief cause of the terrible disaster which followed. To accomplish it, the guns on the larboard side of the ship were run out of the portholes as far as they could go, and those on the starboard side removed to the middle of the decks. This brought the port-hole sills of the vessel on the lower side nearly even with the water. Unfortunately a lighter, laden with rum, soon afterward arrived, and placed her cargo aboard on the lower side. This, with the additional weight of the men, caused the water to enter at the ports, but so gradually that it was long before any one perceived the danger.

Meanwhile, the smiths and braisiers had almost completed their work, when a sudden breeze blew upon her raised side, forcing her still further down, while the water began to rush with terrible force into her ports. The lieutenant of the watch now ordered the drum to beat to right the ship—but too late. As the vessel heeled over, guns, shot, and everything movable rolled with it to the lower side, and accelerated her descent, and the enormous vessel fell on her broadside flat, with all her masts in the water. Then was seen a confused multitude of men and women scrambling to the side still left out of the water, and uttering heart-rending lamentation. So sudden was the accident from the time it had become sufficiently alarming to arouse general attention, that scarcely any succor could be rendered even by the multitude of vessels which lay at anchor near. Signals of distress were fired for help from Spithead, but the unfortunate vessel finally sank. Of the 1,200 persons on board, including 250 women and children belonging to the seamen, nearly 900 perished. The rest escaped by mounting to the rigging or clinging to floating timber. With those lost was Admiral Kempenfeldt, who at the moment of the occurrence was writing in his cabin, whence his captain had in vain endeavored to extricate him. Among the numerous affecting episodes of this historical shipwreck, was the saving of a little child who was miraculously preserved by holding on to the fleece of a sheep, which swam in the water, where the child was picked up by a gentleman in a boat. Both the father and mother of the child had perished, and the gentleman who rescued him humanely undertook to provide for him.

In the year 1834, Mr. Dean, an engineer, with the authority of the government, descended by means of a ladder to the wreck, being attired in apparatus of his own invention, which has since become better known to the public. His dress, composed of india-rubber, made perfectly water-tight, having a helmet of metal on his head extending to his shoulders, large enough to allow him to turn his head round at pleasure, having three glass lenses to admit the light, and a tube of the same flexible material on the top to supply air by means of an air-pump, worked by men in attendance above. Mr. Dean found the unfortunate vessel a huge mass of old timber, stores, and materials mixed with mud, clay, and sand. In his dress, though he had attached to him nearly 90 pounds' weight to make him sink, he easily walked about the ruins of the ship, using his hatchet freely, and remaining down more than an hour each time. In this way he succeeded in recovering a number of valuable brass and iron guns in a high state of preservation, besides a number of interesting articles of less importance.

No further attempts were made to remove any portion of the Royal George, until 1839, when it occurred to the ingenious mind of Colonel Pasley that gunpowder, so commonly applied by miners in blowing up solid rocks as well as in military operations, might be successfully employed for the purpose of breaking up the wreck, by which some of its valuables might be recovered, while a dangerous obstruction would be removed. Two divers and two sets of workmen were employed in different lighters moored near enough to be within hail. The divers were attired in Mr. Dean's apparatus. The first experiment proved a failure, owing to an accident in the cylinders and other causes. Other huge cylinders filled with gunpowder were then sunk, and on the 29th of August, the anniversary of the sinking of the Royal George, five small charges were exploded. The explosions were effected by the fusees, being fired by the wires of the voltaic battery—an entirely new application of that wonderful instrument. On the 23d of September a large cylinder, charged with 2,400 pounds of gunpowder, was lowered and carefully placed by the divers, and all being ready, Colonel Pasley directed it to be fired. Instantly, before the eyes of thousands of spectators from Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight, a kind of water spout of immense magnitude was seen to rise into the air, and the surface of the water was found strewed with pieces of the wreck as well as with large fish which had been stunned by the shock. In this and the following year numerous cylinders of a similar kind were sunk and fired, the divers each time reporting successful results, while gradually the guns and other valuable articles were recovered. The list of some of these is curious. Seven pieces of brass cannon brought up were valued, as old metal, at upward of $6,500. A piece of red sealing-wax, and the handle of a penknife, found near the stern, are supposed to have belonged to the unfortunate Kempenfeldt. Some chinaware in perfect preservation, and several dozen of wine are also in the list. Articles of a mournful interest were also among these curious relics. Of these were the remains of a woman's gipsy hat of the style of 1782, composed of chip, covered with silk, and trimmed with gauze; the crown of this was gone, but in other respects, even to the head lining, it was complete. Some weeks after this hat was brought up, the hoods and collars of two silk cloaks were found—one of a woman's size, trimmed with lace, the other (evidently that of a child) without trimming. These cloaks being interwoven, it was thought probable that their wearers, perhaps a mother and daughter, had perished at the same moment in each other's arms. With these came torn fragments of clothing, such as arms and breasts of jackets, coats, silk handkerchiefs, shoes, shoe-buckles, skulls, human bones, surgeon's instruments, old quadrants, a pair of black satin breeches, and a large satin waistcoat with flaps, of which the satin was perfect, although the lining was entirely gone. Finally came an interesting relic of the great shipwreck, being one of the identical pipes with the brass work attached to it, in perfect condition, the repairing of which had led to all the disasters of that fatal day.

CANNON AND CANNON BALLS.

We find an allusion to cannon as early as the Spanish Chronicle of Alfonso VI., written by Pepro, Bishop of Leon. In describing a sea-fight in the 11th century, between the Emirs of Seville and Tunis, he says: "The vessels of the King of Tunis had on board a number of iron pipes, out of which volumes of thundering fire (tonenos de fuego) were discharged." The first cannon cast in England are said to have been made by John Owen, in 1521; but the art appears to have been introduced in a high state of perfection. Two large brass guns, recovered in 1835 from the Mary Rose, which were sunk at Spithead in 1545—one a 68-pounder, and the other a 24-pounder—in beauty of design and workmanship are equal to anything produced in the present day. The largest gun ever made in England, up to 1843, was one weighing 18 tuns, cast in that year for Mehemet Ali, Pasha of Egypt. The bore of the gun was within one-tenth of an inch of 16 inches (15 9-10 inches). The weight of its solid shot was 455 pounds, and of its shell, 300 pounds. This gun was 12 feet long, and had an immense quantity of metal at the breech.

A story is told of a cannon in Bejapoor, India, which weighs 40 tuns. A seat in the interior accommodates five persons, without much crowding. It is formed of mixed metal, of which there is said to be some portions of gold and a considerable quantity of silver, and is very sonorous. It was the work of Chuteby Coomy Khan, an officer in the service of Hoosseim Nizam Shah, Ahmudnugger. In giving a description of it, Col. Sykes says:

"On the visit of Sir John Malcolm during a period of his Viceroyship at Bombay, the Sattorah Rajah, who holds the surrounding territories under the British Government, directed that this gun should be fired off as an appropriate salute. Though not charged with more than half the weight of powder which its chamber could contain, the concussion was awful; it shook many of the buildings to their foundations, and the terrified inhabitants, as the reverberations rolled along, expected to see the domes and towers, survivors of the former shocks, come tumbling about their ears."

At the siege of Antwerp, in 1830, Gen. Paixhans, of the French artillery, proposed to King Leopold to shorten the siege by means of a mortar, the shells of which would weigh 1,000 pounds, and contain each 100 pounds of powder. The proposal was thought to be inhuman, and it was not until after 50,000 cannon-balls and shells had been spent in a vain bombardment, that the monster mortar, a charcoal casting made at Leige, was brought out. Nine shells were fired, huge flying masses, one of which burst in the air, and eight descended into the citadel. Two days after the first shell was fired the Dutch surrendered.

The artillery used at the siege of Baza, in the war of Granada, during the siege of Ferdinand and Isabella, were called bombards. They are still to be seen in that city, where they long served as columns in the public market-place. The largest are of about 12 feet in length, consisting of iron bars two inches in breadth, held together by bolts and rings of the same metal. These were firmly attached to their carriages, incapable of either vertical or horizontal movement. The balls thrown from these engines were sometimes of iron, but more usually of marble. Several hundred of the latter have been picked up on the hills around Baza, many of which are 14 inches in diameter, and weigh 175 pounds. At the siege of Balagner at the beginning of the 15th century, according to Zurita, stone balls were discovered which weighed not less than 550 pounds. A gun recovered from one of the Turkish ships destroyed at Tchesme in 1770 was 14 feet 2 inches in length, 9 feet in circumference, 20 inches bore, and 210 cwt., or 23,526 pounds weight.

The first instance of horizontal shell-firing on record is that at the siege of Gibraltar, in 1779, where Capt. Mercier, of the 39th regiment, suggested that five-and-a-half-inch shells, with short-calculated fuses, should be fired from guns. This practice answered so well that it became general. Red-hot balls were first used by Stephen Bathor, King of Poland, at the siege of Dantzig, 1576.

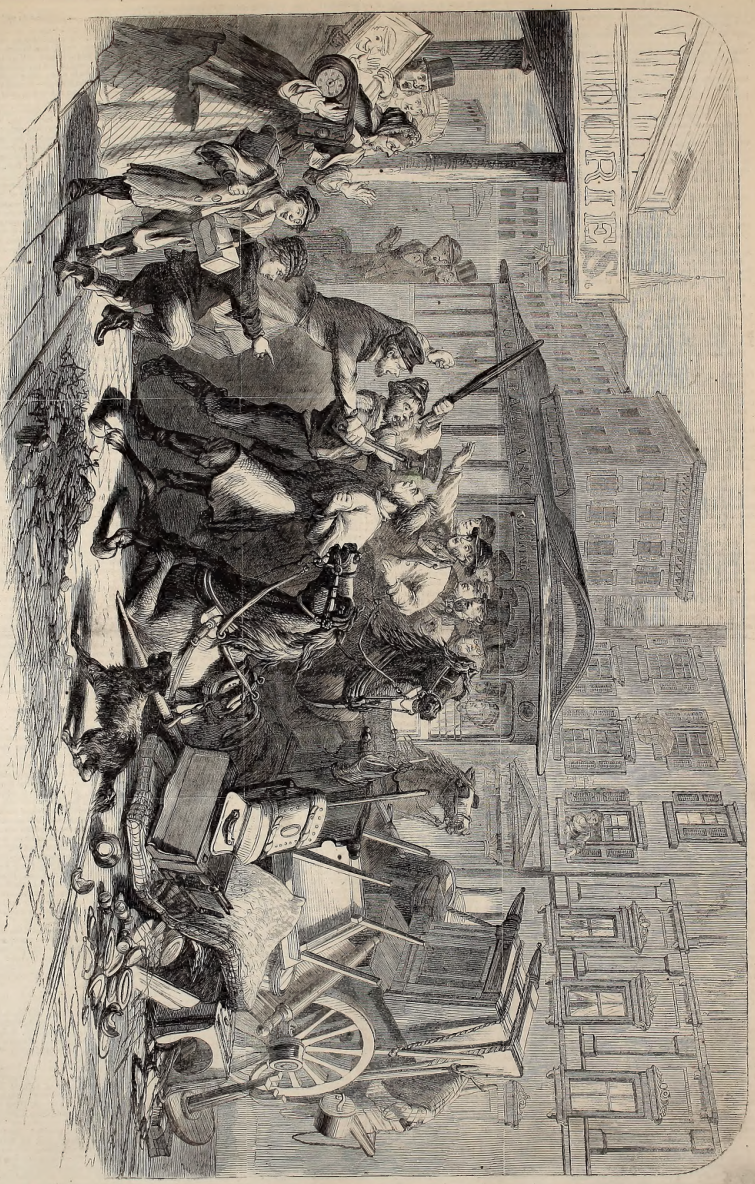
Pistols were first used by the Germans; Bellay mentions them in the year 1544. In the time of Francis I. and under Henry II. the German horsemen, des roiters, were called pistoliers.

Women's Names.—Mary, the commonest of all names given to woman, is yet one of the sweetest. Byron assures us that he had an absolute passion for it. It signifies "exalted."

Maria and Marie—the latter French—are only other forms of Mary, and have the same meaning.

Martha signifies "bitterness."

Anne, Anna, Hannah, and probably Nancy, are from the same source, and signify "kind" or "gracious."



Ellen was originally Helen, the Latin being Helena, and the French Helene; the meaning being, according to some, "alluring," and according to others, "one who pities."

Jane signifies same as Anna. Sarah or Sally, a princess, and the morning star. Susan, a lily. Rebecca, plump. Lucy, brightness of aspect. Louisa or Louise, one who protects. Frances or Fanny, frank or free. Catherine, pure or chaste. Caroline and Charlotte, queens. Sophia, wisdom. Emma, tender. Margaret, a pearl or a daisy. Elizabeth or Eliza, true. Julia, Juliette and Julietta, soft-haired. Agnes, chaste. Amelia and Amy, beloved. Clara, clear or bright. Eleanor, all fruitful. Gertrude, all truth. Grace, favor. Laura, a laurel. Matilda, a noble or brave maid. Phœbe, light of life. Amanda, amiable. Isabel, true and lovely. Pauline, little one. Olive, peace—Edith, happy.

Siamese Twins Rivaled.—Two negro children are now on exhibition at Raleigh, North Carolina, that excite much curiosity. They are 14 years of age, and were born of slave parents in Anson county. The Standard speaks of them as follows: "The connection between these girls is closer than in the Siamese twins, there being more of the physical and mental organs common to each. The connection begins below the neck and terminates at the extremity of the spine. To touch one at any point of her body below the connection sends a sensation to the brains of each; while a touch of either above the connection is felt by that only. They can talk to different persons at the same time on entirely different subjects; and one can engage in a game of whist while the other reads or sings. The lady who has them in charge was their former mistress, and is now commencing a tour with them under a contract with their parents, who are both living.

THE FIRST OF MAY IN NEW YORK CITY—MOVING OUT

LOST!

I AM thinking to-night of the true, earnest heart
That was mine, long time ago,
And the years that go on leave a fierce burning smart,
And I weep that we met, thus forever to part,
And life seems all winter and snow!

Once he was manly, honest and true,
And loved with affection untold,
But with wealth he has cast off the friends that he had,
And now, among many, he has only a few,
And he cares but to count up his gold.

Oh! I cannot forget how happy and proud
He carried his youthful heart!
Yet now, as he rides at his ease in the crowd,
His riches and power seem only a shroud
To hide a heart that is dead!

Although he has honors, money and lands,
Mortgages, shrewd deeds,
Yet his shrunken form, his trembling hands,
And failing strength, proclaim life's sands
Fast running; though little he heeds.

Men flatter and fawn, and bow to his wealth,
And kneel at his golden shrine,
But gladly he'd barter his pitiful self
For the frank, open face, and the blessings of health
That were his in manhood's rich prime.

Yet he loved me so fondly, so truly, so well,
And told what our future should be,
But when I was poor, and orphans he fell,
And offered his hand to a rich worldly belle,
While his heart was given to me!

I'm thinking to-night of the beautiful girl
I loved so deep and wild,
Lost! lost in the splendor of fashion's mad whirl,
Lost! lost in a shimmer of opals and pearl,
Lost! the sweet innocent child!

It may have been best, but I'm dreary to-night
With thoughts that I cannot control;
The old, old love that I quenched burns bright,
And her face is a star in a halo of light,
Is shining within my soul!

I see him so eagerly heaping up gold,
But to leave it when comes the last sigh;
I see him bend low and the heart never cold,
But he's cast off the love and the heart never sold,
And now he weeds them, he's growing so old,
Their returning no money can buy.

The years coming on bring but sorrow and care,
Eternity's shadows appear,
And lonely he'll dream in his quaint easy-chair
Of the sight of a face, of a smile, the light golden hair,
And the love-words he no more shall hear.

The welcoming kiss, the clasping of hands,
The radiant, love-lighted face—
More welcome are these than houses or lands;
For gold is a god that will have its demands—
An idol it fills the heart's place.

I know it is best, but I'm saddened to-night
With feelings I cannot control,
I think of his young heart, so buoyant and light!
And weep for the spectre that rises to-night
With sun-crusted, greed-loving soul!

CHAPTER LXXXV.—THE HOME SECRETARY.

Now often, even in his routine, so fruitful of positions, had an English Home Secretary looked on a more melancholy group than the one that at about three in the afternoon of Friday evening next itself before him! Just before the two other gentlemen who were by his side—an under-secretary and a high legal functionary. The portly, bald, somewhat pompous-proposed gentleman, every inch a magistrate, who was in advance: the two indies, both in deep black and deeply veiled, who followed him into the room; and then the sharp, shrewd-faced, but anxious lawyer who brought up the rear, and whose list of witnesses entitled these might not of themselves have suggested the terrible story; but when the doctor had said a few words of introduction, and when Mr. Stamp had explained, tersely and formally, Anthony's position. Sleuth's horrible and sudden fate, Sir—'s relation to him, just about to be married, and lastly, had indicated rather than expressed the nature of the connection between Anthony and these his friends here, then indeed the listeners understood how tragic the question to be decided was, and how fearful the responsibility laid upon Sir—for the exercise, whichever of the two alternatives they might have to adopt —Sleuth's guilt or Anthony's.

The secretary having, in courteous but grave tones, requested all to be seated, the legal functionary observed that, before the matter went further, it, might, perhaps, be advisable for them to hear from the young lady's mouth—Miss Conyngham—the evidence she had been prepared (according to the statement Mr. Stamp had put into his hand early that morning) to prove in the open court, had she not gone away with Mr. Sleuth.

Phillis—who looked as though she might have been laid out as dead in some strange trance that had been mistaken for death, and been cunyreversed sufficiently to appear here to-day—was then examined; and as it was impossible to get her to tell any continuous story, so quickly did she break down whenever she attempted it, the whole was drawn from her by questions, mostly springing from the legal functionary, but occasionally suggested, very delicately indeed, and as afar off, by Mr. Stamp to that gentleman. She thus explained how, while only a young, humble girl at the alderman's, Sleuth had begun to pay attention to her, and suggested the idea of future marriage; how then he had sent her to get a key to the safe, on the understanding he was seeking nothing but his own; how, having been alarmed during the night of the murder, she had returned to the alderman's bed chamber, but that some inexplicable thought or fear, suggested to her own mind by Mr. Sleuth's previous behavior, caused her to pause at the door, and that then she had seen him mid the burning wedding on the bed, and change it, reload his double-barrel pistol, and fill a paper, which he was reading, when, in her agitation, she felt about to fall, and put out her hand suddenly to save herself against the door, and that he had heard the movement, for the light instantly disappeared.

Then she further related how, soon after Sleuth's first meeting with Anthony at the bed-side of the murdered man she had found a light cast on the ground, in a narrow passage where she had just been and parted with Sleuth—found it exactly where he had been standing while he talked to her, and how, as she had entered it secretly away, she heard him return as if seeking it. She spoke also of several efforts she had made, while secretly in the house, watched by Sleuth, to get the coat out of the house, and at last succeeded; and the man, a distant relative, who received it, was one of the witnesses who had all along been ready to testify to his having, at her wish, and in the "interests of justice," so she had said to him, kept it ever since.

It was evident, from the tone of the Home Secretary, when he had finished asking her this, to question her, that he had not been very favorably impressed with the truthfulness of Phillis's statement.

"Do I understand you wish me to believe that, supposing your statement to be correct, and that Sleuth to have been the murderer, that you now know nothing of his guilt—suspected nothing?"

Phillis's white lips moved inarticulately—inarticulately, at least, to all but Clarissa, who observed:

"She says, Sir——"

"If you please, Miss Pompees, I would rather myself hear what she says."

Poor Clarissa shrank back reproved.

Then repeated, Phillis, with a frightful shudder convulsing her whole frame, murmured:

"No, no; I did suspect——"

"And you did not at the time say so?"

"Because, sir, I was a wicked, mad creature, who could think only of her things to be had for the asking; and the future, he—he made me believe—about—becoming his wife."

Clarissa brushed away as she heard this, tor she saw it was the first sentence Phillis had uttered that had in the slightest degree affected the man who was the sole subject of discussion.

"And why, some years later, did you commit that assault upon him, for which, as I understand, you were for some time in confinement?"

"Because, sir, because, sir, he had deceived me, and told me he was not going to marry me."

"And how was it that, after you had been released, and all understood, through the interposition of this young lady, and on the direct plea that you wanted to tell your story, to protect Mr. Meade from the charge brought against him—how was it that you treated a court of justice with such shameless contempt as to demand at the very instant your evidence was required?"

Phillis did not answer to that, but drew from her pocket, with trembling fingers, the very same paper she had received from Sleuth at the critical moment, and which addressed her as his wife. With this she tottered rather than walked forward to put it on the Home Secretary's table.

He read it, and paused a little after reading.

"Then you were willing, Miss Pompees, still to speak merely as accepting for the moment the theory proffered one—were you willing, at the price of marriage—with Mr. Sleuth, to have consented to an assent man to the scaffold?"

"No—no—!" murmured Phillis, clasping her hands, as if she thought it was being done before the judge's own face, and soul and body were alike at stake. "I—I wanted to save them both; and I wanted to save his wife; and I thought that if he made me feel guilty, he would have time to escape; but, sir—believe me! oh, believe me—I wicked as I have been, and mad, I would not have let him live, I had no other thought but to confess the whole myself after marriage, if I could not, as I hoped I should, persuade him to flight. Believe me, sir, my husband, to tell the truth, while leaving the country forever. On my knees, and in the presence of God, I swear to you, sir, this is true!"

Clarissa raised her, after a moment's pause, and then the Home Secretary drew the legal functionary apart, and they had a few words together in a low tone.

On returning to his seat, the Secretary said to Mr. Stamp:

"What witnesses have you to confirm this extraordinary statement, since you say Mr. Sleuth's confession is lost—destroyed in the fire?"

"We have, Sir——, the two witnesses from the hotel, who saw the signature given."

"Is that proof the signature of the document?"

"I fear not, Sir——"

"Then, in fact, the only evidence you offer us as to this confession having existed——"

"I beg pardon, Sir——. The landlady is also here, who received it from Miss Pompees the night before the fire."

"Did she read it?"

"I believe not, Sir——," Mr. Stamp was constrained to reply.

"And, supposing it to have existed—on which I express no opinion—we can only judge of its nature from the evidence of these two ladies?"

"That is so, Sir——."

"And these ladies both deeply, vitally interested! Miss Pompees naturally desires, at any sacrifice——"

"Rem! No, Sir——," broke in the doctor, grandly, "not at any sacrifice. She is my daughter, Sir——, and I wish you plainly to understand that neither she nor I come here to tell you, as a distinguished member of Her Majesty's Government, anything but the truth, absolute truth."

"You will pardon me, Dr. Pompees; it was not my intention to offend you or Miss Pompees, but I am bound to remember this is not a meeting for either gossip or ceremony, but to promote the interests of justice. I trust I shall not again be interrupted."

The doctor bowed, but did not benefit his and his daughter's cause by the manner and look of cold hate which almost drove the Secretary the idea that the doctor must think he had received an apology, instead of being in a position properly to offer one.

"Miss Pompees's position in the affair, to say the least of it, is not one that can be called disinterested. Her motives may be most admirable. But what of her companion, this Phillis Conyngham? This woman who, on her own confession, allowed herself to become a kind of moral accessory after the murder; who stabbed this most unfortunate gentleman because he would not marry her; who even now may, for aught we know, have used the aldermen's mysterious death to her own purposes with respect to this marriage? and who may still have secret motives of her own, inclining her, when disappointed by Mr. Sleuth's sudden exit, to bring his suspicious death, to revenge herself on his memory."

"Sir——, Sir——," pleaded Clarissa, stepping forward a step, "you don't know me, if you know my father, and if only you knew that unhappy gentleman whose fate is in your hands, you would not—could not—harbor these dreadful thoughts. Phillis has done grievous wrong, but what she has been punished for in unwilling witness? She wants to tell the truth, wants to have an innocent and noble man acquitted innocent; but did kind, dear Mr. Meade die to-day, it is I—I say it boldly, Sir——, and offer you my resignation if you think, in so doing, I am trespassing beyond my province, Sir——, that it is I who will have to pay the bribe."

"Your warmth, Miss Pompees, is natural, and I should be sorry indeed for you to draw from my words any—the least—impeachment of your honor. Pray accept that assurance. I ask you now, Mr. Stamp, formally, the question, Have you any hope of proving to me the real nature of this confession?"

"None whatever, Sir——, if the testimony I now offer you—so exact, so complete—of these two ladies, is not sufficient to satisfy you."

"And you are quite clear that this confession, were it forthcoming, would prove all you say?"

"Quite clear, Sir——, beyond a doubt."

"Very good. Then I desire, to read that paper, placed in our hands this morning by Mr. Sleuth's confidential servant, and who is ready to swear, beyond all question, as to the paper itself, and the writing upon that paper, that it is and can be only his master's."

Mr. Stamp, astonishment and dismay, took the offered paper, and read it. It was then handed in succession to the doctor, Clarissa, and Phillis. It ran, and will be remembered, thus:

Moved by the tears of two women, both dear to me, and by my cousin's fate, I have consented hereby to relieve myself on myself the burden of Anthony's crime, so far as——

We must not dwell on the remainder of that sad scene. Phillis was taken up; and the last words of the Secretary were:

"I shall again reconsider the whole matter. Your evidence will be kept open. Short of a second occasion, I will communicate instantly with the governor of the jail, and also, Dr. Pompees, with you. But bear this in mind, I am bound to add that I can hold out no hope to you, and, therefore, it would be most unwise for you to count on it. Good-day to you, sir, in the mind of the prisoner. I regret we have met on so sad a business and that we must part with so little of hope. Good-day to you, Miss Pompees, and a quick movement of Phillis's soon roused him, and made him see that truth. The prisoner's brave defender had given up the fight at last, and had sunk as prostrate as if she had given up her life at the same time.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.—THE SHADOW OF DEATH.

The mortal anguish endured by Anthony in the few hours that elapsed between the departure and the return of Dr. Pompees, what pen might hope to describe?

It was evening when the fearful oppressiveness of the solitude of his cell was broken by the appearance of Dr. Pompees, and alone.

In the gentlest and most tender spirit the doctor began to narrate what had happened, but soon began to show the irritation he had felt at the Home Secretary's supposed implication of himself and Clarissa, in a conspiracy with Phillis, to defraud justice of its rightful victim.

Anthony by that time was ceasing to listen. His eyes and ears strained incessantly to see or hear anything of the one form which now enshrined all the world held for him, and which almost seemed to rise in beauty and sublimity, and every kind of preciousness, rapidly and in such marvellous proportions, that it seemed as if all the happiness and contentment of each her love was capable of giving to him in a long life, was even yet to be yielded up in the few days—he might almost say hours—that he alone saw in most real relation to.

But the doctor soon began to change his theme. He said he and Stamp, the instant they left the Home Secretary, had gone to three or four of the principal newspapers, and been so far successful as to interest the editors deeply, who had promised that the very next day the full attention of the public should be drawn to the case, and an urgent appeal for time made.

Anthony looked at, and seemed to listen to, the doctor, and was grateful; but he had no thought of anything but Clarissa, about whom a sudden, almost superstitious feeling made him unwilling to speak. It was of such infinite importance to him to see Clarissa to-night, that he dreaded to ask the doctor when he should see her, lest he might hear what he was totally unprepared for—that she was too ill to come.

But the instant the doctor's continuous and kindly hum ceased, he seemed to remember something, and gave a loud, clear "Rem! hem!"

The door is unlocked—is opened. Anthony has a glimpse of something—what, his eyes have no time distinctly to see, for his soul has anticipated all. She is in his arms, sobbing, panting, and he holds her with hands that clasp her to his breast, hands that drop over her shoulders, and his head drops on her neck; and there they stand, while the doctor reverently turns away, and wipes off the big drops that course down his face.

How long they thus stood it would be difficult to estimate; but at last Clarissa began to breathe in deep silence.

"We will save you yet. There are many things yet to be done, and we will exhaust all."

"And if all fail?" asked Anthony, as he fondly and almost smilingly gazed into her face. "Do you think I could do so bear as a man should that which is inevitable? Oh, my soul's treasure, do you not know and see that I have so much happiness in you, my heart is so filled with exultation to think of what you are, and to know how you have given all to me, that I cannot, not now, feel even my own misery? Nay, I cannot so even that were I offered life without you, or this with you, I would not—unless, darling, for your sweet sake—hesitate a moment; but cheerfully, gladly my bitter lot, and go to the scaffold itself, as the patriots and martyrs have gone, knowing that what I feel in the conquer of cause will be reckoned against me; that meh, when they know the truth—as they will know it sooner or later—will murder me as they feel that I, at least, had no part in the degradation and the infamy. That is a consolation of which no earthly influence can ever deprive me. I may not have lived—I own that—till you came; but you are here, and I see all things rightly, hopefully, and in my soul I believe truthfully and with wondrous clearness.

"Doctor."

"Hem!"

The doctor turned at this unexpected appeal, and Anthony went on:

"Doctor! I do not know, my dear sir, how I can be sufficiently grateful to you for——"

"Pooh—pooh—nonsense!" interrupted the doctor; and then his emotion becoming too great to increase that it might hastened to say what he wanted of him.

"Doctor, I do not ask you to do whatever you can to save me, because I know you will outstrip my utmost wishes in that respect. But I do ask, this, even it, as I fear, you will think it selfish, I have a great deal on me, which you may, perhaps, remove. If I rightly understand the result of to-day's efforts, I may average more hearing—perhaps obtain a fair hearing—that which will cause him to put in force all the usual and cruel restrictions belonging to the case of a murderer. He is illness itself, and he strains all his power to benefit me, trusting a little to you, I dare say, for shelter. And I fear that he will over do. Doctor, I am a long time, for I almost dread to speak of it. But Clarissa; will you—dare I ask it—will you see what you can do to cause me to see her, if possible, each day, and for as long a time as she will allow me?"

Even as he spoke the door opened and the warder entered, and intimated to Anthony (who had been partially prepared for such a communication by the governor) that he was ordered to remove him to another cell.

All knew what cell. Again for all was there a moment of the intensest anguish.

"Give us a few minutes more," said the doctor, and the warder went out.

Anthony knelt before the doctor, and the doctor looked at him, and the two men suddenly grasped hands, and not a word more was spoken. Anthony knew that what could be obtained of indulgence should be for the solace of the brief period of life that remained to him.

The doctor now withdrew as far as he could from the lovers, and they stood in the opening of the window, where the last rays of twilight came through the bars, their faces, and even they could draw breath more easily, for a breeze, laden with the scents of a bean-field, came there in frequent puffs.

Hark! What noise is that outside? The three hear it at the same moment, and all, without movement or word, intently listen. Shouts are now distinctly heard. There is great commotion in the prison itself—the sound of rushing feet. The clamor swells. Still, no cry—no word—such as "Reprieve!" is heard; and all three listen, hopeless of its concerning them but only too eager to know what it means.

The door is thrown open, not, as before, with extreme precaution, but widely, and form after form comes in. The half frantic gaze of Clarissa recognizes the governor, Mr. Stamp, and, lastly, Esau, whose first movement is to leap on Anthony's neck and cry and sob over him, as if he were some wild animal exulting over its recovered young.

Mr. Stamp tries to explain, but Anthony, with a kind of stately sweetness, now moves Esau a little off, and then, still holding his hand, says, interruptingly:

"Esau, my own dear, true kinsman, if Nature has indeed favored you and us, speak out like a man, calmly, what it is. We can afford no mistakes now; and, if there be no mistake, we cannot afford to hear the story from any but you."

Thus admonished, Esau paused for an instant, and then said, with simplicity and controlled feeling:

"I have found the confession."

"Found! Esau?" was Anthony's loud and tartled cry of passionate emotion.

"Yes—yes. But let me tell you all. When I left Hengston after the verdict, I had no hope of helping you, except in discovering Mr. Sleuth and Miss Phillis, in case Miss Pompess had lost them. I found them all at Dover. I saw Miss Pompess just for a moment. I hung about the hotel as a stranger, thinking possibly to hear something, and I saw the fire break out; heard of the death of Mr. Sleuth and of the loss of the confession. I did not want to say anything to Miss Pompess, I had no little hope for that; but as soon as she had gone I went to the hotel, told them who I was, found that the paper had been put in a cash-box, with some money—not much; so little, indeed, that I saw no one cared to make any particular search in the ruins. All persisted the box must be destroyed, as it was in the very heart of the fire. I got permission to remain and hunt for myself. I never left the place for a single instant, for the workmen were constantly about, and I dreaded that if the cash-box were not destroyed, it might be found by some one who would instantly make off with it, and conceal the paper in order to conceal the theft. It was about daybreak this morning, that, as I returned, for the twentieth time, to the one spot where I fancied the cash-box had been, the laborers shifted a half-consumed heavy beam of wood. Then I saw something. Instantly I plunged my hands into the hot, moist ground beneath, and drew forth in a few minutes my treasure. I came by post to London, found Mr. Stamp, who has seen the landlady, who confirms everything—the identity of the box, of the paper—and—and——"

"And," said Mr. Stamp, "I beg to say that no earthly doubt remains on my mind that Mr. Maude will be released to-morrow, or, at the latest, on Monday. So all honor to our enterprising young friend."

But what is the enterprising young friend doing? Why, forgetting for a moment—poor fellow! he will not forget it long—the secret trouble of his own breast, and Clarissa having advanced toward him, her face glowing, her eyes transported with happiness and joy, Esau has been so moved by the sight, that he throws his arms round her neck and kisses her, and even the very doctor says no more than "Hem!"

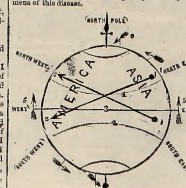
The governor now made a scarcely less interesting communication. Bob had just been tried and condemned to transportation for life; and on the trial, through some previous manœuvering of the governor, who had been very much disturbed by the finding of Bob's rope-ladder on the wall, after his visit to Ikey at night—an incident which had been carefully hushed up—on the trial Bob and the burglars had made a clean breast of it about the codicil, and thus the last stain on Anthony's name was cleared away.

THE CAUSES OF CHOLERA.



In our issue of last week we gave an article written in this city in 1848, giving the same theories in reference to electric influences on cholera as those just now agitating the European savans. That article when first published here, elicited a reply from some one signing himself W. S., which was answered by Dr. Castle in the paper we publish this week.

We hold these articles to be of deep interest, not only to the general public but to the scientific man, and they should, just now, when we are so sensibly threatened with this dread disease, attract universal attention:

I beg to make a few remarks in reply to the elaborate article, over the signature of "W. S.," upon the contagiousness of Asiatic cholera, published in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, December 27th, 1848. Among the singular proofs of its contagious character offered by W. S., is the fact, as he states, of his being a traveler with the disease "up the Hudson River, along the western canal, and upon the borders of Lake Erie, into the State of Ohio." We may, therefore, surmise that to the confidence placed in the friendship of his contagious majesty, and the pleasure derived from the society of W. S., is to be attributed his exemption from infection.

W. S. positively asserts that the rule of its contagiousness was invariably "importation." With every respect for this opinion, I must be permitted to deny this rule, and offer my reasons for doing so. Until the discovery of a specific is made, which will at once reach and arrest the loss of electro-vital power, and the resolving of the blood from its natural combination into its several constituents by the action upon it of a specific poison, and which is the remote and exciting cause of the other phenomena characteristic of this disease, the same results must ensue "upon what Hunter calls the nerve-power of the body"—and the disease will continue to be treated with the same sort of empirical stereotyped process, with the same preponderance of deaths over cures! and "cases remaining under treatment."

W. S. continues: "As it will be seen, the first case of Asiatic cholera which occurred in Canada was mistaken (!) for the disease of the country;" and he goes on to say, "that the disease appeared in the shape of a doubtful case at Gross Island on the 8th of June" (1832), and a ship "had 39 deaths on board during the first four weeks of her passage to Quebec;" but "no cases or deaths for a month previous to her arrival. On the 9th of June the second case appeared at the wharf at Quebec, and the same evening four others sickened and died." W. S. does not state if either of these cases were the one "which occurred in Canada and was mistaken for the disease of the country." With a few additional remarks, W. S. says: "This, then, is the history of the first appearance of the disease on this Continent." Imperfect, every one who reads it must admit, and throwing very little light upon the contagiousness of a disease spreading so far and wide, and committing such havoc as did the Asiatic cholera of '32. W. S. asks: "Can any one suppose that on the 8th of June the sun was so powerful as to excite miasma sufficiently malignant to have generated so fatal a disease?" "Was there anything in the circumstances of Canada, as to climate or soil or season in 1832, which so much resembled Bengal in 1818?" I may also include the climate, soil, etc., etc., of the United States, in this question, and the answer must be that climate and soil have nothing to do with the epidemic, only in their respective qualities and properties as electric conductors—it being altogether produced by an electro-magnetic action and thermo-electrical or telluric influences within and upon the crust of the earth, engendering a poisonous atmosphere in particular polar-electro-magnetic lines, which, according to spots favoring their intensity of action, produces a more concentrated poisonous atmosphere, and greater malignancy in the phenomena of this disease.

Our knowledge of these telluric phenomena, it is true, is for the present very limited; yet they are not to be so readily disposed of, by a dash of the pen, as is attempted by W. S. "As to telluric influence, as it is not easy to understand what else than miasma is intended by the term * * * * passing it by as one of the resorts of that philosophy, which prefers, rather than acknowledge ignorance, to retreat behind a hard name." It is true that telluric influence is a hard name, but, it will be confessed, not so hard as its nature, if we may judge from the "violent convulsions of the earth and attending unnatural condition of the atmosphere, parching droughts, heavy rains, thunder-storms, upheaving of mountains," &c., which have taken place at different periods. The graphic description of the ruins which mark these devastations on this Continent, recently given by our indefatigable and learned countryman, Stephens, will be familiar to the reader. Nature thus convulsed—can pigmy man escape?

Along the route of the Asiatic cholera, by contagion, as given by W. S., it is not necessary for me to accompany him, which is less to be regretted as it is one series of errors. He accounts for its "non-visitation of Albany and other great towns," previous to its arrival at New York, to the "strict quarantines!" of these places. There were no quarantines whatever at these places; and when the cholera did make its appearance in the City of New York, its citizens fled by thousands and tens of thousands to every hovel that could be obtained in any and in every part of the State, and adjacent regions. Now with regard to American quarantines, they are about as complete a farce as the clown's notion of "the height of nonsense." One illustration will cover the whole system. I was a passenger in an emigrant ship, from Liverpool to New York, with 250 steerage passengers on board. From the closeness of the temporary "bunks," head winds, and rough weather, the "hatches" were kept down. From the confined, impure air, boils and fever broke out amongst the passengers. From this detestable sink of human effluvia, the stench was intolerable. There was no medicine-chest on board. In this emergency the captain accepted my advice, and had the ship by sections thoroughly cleaned. Water was pumped into the hold and pumped out again, till the fetor and impurities were entirely removed.

Several "wind sails" were constructed, and notwithstanding the weather, were passed into the steerage, which caused a mutiny amongst the male portion of the passengers, so that half the crew were employed, under arms, to guard the mutineers, aft, on the quarter-deck. I caused those affected to be placed under the deck pump, and pumped upon until they complained of chills. Portions of the cargo being Scotch ale, London porter and oatmeal, a diluted porridge was furnished them, and in the absence of medicine, a table-spoonful of gunpowder in a half pint of sea water was given every 24 hours. Under this treatment they rapidly recovered, so that when we arrived at quarantine, in the Bay of New York, only four cases were under treatment, very severe and very disgusting to look upon. The vessel was placed in quarantine for 48 hours! and those passengers having the means, landed, took the quarantine steamer, and proceeded at once to the City of New York.

If a despotic police and equally arbitrary military cordons, the jealous passport of suspicious monarchies, were singly and combined unable to stop the onward course of the Asiatic cholera through their territories, the unprejudiced mind must admit that the great moral force of an American quarantine is not all-sufficient to disarm and arrest the career of a most fatal epidemic, which despotisms with all their powers and terrors could not reach, or for an instant stay its progress.

That the progress of the Asiatic cholera is peculiar, cannot be doubted, as it is one of its characteristics; and there can exist little doubt that it is under the government of an arbitrary law, which I believe to be connected with electro-magnetic phenomena both in the organic and inorganic kingdoms. That it is in part a perversion of a subdivision of the grand link connecting the several functions of "nature" with the fiat of the Creator, which

> "Lives through all life, extends through all extent, > Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

To this magnetic phenomenon, which, acting upon the compass, has so perplexed navigators, and which throws its greatest magnetic influence upon this hemisphere, we may—without drawing upon the imagination—attribute the nervous energy of the American Indian, as well as the mental and physical energy characterizing the American people above those of the inhabitants of India and China, as well as the people of Europe. Statistics show that notwithstanding the malignancy of the Asiatic cholera, it does not prove so virulent numerically upon the masses at the western, or plus (positive), as it has stricken the people numerically of the eastern terresto-magnetic poles.

Of the influence of the electro-magnetic currents upon atmospheric phenomena, the researches of students of natural philosophy superintending our own observatories, and those of Greenwich, England; and on the Continent of Europe, daily demonstrate the important part electricity plays in the economy of the universe, and its influences upon the atmosphere of the earth. The diagram above illustrates the four magnetic poles, north-east and south-east negative poles. From the earliest Biblical records, easterly winds have ever been pestilential, bringing ills to the human race, murrain to cattle, and devastation to vegetation. From the east has emanated the malignant eruptive diseases, small-pox, scarlet-fever, measles, plagues, cholera, etc., etc., etc., whilst from the north-west and south-west positive electro-magnetic poles emanate pure atmosphere, bringing nervous, vigorous breathing atmospheres; into the nostrils they breathe the breath of life. If all be true that is said of St. Paul, Minnesota, that this place is the El Dorado for consumptive people, may not this be attributed to the north-west magnetic pole being near this locality?

Who of our New York citizens cannot at once realize the following illustration? We speak of the summer period now: The chilly discomfort of a north-east wind and rain-storm; the warm, murky east and south-east atmospheres, with their clammy dampness, producing the physical lassitude, the miserable mental depression, and all those indescribable feelings of mind and body arising from nervous exhaustion, contra-distinguished by the glorious exhilaration of the spirit, the vigor of the nervous force, the lightness and freedom of the mind, after an electro-terresto-magnetic storm shoots up from the north-west or south-west, from behind the Jersey hills, stopping for the nonce the action of the telegraphic-wires, and discharging the magnetic-electric fluid into the very offices of the operators. Who does not feel the immediate effects of the purified, rarified, renewed, oxygenated (polarized) atmosphere?—the breast enlarges with the full inspiration, so refreshing to the lungs and vivified blood. Men and boys shout forth their delight with instinctive shrieks, as many New Yorkers have heard on clear, frosty nights, when the north-west atmosphere fills the lungs with exhilarated blood, to be carried to the heart, and thence to an excited brain. It needs no ghost to confirm what New York constantly experiences. Such atmospheres kill pestilence, come from whence they may.

What is that which is most inimical to the tenacity of life? Want of nervo-electrical power. We have it illustrated daily in cases of extreme fright. We not only have loss of animal-electrical power, but also of animal heat. Sir Benjamin Brodie's experiments have proved that animal temperature is altogether dependent upon the nervous system; and we know from experience, particularly in women and children, that extreme fear is fraught with loss of animal heat, and an erectile state of the hair, more particularly observed to act upon the pilous fibres covering the arms and face.

To study man aright, he must be considered, not as a machine, complete and perfect in itself, but as being connected with external objects, and influenced by external causes. Thus, then, electro-nervous influence depends upon the quality and the quantity of the blood. "The blood charged with oxygen, and the several tissues undergoing changes by contact with this fluid, form the elements of a galvanic pile, and are equivalent to the liquid acid and zinc." If this fluid, then, be destroyed or affected by external agents, either miasmata or gaseous poisons passing through the crust of the earth and exhaling into its atmosphere, the results must be the same—disease and death.

I have, in addition to my notes of the period alluded to, authentic information from those who were actively engaged on the spot. In Quebec, the disease appeared simultaneously in all parts of the city, and the deaths were one in seven of the population—a most extraordinary fatality. Contagion had not sufficient time to infect so many in so short a period. The disease rapidly advanced along the north, or right bank of the St. Lawrence, which gave rise to the opinion there that it progressed in "particular lines." At this time the citizens of New York became alarmed, and were talking about the quarantine modes to be adopted for preventing its being brought into the city and State from Quebec, when, to their horror, it suddenly made its appearance and carried off thousands. From the city of New York it radiated over the State, far in advance of the citizens running from it. When it reached Kingston, Upper Canada, so sudden and fatal was its visit, that the service of Rev. Thos. Hancock, of H. B. M. service, posted in the garrison, in the absence of the fleeing ministers, was early one morning required to bury four bodies; and before he left the burial-ground he had performed the burial-service over 128 bodies. In this manner, in three weeks, he had buried several thousands, being on the ground as early as sunrise, and in several instances after sunset. Ultimately he was taken down with the disease himself, in its worst form, from which he happily recovered. During this dreadful period the garrison, situated on an eminence, with one or two exceptions, was entirely free, although a free communication took place with the citizens.

In 1832, several physicians and students, including myself, attendants of the City Hospital, made a thorough post-mortem examination—so far as an August day would permit, with the temperature at 94 degrees, and a close, murky atmosphere—of a malignant case of Asiatic cholera, which had run its course in seven hours. On that day there were 126 deaths and 224 new cases. We were enclosed in a shed ("dead-house"), about 12 feet square, with no other ventilation than a small sky-light aperture, about 2 feet by 18 inches, occupied in this research, in an atmosphere of the most intensely pungent odor, and were compelled, after five hours moral fighting of who should first propose to make a retreat, to refrain from further investigation. For myself, I can answer, that people avoided me in the streets, in consequence of the odor from my clothes; and the servant-maid, inhaling my breath when she opened the door to admit me, was so overcome that sickness confined her to her room for several hours. These gentlemen were in no way affected, and, so far as I know, with the exception of Dr. Hare, who is since deceased by the absorption of matter received in a wound, whilst engaged in dressing an erysipelatous patient, they are all living.

At this period I was engaged in preparing and making a set of artificial teeth for Jarvis, the celebrated painter. Whilst gossiping with him in his studio, Dr. Francis, the present head of the Academy of Medicine, came in. "Ah, Jarvis, my dear friend, how do you do? Here, Jarvis, just paint this for me, my dear fellow; I've got a cholera stomach in my pocket, and I just want you to daub off a fac simile on a board, a piece of canvas, or anything." And the doctor proceeded slowly to unfold the delectable specimen from a piece of cloth, as if he were about presenting and tantalizing some fair recipient with an elegant Cashmere shawl, or some magnificent bijouterie. Jarvis handled the stomach, stretching and tacking it flat on a board, and neither he nor the doctor were affected by the "contagion."

Three columns of 10,000 men each, with 45,000 camp followers, were encamped in India, equi-distant from each other. The centre division was afflicted with the cholera. "Nothing was to be seen but individuals anxiously hurrying from one division of the camp to the other, to inquire after the fate of their dead or dying companions, and melancholy groups of natives bearing upon biers their departed relatives to the river." The division was removed to an elevated position in the rear of the other divisions, strewing their line of march with the dead and dying, when the disease disappeared. "It has occurred more than once that two battalions on a march together have encamped for the night on separate ground. The one has been severely attacked with the disease; the other has not presented a single case. Observing this, the infected battalion changes its encampment, and takes up a position alongside of the other. The malady immediately ceases; neither is it communicated to the uninfected division, although the intercourse has been unrestricted, not only between the healthy of the two corps, but also between the healthy and the sick." On the line of route of the disease, towns and bodies of troops, with no apparent circumstances, in other respects, to afford reasonable cause for security, entirely escaped; and a few months after, it would again start from a point heretofore entirely free from its influence, and seize upon those spots which had previously escaped, and avoid its former routes.

H. B. M. ship, "Undaunted," left Canton for the purpose of conveying the Governor-General of India to England. On her passage, a number of her crew were attacked with cholera asphyxia. This continued for several days. The surgeon recommended the captain to change the vessel's course into another latitude, which, being done, the malady immediately ceased. It is here worthy of remark, that the ship was, previous to this, perfectly healthy—nor had the disease been in that part of the world for a considerable period previous to the "Undaunted's" visit. The ship "Anne," of New Haven, crossed the same line of latitude, when the cholera appeared on board. The captain immediately bore away to a more southern latitude, and it immediately disappeared.

That an endemic disease may become contagious, I can readily comprehend; but cannot conceive how a disease, traveling in accordance with an arbitrary law, of which it is the result, round the world with a constant westward course, in the lines of the magnetic poles, and with very little deviation keeping north of the magnetic equator, can be considered a contagious disease. To me it is self-evident that it is the result of a specific poison, destroying both vegetable and animal life, where the constitutions of either are obnoxious to its presence. The potato disease is one illustration of its action upon vegetable life. As I stated in a former article on "Asiatic Cholera being traceable to certain electric phenomena, I conceive the 'potato rot' to be accounted for from these occult causes, and that this phenomenon will yet be proved to have acted as a sort of inoculating virus, as modifying the action of the atmosphere to such an extent as to change the peculiar character of Asiatic cholera into the form of the fatal dysentery, which has afflicted our country during the last summer months."

So far the mildness of the visitation of cholera in those parts of Germany, England, Scotland, Ireland, France and the United States, fortifies the views I have taken. The recent cholera was not "imported" into New Orleans; and in our own harbor, 80 inmates escaped from the cholera hospital, and have spread themselves, heaven knows where, without a case of contagion attending their steps. As well might the escape of steam, destroying hundreds of lives, be termed a contagious scalding, or those suffocated in the "black hole" of Calcutta be represented as having died of contagious asphyxia. But had the fever and boils afflicting those who survived the horrors of the "black hole" spread abroad and destroyed those who came within its atmosphere, with propriety it might be termed a contagious infection.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A newly-arrived boarder at one of our fashionable boarding-houses thought he had not sufficient bolstering for his head, and accordingly carried the pillows down to the landlady's room, who inquired what he desired. The gentleman wanted to know what she called the articles he held in his hands.

"Pillows, you impudent fellow!" screamed the outraged woman.

"Oh! I thought they were pin-cushions!" replied the disconsolate boarder.

A paper tells the following anecdote of a college student who was distinguished for his address in evading the writing of themes, and palming of the currency of others as his "legal tender." One evening he read a theme of unusual merit; but the professor, as he sat down in the pride of conscious excellence, asked:

"Is that original?"

"Yes, sir," said the student.

"Are you sure of it?" queried the professor, doubtingly.

"Why, yes, sir," replied the student, with imperturbable gravity; "it had 'original' over it in the paper I took it from.

The Journal de Rouen killed a lady recently, and the Radacteur had a visit from the bereaved husband.

"Villain," cried the bereaved husband, "you have killed my wife?"

Editor, with dignity:

"Monsieur, I am an editor, not a doctor."

"That's just it," cried the bereaved husband, "you've killed her on paper, and she is alive."

"If she is not dead I congratulate you sincerely.

"Congratulate! I demand damages for disappointment!"

The Maine Farmer tells a story of a man whom it calls Neverbeat. Somebody having boasted of the speed of his horse, Neverbeat rejoined:

"Why, the other day I was up to S——, 16 miles distant. Just as I started for home a shower came sweeping on. The rain struck in the back part of the wagon, and the moment it struck, I hit old Kate a cut with the whip. Away she trotted, scarcely touching her forefeet to the ground; she kept just nip and nip with the shower. The wagon was filled with water, but not a drop fell on me!"

At a concert which took place lately, a gentleman in the audience rose up, just as the third piece in the programme had been performed, and said: "Mr. Conductor, will you oblige me, sir, by requesting your vocalists to sing louder, or else sing in a whisper, as there is conversation going on close by where I sit, that is conducted in such a loud tone as to hinder my enjoyment of the music. I prefer, certainly, to hear the concert; but, if I cannot be so privileged, I desire to hear the conversation." There was an extremely quiet and attentive audience during the rest of the evening.

A dubious landlord, a short time since, was complaining that his sugar-drawer was over-run with ants. A "setter," ever present, proposed that, if Boniface would treat, he would inform him how to get rid of the ants in a very short time. The landlord accepted the proposition, when the "setter" coolly advised Boniface to "kill an ant every time he took a drink."

"Does your officiating clergyman preach the gospel, and is his conversation and carriage consistent therewith?" was a circular from a bishop to a church-warden of his diocese. A veteran near replied: "He preaches the gospel, but does not keep a carriage."

Little Freddie was told one day that he mustn't eat raw dried apples without chewing them up very fine, or they would swell in him, and make him very big. Two or three days afterward he ran home in a great hurry, to tell that he had seen a "great big man, more'n so big!" stretching his little arms at full length; "and I guess he'd been eating dried apples without chewin' 'em!"

Mr. Kingsley tells of some one who complimented Thackeray on parts of "Vanity Fair," but thought Sir Pitt Crawley impossible. The author replied that amongst the characters cited, Sir Pitt was the only one taken from life.

A boy's idea of having a tooth drawn may be summed up as follows: "The doctor hitched fast on to me, pulled his best, and, just before it killed me, the tooth came out."

One of those bores who are always suggesting disagreeable things, says: "Great eaters never live long." That may be, but they have a good time while it lasts, they think.

"Pa," said a little seven-year fellow, "I guess our man Ralph is a good Christian."

"How so, my boy?" queried the parent.

"Why, pa, I read in the Bible that the wicked shall not live out half their days; and Ralph says he has lived out ever since he was a boy."

Mrs. Partington at Harrisburg.—"There he goes again," said Mrs. P., in the Legislature, as a member stood up for the fifth time to speak on the same question. "There he goes like a soda fountain, and just as fluid as water. Now, Isaac, mind him, and see if you can't become a speaker of the house of reprehensibles some time. I declare!" continued she, as a new burst of eloquence reached her ear, "it does seem as if the mantelpiece of Danial Webster had fell onto him, he is so bright."

THE HOMES OF THE POOR.

Few persons outside the city of New York have any idea of the privations and wretchedness to which multitudes of our citizens are subjected. The stranger passing along our splendid streets and avenues, and looking at the palatial structures which are erected to the requirements of business, or consecrated as the homes of the wealthy and refined, would hardly believe that there are other structures, in which the poor are herded, and that afford little more than a shelter to the destitute. And yet in every part of this busy, crowded city can be found these dens more crowded and busy, which human beings are forced to call home, and which give to the philanthropist the gravest apprehensions; especially in view of the fact that the cholera is hastening to our shores, and, in all probability, will soon begin its high carnival of death and sorrow, are these apprehensions deepened and quickened, and the attention of all who regard the public welfare turned to these local causes of disease, separate, and always aggravate and sustain, disease.

The illustrations on this page suggest two of these causes, viz., tenement-houses and slaughter and fat-boiling establishments. Very appropriately has the artist termed the first of these "fever nests," and in the juxtaposition of the second, shows how little mammon cares for decency, health, or morality, when these are counterbalanced by gain.

To give our readers, many of whom have but a vague notion of what a tenement-house is, some conception of its horrors, we add a description recently appearing in one of the daily papers: "It is commonly a brick structure, standing upon a lot 25 by 100 feet; it is from four to six stories high, and so divided internally as to contain four families on each floor—each family eating, drinking, sleeping, cooking, washing, and fighting in a room eight feet by ten, and a bedroom six feet by ten—unless, indeed, which very frequently happens, the family renting these two rooms takes in another family to board, or sublets one room to one, or even two other families! One of the largest of these houses has apartments for 126 families. It stands on a lot 50 by 250 feet; is entered at the side from alleys eight feet wide; and, by reason of another house of equal height, the rooms are so darkened that, on a cloudy day, it is impossible to read or sew in them without artificial light. It has not a single room that can in any way be throughly ventilated. The vaults and sewers, which are to carry off the filth of the 126 families, have grated openings in the alleys and door-ways in the cellars, through which the noisome and deadly miasmata penetrate and poison the dank air of the house and the courts. The water-closets for the whole establishment are a range of stalls without doors, and accessible, not only from the building but even from the street. Comfort is here out of the question; common decency has been rendered impossible; and the horrid brutalities of the passenger-ship are day after day repeated, only on a larger scale."

And such, with slight variation of detail, is every tenement-house in this city; and yet the most houses are the abode of at least half a million of our citizens. Vice, crime, filth, and all the evils that degrade humanity, combine to render these houses hot-beds of disease and suffering, and when any epidemic prevails, it finds among the miserable inmates of such tenements ample material for its riot and ravage. The press has repeatedly called the attention of the authorities and the public to the abuses of the tenant-house system, and the Citizen's Association have published an exhaustive report, embracing facts and statistics of the most startling character, but the evil is by no means abated; landlords pocket their gains without compunction, and the poor wretches, immured in these living graves, suffer and wait until life's fitful fever expires, and others, equally wretched, suffer and pine away in their stead. It is on account of these "institutions" that the rate of mortality in New York so greatly exceeds that of other cities, and that diseases so generally within the control of ordinary treatment rage unabated, and number their victims by thousands. There are probably not less than 500 "fever nests," similar to our illustration, now existing in our city, while the number of insalubrious quarters peculiarly liable to an outbreak of disease would reach several thousands.

The Commission recently appointed by the Legislature is giving especial attention to these pest-houses and other nuisances, and we may venture the hope that such measures will soon be taken as will both elevate the condition of a large portion of our population, and free our city from the reproach these establishments have so long brought upon its good name. We have the promise of a good time coming; the work of reform has already commenced; and we trust the day is not far distant when such a scene as our picture presents will be found only among those sad memories that are the reflection of our errors and the echoes of our regrets.

THE FEVER NESTS IN THIRTY SECOND STREET, NEW YORK.

The Dead Child in the Tenement-House.

Whether we live in palaces or hovels, whether we are rich or poor, sickness, sorrow and death will sooner or later invade our homes and grieve our hearts. Neither our nobility nor our degradation shall exempt us from the sqyfsach of the destroyer; but there may be circumstances that render that approach especially sad and terrible. The scene depicted on this page is particularly touching and suggestive, though we naturally rather envy the dead child, in its bare crib, than the wretched survivor who are left for more sorrow. The story is a short one, like the short life it chronicles: Poverty drives the parents to the tenement-house; poor food, bad air, foul and deadly surroundings, soon generate disease, and disease quickly runs its course, and gives its victim over to death. The poor mother has still another demanding her care and calling forth her sympathy, for it, too, is gasping in its last agony, while the other children look on in mingled curiosity and grief, and the father sits aside, a silent, but not unconcerned spectator of the scene. The room is destitute of conveniences and comforts; yet affection, not crushed out by the desolation, has given the tribute of a flower to the little sleeper that will know no waking. We must not judge people by their surroundings entirely; many tender hearts and gentle affections may be found in just such a room as this, and the blow that falls on such a family fails just as heavy as if it had descended in the splendid abode of wealth and taste.

OUGANCA.

THE superstitions of savage nations are fostered and perpetuated to a great extent by the shrewdness of their medicine-men and witch-doctors. These are usually chosen for their personal ugliness, combined with inherent cunning and deception. As they live secluded in a hut by themselves, their impostures are not readily discovered, and they soon exercise a very extensive influence over the people. One of these witch-doctors, called Ouganga, is represented in our cut, and it would be difficult to conceive of a more revolting object. Du Chaillu thus describes his appearance and incantations:

"I never saw a more ghastly object. He had on a high head-dress of black feathers. His eyelids were painted red, and a red stripe from the nose upward divided his forehead in two parts. Another red stripe passed round his head. The face was painted white, and on each side of the mouth were two round red spots. About his neck hung a necklace of grass, and also a cord, which held a box against his breast. This little box is sacred, and contains spirits. A number of strips of leopard and other skins crossed h s breast, and were exposed about his person, and all these were charmed and had charms attached to them. From each shoulder down to his hands was a white stripe, and one hand was painted quite white. To complete this horrible array, he wore a string of little bells round his body.

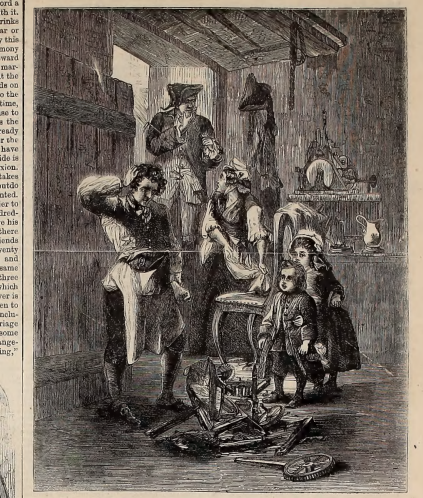
"He sat on a box or stool, before which stood another box containing charms. On this stood a looking-glass, beside which lay a buffalo-horn containing some black powder, and said, in addition, to be the refuge of many spirits. He had a little basket of snake-bones, which he shook frequently during his incantations, as also several skins, to which little bells were attached. Near by stood a talipot beating a board with two sticks. All the people of the village gathered about this couple, who, after continuing their incantations for a while, at last came to the climax. Jonibuli was told to call over the names of persons in the village, in order that the doctor might ascertain if any one of those named did the sorcery. As each named was called, the old cheat looked in the glass to see the result."



HOW THE KING OF FIJI RULES HIS WIVES.

HOW THE KING OF FIJI RULES HIS WIVES.

A FIJI wedding is a serious business, taking it all in all. The veidomoni or "mutual affection" is the first step. In this the young man asks the girl of her parents, taking a present, or not, as he judges best. When anything is given, it is not considered in the light of a price paid, but merely as a matter of form. Should the request meet with a favorable reply, the girl's friends take her to the house of her intended husband's parents, presenting at the same time property—teeth, cloth, or mats. A custom which is certainly pretty is there observed. Not even a heathen can leave the scenes of her childhood and careless joy without tears. The friends of the bridegroom endeavor to solace her by presenting trinkets as expressions of their regard. This is called the vakamasmaka, or "the drying up of tears." Then follows the vakatakata, or "warning." This is food made by the man, and taken to the friends of the bride, who still remains where her friends left her. In some parts she enjoys a holiday for four days, sitting in her new home, oiled and covered with tumeric powder. At the end of four days she bathes, accompanied by a number of women —generally married women—who help her to fish.

On returning home one fish is cooked, and when ready, an intimation to that effect is sent to the young man, who dresses himself in style, and, accompanied by a number of his companions, oiled and dressed, directs his steps to the house in which his betrothed awaits his arrival. The bridegroom and his companions take off their new dresses, which are given to the relatives of the bride. The fish-soup is then served with good yam, the prospective wife commencing her duties by pouring out and handing to her future lord a dish of soup, which he drinks, eating yam with it. A part of the yam he gives to his wife, who drinks with him. Probably they never were so near or spoke to each other before, and very likely this their first meal passes in silence. This ceremony is called na sili, "the bathing." In the leeward islands this generally concludes the form of marriage. To windward such is not the case; but the girl goes back to her parents, and the friends on both sides make cloth and mats to present to the young people on the wedding-day. Meantime, the young man is expected to build a house to which to take his wife, who now undergoes the painful process of tattooing, if it has not already been done. Some chief ladies, however, defer the performance of this operation until they have become mothers. During this period the bride is kept from the sun, to improve her complexion. These preliminaries over, the grand feast takes place, when the friends of each party try to outdo the others in the food and property presented. As in other native feasts, so here, it is easier to specify the good cheer by yards and hundredweights than by dishes. When Tanoa gave his daughter to Agavindi, the Lakesaan chief, there was provided for the entertainment of the friends assembled, a wall of fish five feet high and twenty yards in length, besides turtle, and pigs, and venison in proportion. One dish at the same feast was ten feet long, four feet wide, and three deep, spread over with green leaves, on which were placed roast pigs and turtles. Whatever is prepared by the friends of the man are given to those of the woman, and vice versa. The conclusion of this day is the vaqasea, when the marriage is complete, the announcement of which, in some tribes, is by tremendous shoutings; and arrangements are made for the veitaso, or "clipping," which, to windward, consists of clipping off a bunch of long hair worn over the temples by the woman while a spinster. To leeward, however, the woman is deprived of all her hair, and thus made sufficiently ugly to startle the most ardent admirer.

This is the conclusion of the Fiji wedding. It is merely a civil contract, and the services of a priest are not at all necessary to its celebration. Then begins the woman's misery. If she be young and pretty, the old, big-fisted wives turn their venom against her, and do all they can, by mauling and ill-treatment, to render her as unsightly as themselves. If she be of the brawny sort, and as well able to give as to take a thrashing, then she is hated, and all sorts of secret means are used to work her ruin. As may be easily imagined, these domestic brawls occasionally interfere with the peace of the lord of the establishment. What does the despotic husband do on such emergencies? Does he go out and reason with the brawlers? does he use gentle persuasion to make them desist from their biting and scratching? No; he has by him a stout stick, kept for the purpose, and, rushing among his women, he lays about him till order is restored. Royalty itself in Fiji finds it necessary to retain such a "persuader." Williams, a late traveler, says: "Near to the King of Lakemba, and afterward to the King of Mbua, I saw lying a stick of heavy wood, about the size of a broom-handle. On inquiry, I found that the free use of this truncheon was very effective in subduing the wayward wills of the women when they became disorderly. Tanoe's staff used for this purpose was inlaid with ivory, but did not, on that account give less pain.

"I once saw a young girl of good family, who was given to the daughter of Tuikilakila, brought in form to that chief. As she was presented in the way usually observed in giving a bride, I will describe the ceremony:

"She was brought in at the principal entrance by the king's aunt and a few matrons, and then, led only by the old lady, approached the king. She was an interesting girl of 15, glistening with oil, wearing a new liku, and a necklace of carved ivory points, radiating from her neck, and turned upwards. The king then received from his aunt the girl, with two whale's teeth she carried in her hand. When she was seated at his feet, his majesty repeated a list of their gods, and finished by praying that the girl might live and bring forth male children. To her friends—two men who had come in at the back-door—he gave a musket, begging them not to think hardly of his having taken their child, as the step was connected with the good of the land, in which their interests, as well as his own, were involved. The musket, which was about equivalent to the necklace, the men received with bent heads, muttering a short prayer. Tuikilakila then took off the girl's necklace, and kissed her. The gayest moment of her life, as far as dress was concerned, was past; and I felt that the untying of that polished ornament from her neck was the first downward step to a dreary future. Perhaps her forebodings were like mine, for she wept, and the tears which glanced off her bosom, and rested in distinct drops on her oily legs, were seen by the king, who said: 'Do not weep. Are you going to leave your own land? You are but going a voyage, soon to return. Do not think it a hardship to go to Mbua; here you have to work hard—there you will rest; here you fare indifferently—there you will eat the best of food. Only do not weep to spoil yourself.' She reminded him of a sister of hers, who had been taken to Mbua in years past, and the mention of whose name seemed to have a talismanic effect on the aged aunt. * * Just then the king's women appeared with their nets, and he ordered the poor girl to go and try her hand at fishing."

We hardly think any of our New York belles would be content to share a throne on such terms as these.

ARKWRIGHT'S WIFE DESTROYING THE MODELS.

It is well known that Sir Richard Arkwright—to whose ingenuity and perseverance, more than to any other cause, we are indebted for the marvelous growth of our cotton manufactures—began life as a poor barber. It is now more than 100 years since he occupied a kind of underground kitchen in the town of Bolton, in Lancashire, to which he endeavored to attract customers by exhibiting a board with the facetious inscription, "Come to the Subterranean Barber: he Shaves for a Penny." Whether the barbers of the town really dreaded this announcement, or merely felt the customary jealousy toward an interloper—for Arkwright was a native, not of Bolton, but of Preston—does not appear; but a fierce opposition is said to have been at once commenced between them. The Bolton barbers reduced their prices; but the man whose inventive genius was destined to create a revolution in British industry was not likely to be beaten when fairly roused. Arkwright took down his board, and painted out the offensive inscription; but it was only to substitute the still more alarming words—Richard Arkwright, Subterranean Barber: a Clean Shave for a Half-penny!" We may assume that the Bolton barbers after this left their underground rival to shave the town in peace.

Where Arkwright's cellar was, is not exactly known—indeed, the facts relative to his early life are somewhat obscure; but Mr. French, in his Biography of Crompton, informs us that a gentleman in Bolton still preserves, as a relic of Arkwright, the leaden vessel in which his customers were accustomed to wash after being shaved. Like most handicraftsmen, whose business leaves them much spare time, barbers are frequently ingenious men—a truth which appears to be as old as the Arabian Nights' Tales; most readers of which will remember the barber who left his half-shaven customers, to take astronomical observations in an adjoining garden. Arkwright appears to have corresponded in many ways with that ancient prototype of Oriental humor. His mind was always filled with schemes of ingenious mechanism for shortening labor, and appears, like many other uneducated men, to have long dreamed of discovering that philosopher's stone of mechanics—perpetual motion. Like the wife of the potter, Bernard Palissy, Mrs. Arkwright was not unnaturally impatient of his neglect of the customers, who now began, we may suppose, to be more numerous in the barber's kitchen. Convinced that he would starve his family by scheming when he ought to be shaving, Mrs. Arkwright one day, in a fit of anger, destroyed some of his cherished models of machinery, and in a moment the unfortunate barber saw the fruit of his labor and ingenuity, and all the prospective wealth that they were to bring him, gone, as he thought, for ever. Arkwright never forgave this act. He separated from her immediately, nor would anything induce him ever to live with her again.

ENGLISH VOTERS.

The investigations by the Election Committee of the House of Commons are bringing to light gross cases of bribery at the recent elections, and several members had in consequence been unseated.

At Nottingham, a mob in the pay of one of the candidates broke up meetings, drove voters from the polls, and rioted all night. There were mobs, and violent mobs, with destruction of property in many places. In others there was only quiet bribery. In Totnes, single votes commanded from $250 to $1,000. It was sworn that not 40 votes were given in the borough that were not paid for. Of these, a virtuous cab proprietor, who was offered $750 to vote for the Liberals, refused it, and voted for the Conservatives.

At Great Yarmouth the prices were not so high. A dentist swore that the Conservatives offered him $60, but as the Liberals offered $77 50, he gave back the smaller bribe and voted for the larger. But all were not so scrupulous. A man received $75 from one party, put it in his pocket, and then for $50 voted for the others. The astonished chairman of the committee asked him,

"Is it consistant with your notions of morality to take £15 from one side and £10 from the other?"

"Well, sir," the independent voter replied, "I took the money, but, I always vote on the Liberal side."

"Robert Nobbs deposed that he received £15 from William Blyth, and promised to vote for the Conservatives. Afterward got £15 from a stranger, and voted for the Liberals. Pocketed £30 in all."

Bickus, a shoemaker, was apparently a different case. He took £15 to vote for the Conservatives, and voted the other way. When asked why, he said:

"Because my principles were that way."

"But your principles did not prevent you taking £15?"

"My principles were wavering, but they tended that way."

"At all events, according to your own story, you took £15 to go one way and went another."

This rather posed the witness, but he scratched his head and said:

"Well, I'm no scholar."

It is perfectly evident that a large proportion of the voters are bribed by one side or the other, or both, and an increase in the number of such voters, or those of a more ignorant and needy class, will either lower the price of votes or make elections more expensive. Doubtless there are men whom $1,000 will not buy, but one who refused that sum confessed that had a situation of $1,500 or $2,000 a year been offered him, he might have considered it, showing that even a British Cato must not be tempted too severely.

AN INNOCENT MAN IN THE STATE PRISON.

About the spring of the year 1850, a Mr. Garnet, living near Auburn, N. Y., was arrested for forgery. He was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to three years imprisonment in the State Prison at Auburn. He denied his guilt to the end, and being of very sensitive feelings, and having a wife and family, it bore quite heavily upon him.

He served his time and was released, a mere wreck of his former self, despised by his once loving wife, who refused to live with him and shunned him as a guilty culprit. Sad and broken-hearted, he disposed of his property and went to Central Pennsylvania, where he married a beautiful and excellent young lady.

They lived happily and prospered. Several years after his departure, the first wife became fully convinced that he was innocent and had been wronged. This conviction proved true by the death-bed confession of a man who acknowledged the commission of the crime of which Mr. Garnet had been convicted. The sorrowing woman repented her former act, and with a friend went in pursuit of her discarded husband, whom she seemed to expect to find somewhere in Pennsylvania.

After a search of several weeks, they at length arrived in the neighborhood of the object of their search. Just at dark they drove up to the door of a snug and pleasant little cottage, when Mrs. Garnet entered the house, and there beheld the once beloved husband apparently happy in the society of the second wife. She rushed up to him, and throwing her arms about his neck, wept bitterly. Soon the scene became affecting, the two wives clinging to him, each claiming him as her husband.

After calming their feelings and candidly considering the case, the second wife decided to give up the husband, believing that the first had the lawful claim. After a few days Mr. Garnet and his first wife removed to the vicinity of Rochester, N. Y., where they now reside. The second wife makes them an annual visit, and Mr. G. keeps her supplied with all the necessaries of life.

Jenny Lind and the German Students.—At a certain German town, in the summer of 1846, there was a tremendous furore about Jenny Lind, who, after driving the whole place mad, left it on her travels early one morning. The moment her carriage was outside the gates, a pack of rampant students, who had escorted it, rushed back to the inn, demanded to be shown Jenny's bedroom, and swept like a whirlwind up-stairs into the room indicated to them, tore up the sheets, and wore them in strips as decorations. An hour or two afterward, a bald old gentleman of amiable appearance, an Englishman, who was staying in the hotel, came to breakfast at the table—d'hote—and was observed to be very much disturbed in mind, and to show great terror whenever a student came near him. At last he said to some one who came near him at table: "You are an English gentleman, I observe? Most extraordinary people these German students; as a body, raving mad, gentlemen." "Oh, no," said somebody, "only excitable but very good fellows, and very sensible." "By ——, sir," returned the old man, still more disturbed, "there's something political in it, and I am a marked man. I went out for a little walk this morning, after shaving, and while I was gone"—he fell in a perspiration as he told it—"they burst into my bedroom, tore up my sheets, and are now patrolling the town in all directions with bits of 'em in their buttonholes." In the confusion, the students had gone into the wrong room.

How the Western Indians Fight.—A correspondent, describing a recent attack on a Government train, on the Western plains, has the following as to the Indian method of fighting: "They rarely, if ever, attack except on horseback, and each man keeps his horse on the run, riding generally in a circle, so as to avoid shots, discharging, in the meantime, showers of bullets and arrows, and shouting, to stampede the animals. When a weapon is pointed at one of them, he shelters himself almost entirely by hanging over the side of his horse, and from this position continues firing. Dashing suddenly upon a train in this manner, they can discharge a great number of shots before the teamsters, taken by surprise, and encumbered by the care of their teams, can make any organized or effective resistence; and if unsuccessful in their attempts to shoot the drivers or stampede the animals, they are often able to make good their retreat without loss. The principal defense against an attack of a formidable nature, is to form a corral, which furnishes considerable protection; and cases have occurred where corrals have been besieged for several days by large bodies of Indians, too numerous to be encountered on the other plan. Although arrows are still much used, many of thr Indians are well armed with rifles and revolvers, though some of them, at least, do not understand the use of the breach-loading guns, and they have been known to leave captured weapons of that description, after breaking, so as to render them useless."

Of all the queer stories about morbid scrupulosity, the queerest is told of a certain Spanish abbess and one of her nuns, when proceeding on a journey which it was a matter of life and death to complete with the utmost speed. The man who drove the mules of their carriage was urging his beasts to speed with the usual profuse oaths and blasphemies which are in vogue with Spanish muleteers in general, and the pious ears of the two nuns were so shocked at what they heard, that they insisted upon the man's abstaining from the offensive words. The mules, not hearing the accustomed objurgations, speedily slackened their pace, and the driver informed the ladies that nothing but strong swearing would make them move quickly. The nuns were at their wits' end. Every half-hour was most precious, but, on the other hand, their consciences revolted at the idea of authorizing such blasphemies as they had been hearing. At length a happy thought struck them. The most odiously profane phrase is, of course, made up of words which, if taken singly, may be of a perfectly innocent description. They, therefore, agreed to divide the muleteer's cursings into their component parts, and so, by assigning one word to the abbess, another to the sister, and a third to the muleteer, and pronouncing their series in their proper order, the complete anathemas were made to reach the ears of the mules, while not one of the speakers could be considered guilty of uttering anything wrong.

The Culture of Fish in England.—A writer in the London Field, in treating the subject of the culture of fish at Stormontfield, a fish-breeding establishment in England, on the river Tay, gives the following details in relation to the capacities of the establishment and of the breeding process: "The establishment of Stormontfield, with 300,000 ova each, has increased the rental of the Tay 10 per cent. Before the experiment, the average annual take of salmon and grilse was 70,000; it is now 80,000, and is still on the increase; 10,000 fish—the increase—are worth £3,000. But when we come to consider the very small number of fish from which this great increase is derived, the result can be considered nothing short of wonderful. The number allowed to escape for reproduction in the Tay is 40,000. Of these only about 25 females are required to stock the Stormontfield breeding boxes; a proportion so small that were they destroyed, or even 10 times their number, they would not be missed. It must indeed be a small salmon river in which you cannot capture 25 female salmon; and these, if properly managed, can be made to produce 10,000. This gives us some idea of the dormant wealth of our salmon fisheries. I am aware there are many difficulties in the way, but these may be overcome when the subject comes to be thoroughly ventilated and understood. It is erroneously supposed that the great destruction of fry takes place in the sea; the destruction which takes place there is undoubtedly great—perhaps 90 to 95 per cent. of the smelts which are bred in the river; but this is as nothing when compared with that which takes place while in the river, where from each thousand ova not more than ten fry are reared to the migrating stage. By cultivation 800 smelts can be raised from 1,000 ova. A salmon of 10lb. weight produces in its wild and uncultivated state five grilse or salmon; in its domestic or cultivated state it will produce 200 or 250.

An anecdote of Victor Hugo and his son appears in the continental journals. The son, M. Charles Hugo, one day heard Mlle. Le Hoene spoken of in the most flattering manner, begged to be introduced to her, and a short time afterward asked her hand; but her grandmother (the young lady was an orphan) refused, on account of her poverty. To this the lover replied, "My father will think that a matter of no importance when he knows my wishes." He told Hugo his desire to marry Mlle. Le Hoene. The father replied, "Very well, but don't mention the subject to me again until I get my book out." The proof-sheets of his "Song of the Streets and the Woods" were then engaging his full attention, and when he is preparing a work for the press, or seeing it through the printer's hands, he will hear of nothing else. After the appearance of the volume, he arranged the marriage, gave his son a sum of money equal to $25,000, married them, and promised them that they should live with him as soon as he had completed the mansion he is now building.

A China paper speaks of the execution of a small military official who had the impudence to expostulate first with the magistrate and afterward with the executioner, stating that he had an aged mother dependent on him for support. Just as he had clinched the argument a dexterous flourish of the sword took off his head. The large crowd assembled to witness the spectacle are said to have been "convulsed with laughter" at the sudden pause produced by the skillful blow.

Those who suffer from nervous irritation, itching uneasiness, and the discomfort that follows from an enfeebled and disordered state of the system, should take AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and cleanse the blood. Purge out the lurking distemper that undermines the health, and the constitutional vigor will return.

NOTICES FROM THE ENGLISH PRESS.

A very charming work. The creation of a mind imbued with the rich treasures of thought—of a heart full of feeling, and embellished by a fancy ever chaste and delicate, but endowed with rare and brilliant powers.—London Observer.

One of the most delightful books of the season! and from no unpracticed pen, we avow it. The narrative is deeply interesting; the style pure and chaste; the imagery beautiful; and the portraiture of persons and passions vivid, glowing and true to nature.—London Morning Post.

Price 50 cents. Mailed free of postage on receipt of price. F. A. BRADY, Publisher, 22 Ann street, N. Y.

The Great National Fair.

The lady directors of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, will commence to hold a Public Fair in the City of Washington, on the 15th of May next, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the support and maintenance of the Orphans of National Soldiers and Sailors not otherwise provided for in their respective States and Territories.

The ladies invite all who can to contribute toward representing their State by a table at the Fair.

The charity is a noble and deserving one, and it is hoped that each State and Territory will be liberally represented.

All contributions should be addressed—"National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home, Washington, D. C.," and forwarded, if possible, 10 days before the opening of the Fair.

The Institution will be opened for the reception of children on the 1st of June next, and applications for admission may be forwarded immediately. tf

Compounding Felony.

"Set a thief to catch a thief" is a maxim, of which the apparent common sense commends it instinctively to popular approbation; and if the restitution of stolen property to its owners were the chief or only object, such method of proceeding might be the most effectual. But society has its rights as well as its duties, and one of its rights is the punishment of criminals. In a well-organized community, the machinery for the detection of felony ought to be as complete as that for the punishment of it after detection, and to substitute, or allow to be substituted, in any way, a reward for successful crime, instead of its due punishment, is a complete subversion of the safeguards which, by common consent, surround us. A felon of whatever rank, from the chimney under-graduate pickpocket to the accomplished professor of burglary, is the enemy, not only of his victim, but of the society of which that victim is a member. Probably, when your plate and valuables are missing in the morning, your first idea is that the loss is yours alone. It may be so in money value; but what your neighbor loses at the same time is his sense of security—itself of no small value: for this security is the compact of society itself, and cannot be tampered with or le sened without great danger to what is most dear to us all.

It seems strange that we should thus insist on the simplest and most obvious of the laws of an organized community; but recent occurrences lead us to think that they have been grievously neglected. Scarcely can the advertising columns of a morning paper be opened without seeing some such notice as the following: "$100 reward for the return of the property, and no questions asked;" or, "the finder (meaning thief) may keep the money, if he will return the papers." Now all this proffered immunity to crime is in the highest degree reprehensible, but with such small fry it is scarcely worth while for our detective police to interfere. It is when rewards of tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars, as in recent cases, are offered that the energies of our guardians are aroused. In such cases there are three parties to the transaction. The thief, whose object is the maximum of plunder and minimum of punishment—that is, of restitution; his victim, who desires to get back his property with the smallest possible fine; and the police, a sort of middle term, who stimulate the offers of the highest rewards to obtain the largest results for both parties, not forgetting themselves. It is almost a pity, while military forms are so fresh in our recollections, that in dealing with criminals, the police did not, in granting immunity from punishment, on condition of restoring part of their plunder, attach a further condition in the shape of a parole, that they should abstain from further depredations for a certain fixed time; not to serve again until duly exchanged, to be varied by, not to steal again till they had spent the proceeds of their last robbery. We make the Police Commissioners a present of the suggestion. As it appears that criminals may escape the terrors of the law by making partial amends, may not the same power that absolves them, impose a penance of temporary abstinence from their favorite pursuits?

There is a grave and increasing suspicion in the public mind that too close a connection exists between crime and the rewards offered for its detection—not alone that offenders are left "unwhipt of justice," in consideration of the surrender of part of their booty, but, what is just as bad, that the best efforts of the detective police are not put forth till stimulated by rewards proportionate to the value of the property stolen. We are far from condemning the propriety, in the abstract, of offering the inducements of a pecuniary reward for more strenuous and determined efforts to recover stolen property, for such rewards may stimulate others besides the police to give information that may lead to detection; and may, besides, induce some of the accomplices to betray their comrades. But what we do most loudly condemn is the wait on the part of the police for a reward to be offered before making the exertions they are bound, in virtue of their office, to make without any such incentive. No terms, however, which we can employ, would be too strong in reprobating the practice of condoning offenses on surrender of part of their fruits. No practice could lead more directly to the encouragement of crime when its proper punishment can be thereby easily evaded, and nothing can be more injurious to public morality. It may be a simpler and easier way to recover your property by negotiating direct with the thief, and consenting to give him one-quarter of it, in order to save the remaining three-quarters, than to refuse to treat with him, and leave to the police to fulfill their duty toward both the felon and your property. It would also be very convenient if you could seize your goods wherever you found them, and thrash, to your heart's content, the rascal who had annoyed and injured you so much. But society exacts from its members something more than the promotion of their own convenience, and deputes the execution of justice to its own officers. It may seem hard that we cannot obtain the restitution of our property without invasion of the rights, or interference with the duties of others; but even this we might submit to with resignation if we were convinced that the efforts of those others would be as effective as our own. And herein, it appears to us, lies the whole difficulty. People do not trust the detective police, and do not believe that they are earnestly bending their best energies to discover and punish the numerous felonies that are committed; and how, on the other hand, can the police ask for the confidence of the public in the face of such developments as the Rufus Lord, Concord Bank, and Brown and Ross robberies have brought to light?

Robbery is an art—or, if you will, a science —requiring many years of diligent study to become an adept in it, and such artist has his distinct method of work, easily comprehended by those who are in the secrets of the craft. We doubt if any great robbery could take place without the distinguishing mark of the style of perpetrators being visible to the police; and if arrests do not follow, it is either because, in official eyes, some link in the chain of evidence is wanting, or some ulterior purpose is to be answered—and it is just this ulterior purpose that the public distrusts. They see that discovery is never, or rarely, made till a reward is offered, and that, on the reward being offered, discovery is made. To make matters worse, it is also announced that immunity must be promised to the criminal. The conclusion is obvious: that the police, if not inefficient, is corrupt; and the distrust of their ability or honesty tempts the public to do itself a rude sort of justice by encouraging felonies, instead of endeavoring to punish them.

We are glad to see that this evil is engaging the attention of our authorities, with a view to its repression, and we think we have pointed out the true direction which this should take. Give us confidence that, if we are deprived of our spoons, an honest effort will be made by the police to restore them, and at the same time to punish the invaders of our domestic peace, and then we shall no longer think it necessary to offer half a dozen as a present to the thief, if he will kindly return the other half.

The Basis of Representation in Congress.

THE Amendment of the Constitution so as to abolish slavery must logically be followed by other amendments, so as to extirpate from that instrument all clauses and provisions connected with the defunct institution. Having cut down the Upas tree, it would not be wise or safe to leave its stump and roots remain to corrode and fester where it grew. The concession made to slavery when it was strong and powerful, should disappear with their cause. One of the most obnoxious of these concessions was that which allowed "property" to be directly represented in Congress—in other words, that which allowed three-fifths of the slaves, who, it was insisted, were property, to be counted in the apportionment of representation. This gave the whites of the slave States from fifteen to eighteen members of Congress more than was given to a corresponding number of white men in the free States, and a consequent proportionally greater influence in the National Council. Now that the war has resulted in abolishing slavery, two-fifths of the late slaves have been added to the basis of representation, and as long as the negroes are debarred from voting, the whites of the South will have their political influence enhanced in that proportion! That is to say, they will have not far from twenty-five more representatives in Congress than an equal number of white men in the free States!

To correct this injustice, equalize representation, and prevent the suppression of the rebellion and the destruction of its cause from resulting in the augmentation of the political power of those who were rebels, the "Reconstruction Committee" of Congress has reported the following amendment to the Constitution, which, as it embodies substantially the expressed views of the President, we hope will be adopted without delay. It is as follows:

> "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in the rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age."

This does not touch the vexed question of negro suffrage, but leaves each State free to concede or deny it; but it does provide that one man or any class of men shall not say who shall represent another man or class of men. It does not provide that twenty-five men shall present themselves in Congress as representatives of people who have had no voice in their election.

A daily contemporary which is properly strong in its statistics, has published an elaborate table, showing what would be the effect of the adoption of the amendment on the aggregate of Congressional representation. The table assumes the census of 1860 as its basis, and does not undertake to make any modification on account of the losses which the population of the South, white or black, has suffered during the war.

States	Present Representatives	Representatives Under Amendment
Alabama	7	1
Arkansas	3	1
Delaware	1	1
Florida	1	1
Louisiana	4	1
Maryland	5	3
Mississippi	5	1
Missouri	9	3
North Carolina	7	1
South Carolina	6	1
Tennessee	8	3
Texas	4	1
Total	72	59

The net loss of Members of Congress from the lately slave States would therefore be twenty-five.

"Singed Paws."

COM. RODGERS, commanding the American squadron in the harbor of Valparaiso, let slip the golden opportunity of gaining honor, fame and fortune for himself, and glory and gratitude for his country, when he failed to punish the senseless and spiteful bombardment of the commercial metropolis of the South Pacific by the Spaniards. His reasons for doing so, given at length in a dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy, are singularly weak and unsatisfactory. He was satisfied that the contemplated act of the Spaniards was contrary to all the usages of civilized warfare, directed to no legitimate end, and which ought to be and "might be resisted." He did not think "that neutrality among nations provided well-directed efforts to keep the peace among them;" and he did think "that a peaceable citizen is not obliged to stand by inert while another is suffering from the unlawful violence of a third person, but may justly interfere with force to prevent an infraction of the laws—a murder for example; so a nation, witnessing the like disturbance among her sister nations, need not rest absolutely impassive, but, with sincere neutrality, might interpose with force, if necessary, to keep the operations of belligerents at least within the law, for the protection of neutral persons and neutral property."

These are sound views, and well put; and would have been accepted by the people of the United States, and by the world, as justifying his interposition against the outrage meditated and afterward consummated.

But Com. Rodgers did not interfere. With a force so far superior to that of the Spaniards as to justify him in believing he could have destroyed their squadron in from "thirty seconds to half an hour," persuaded the Spaniards to bombard an undefended town, and to destroy property estimated at from eight to twenty-two millions in value, all, or nearly all of it, neutral, and considerably part American!

Why, it will be asked, with surprise, did Com. Rodgers refrain from enforcing what he so clearly regarded as his right, and discharging, as he says, his solemn duty, he believed to be his duty? How came it about that the Commodore's logical mountain brought forth—not even a mouse? Let every American's cheek burn with shame as we record his answer!

It was because the English Admiral would not join him in interfering! The British officer, through cowardice or weakness, would not open his ports to protect British interests, which "rose to thousands, while ours (American) were only hundreds!" Therefore, the American hundreds were allowed to be destroyed, while abstract right and duty, apart from all considerations of interest, called for interference! The fact that such interference could have incidentally saved British interests "amounting to thousands," was sufficient to prevent an American Commodore from performing a noble and generous action, which would have vindicated the principles of legitimate war, while showing to the world that the United States could act on lofty and unselfish impulses! The fact that American interests were relatively small, while those of other neutral nations were large, would have relieved the interference from all improper imputations.

The Commodore puts his reason for not acting in a very familiar, not to say undignified form:

> "The English Admiral said at first that he would go with me, for I plainly declared that I would not take a step without him. I said that I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to pull his chestnuts out of the fire and then have the Power I served laughing at my reward, and he then enjoyed the luxury of insecurity."

We strongly believe that the British, French and German subjects residing in Chile or doing business there, would have been very far from laughing at Com. Rodgers' "singed paws," had he, in discharge of his duty and on high grounds, saved their property and interests. And if the British commander should have been inclined to laugh at Com. Rodgers for having done what his own cowardice, imbecility, or inability prevented him from doing, we will venture to say his cachinnations would not have been performed in the presence of any English gentlemen—certainly not in the presence of any of those who, by Com. Rodgers's interference, had been saved from ruin. No man need fear to be laughed at for anything he may do in the line of his duty.

A daily contemporary asks the pertinent question, "What are the thunderous sent out for to all parts of the world—to the Gulf, the Mediterranean, and the South Pacific? Ostensibly to protect American interests. We should like to know, in view of this Valparaiso affair, if there is a graduated scale of interests, and at what point the protection comes in? Taking hundreds for units, how many hundreds justify protective interference? How many thousands? And must our interests be greater than any other nation's interests, before we get to protection? Or if any other nation's interests be greater than ours, must ours be abandoned, lest some commodore should be laughed at by somebody?

Seriously, it is a question of American squadrons is to lie still and see such acts as the bombardment of Valparaiso accomplished, all we have to say is, let our vessels, sustained at enormous cost in every sea, be recalled and anchored, to rot quietly in the Wallabout. Or if a narrow-minded Secretary of the Navy so binds up our commanders that they are unable to do that which gives us the only justification for having a navy at all, then in Heaven's name let the Executive get rid of him, and put some man in his place who belongs, if not to this generation, at least to that last preceding! We have had enough of Cabinet officers whose friends forgot to put pennies on their eyes when they left their countries ago, and who in consequence wander about the capital, and work the treadmill of official routine in a somnambulic way, complacently ignorant of the requirements of the times, and heedless of the responsibilities devolved on a virile and growing nationality.

Bombardment of Valparaiso.

THE world is mistaken! Spain has proved it possible to add to contempt and defeat, action in which she has so long been held by Christendom. It was only necessary for her, after having been beaten in two naval engagements, in a war provoked by her own insolence, to vent her impotent wrath on an undefended city, and satisfy her spite by the destruction of property belonging to her opponents! The bombardment of Valparaiso by Admiral Mendez Nuñez, considered as an act of war, deserves only to rank with the courageous exploit of the redoubted braggart Hollins, in bombarding San Juan de Nicaragua. It is true it has not quite so ridiculous a side as the San Juan affair. The brave Hollins, it will be remembered, after firing deliberately at one hute of his Valparaiso, bravely sent half a dozen middies ashore with as many boxes of Lucifer matches, who soon made ashes of the offending village. Hollins and Nuñez, pour encourager les autres! There are none so mean as to envy them their bloodless laurels!

Except as a disgraceful violation of all the usages of war, which the world should prohibit from passing into a precedent (if it be possible anything Spain can do, can rise to the dignity of being regarded as a precedent), it would be difficult to speak seriously of the outrage on Valparaiso. All the antecedents of the act show that it was an abolition of sacrificed victim, and other spite, and not performed as an act of war directed to any of the objects for which resort to war is considered justifiable. It was an act without an element of dignity. Admiral Nuñez cannot justify it on any ground; but in trying to do so he naively confesses to its wantonness and purposelessness. He complains that he could not get at the allied Chilean and Peruvian fleet, because they would sail into intricate bays and insist on fighting him at an advantage. They had the audacity to hover about places where there were fogs, and, in fact, avail themselves of every circumstance favorable to themselves. They would not quietly come alongside his ironclad, and permit themselves to be pounded to pieces at his pleasure. They were not only cautious and cunning, ready to sum up any of his ships they might catch, but were so abandoned as to fight only when there was a chance in their favor. When, however, they offered to come out on the high seas, and vessel to vessel, gun to gun, as did the Alabama to meet the Kearsarge, he declined the combat. When Nuñez fights, he wants the advantage; yet he blames them for taking it when they can! Chivalrous Nuñez! You will never attain the glories of a Lawrence, nor even the doubtful laurels of a Semmes!

There was one way, however, to command all the chances, without the slightest risk. To attack a seaport which had no defenses, and burn warehouses filled with goods belonging to foreigners, was a deed every way worthy of Spain and her Admiral. And he did it! Three hours he valiantly fired shot and shell into a deserted town, and then retired to reflect comfortably on his exploit. The result was that the destruction of some millions of dollars' worth of English, French, and German goods, for which we consider it not unlikely Spain will have to pay, and the burning of a few blocks of private houses. The powers of Chile for offense or defense are in no degree impaired, and so far as she is concerned, she has won in the more active and persistent hostility of her people to Spain, and in obtaining the open co-operation of the foreigners whose Spain has injured, as well as the sympathies of the world. Spain has lost—we were about saying her honor, but that was gone long ago!—her last chance to be regarded as a civilized nation, and has raised herself beyond international sympathy. The people scoff at her, and "will laugh when her tribulation comes." She has confessed her impotence against the South American coalition, which her impudent pretensions have created, and practically admitted that she cannot carry on a war against them, in any sense that war is admissable.

We lay special stress on this point, for here lies the gravamen of Spain's offense against the committee of nations for its wantonness, and which have become both law and usage. Neither England nor France felt themselves sanctioned in attacking Odessa, in their war with Russia, although well knowing that it was her most vulnerable point. A belligerent aims at destroying or crippling the armies and navies of his opponent, chiefly for his supplies when he can, and destroying them if possible. But he can go no further. Valparaiso was already blockaded. Chile drew the strength from that direction. To destroy the town, and turn out 80,000 unresisting inhabitants shelterless and without food, on a comparatively barren coast, was only to inflict suffering without legitimate result. It was barbarism; not war. We bombarded Vera Cruz, but it was to compel, as it did compel, the surrender of San Juan de Ulloa, the possession of which was the key to our future military operations. Charleston was bombarded, but only as an alternative to the surrender of Sumter, Moultrie and fortifications around it. There is no parallel in these acts of legitimate war to the savagery of Spain.

The bombardment of Valparaiso will stand in history an eternal stigma on its perpetrators; a blot on the age; a wanton, pointless act of Vandalism; a cowardly piece of spite, which could never have been perpetrated by any country except Spain, or perpetrated by any except Spaniards. Chile can well afford to be cheerful in view of a deed which in no way cripples her, while it attaches Christendom to her cause.

We publish in another column some account of the New Granadian Barbacoas district, with sketches by a gentleman, who made a personal survey of the district. His account of it is not by any means encouraged, but, under more favorable experiences, we should be failing in our duty if we did not yarn our people against accepting at least more than one-half of what comes to this country from speculators in the distant regions of South America, between the tropics. The American Consul at Panama furnished the following good advice to all who propose going to the Barbacoas mines:

> "Great sickness always exists at the mines, and my advice to all miners in California and Nevada is—Do not come unless you have at least $500 in your pockets, above the expense of getting to the mines, as a capital to start with, or as a means of returning, if sick or disatisfied."

The special correspondent of the Panama Star and Herald, writing from the mines themselves, says:

> "Only four mines are in active operation. The workings of the mines above a considerable depth can only be successfully carried out under considerable difficulties. The diggings are all in very steep banks, and must be worked horizontally, for which purpose long horizontal tunnels are the only available ones. All the country round Barbacoas is private property, and although in the washing of gold out of the sand, shores is open to all, the river is seldom low enough to allow of that operation. An experienced miner has told me that the bed-rock is much below the level of the river, and therefore the water has to be bailed out by women, with a good deal of trouble and expense, as there is not full enough for it to flow out of the sluices. It seems to be perfectly true that the country higher up the River Telembi is not only richer in gold, but that there is a large back land of fertile and healthy mountains; but as yet I have not been able to gather any information from the natives which I would implicitly believe; and the Americans who had started from Barbacoas for the head of the river had not yet returned."

As indignant gentleman speaking of an eminent foreigner who built the most desirable residences in the United States, and when he returned, wrote about the most conspicuous Americans: "He staid with my friend X, and in his book he spoke of his personal habits. I should like to speak of his personal habits, and I would inform the world that this prodigious critic allowed himself one shirt a week. On Sunday morning it was clean. Then his coat and waistcoat were thrown open. On Monday the waistcoat was closed a little. Tuesday a little more. On Wednesday the ends of the cravat were suffered to appear over the bosom. On Thursday they quite overspread it. On Friday the waistcoat closed up entirely. On Saturday there was nothing but cravat to be seen. On Sunday there was the full effulgence of the clean shirt again, coat and waistcoat generously thrown open, and n imperceptible cravat."

Trbüner's (London) American and Oriental Literary Record, has the following paragraphs on the question of international copyright:

"To American authors an international copyright arrangement strongly commends itself as a measure calculated to strengthen and consolidate American literature. At present the facilities offered to publishers to reproduce English books, and the attention directed toward them by rival publishers has caused American literature to be to a certain extent overshadowed by its English rival; remove some of this competition, and the field will be left more open for American original works, and publishers will be more and more disposed to negotiate for native literature. The clear stage, which will thus be given, and the wider field opened up to American authors, will tend to improve the character of American literature, cause increased care and attention on the part of authors, and will do away with the slovenly feeling engendered by the idea that the rivalry and competition, to which American authors are subjected, prevents their receiving a fair share of public attention.

"To American publishers it offers these advantages: it gives them, after arrangement with English authors, a secure property in their productions; it opens up a new field of enterprise, for it cannot be denied that numerous English authors will be found disposed to negotiate for the sale of the copyrights to American publishers and allow the first production of their works in America; it will cultivate a friendly feeling between English and American publishers, and encourage joint enterprise in literary matters.

"The American nation will by this measure reap the advantage of an improved tone and character in their literature, a wider diffusion of their national views, and a more thorough appreciation of their literature abroad, for though the best English books are republished in America, it is only an inferior class of American books that are at present reproduced here, and it is by these only that the majority of Englishmen judge of American literature. It cannot be too widely known that in England as well as in America numerous projected literary enterprises fall through because the probable demand from the public of England or the public of America, taken separately, would not justify the enterprise. The two combined, however, would insure success. The old standard writers of England, too—it is the general complaint—cannot now be produced in their entirety, because the demand is so limited that English and American publishers do not see a sufficiently rapid return for their outlay. Combine the two nations in enterprises of this kind, and the result will be a revival of the circulation of the best English classics, and a consequent improvement in national tastes. We think, nay, we are sure, we see a way to this desirable end in a wise International Copyright Act."

Sir Morton Peto has published a book on the "Resources and Prospects of the United States." He regards the strength, constancy, vigor and resources of the country, as displayed in the late war, as beyond all precedent. He looks upon the disappearance of slavery as an unspeakable blessing, and adds:

"All that is now needed to give reality to so vast an empire is that development of intercommunication which I have recommended. When such communications are completed, when the South is effectually united with the North, and when the whole continent is traversed by one great trunk railway, worked as a united whole from the Atlantic to San Francisco, we shall be called upon to regard America as the greatest nation of the world. She will be entitled to take that rank by reason of her extent, her diversity of soil and climate, the character of her communications, the variety of her resources, her vast mineral riches, and the abundant field which she presents for labor and for the employment of capital and enterprise."

Nitro-Glycerin, is from 10 to 100 times more powerful than gunpowder, and is liable to explode from various causes, one of which is, that when sulphuric acid is an ingredient, or when, that being absent, the mixture is placed in tin cases, by the decomposition of whose inner lining, sulphurous products are disengaged, the addition to the mass of a few drops of any essential oil, such as turpentine, will cause a terrible explosion. But the great cause of explosion, and the one which presents an almost insuperable obstacle to the use of this article, is the fact that glycerin absorbs water in large quantities. When not in air-tight cases, it takes this water from the air. The oxygen, which forms half of the water, unites with the nitrous acid, and the result is the formation of a fulminating powder, possessing great force—all compounds of nitrogen and oxygen possessing that quality, and which a slight shock is sufficient to explode. In a moist climate, therefore, where the air contains large quantities of water, the risk from the presence of nitro-glycerin is very great; and in whatever climate it may be, the longer it is kept unused the greater becomes the danger, as it absorbs more and more water.

The old charge about the lack of appreciation of the Fine Arts in America, is receiving constant and emphatic contradiction every year. It is estimated that not less than $200,000 were paid for pictures at public sales in this city during the month of February. In the winters of 1863-64, notwithstanding the war was at its height, the aggregate sales were $605,000. One sale alone produced $114,000, the highest prices paid being $5,000 for a Couture, and $3,550 for a Koek-Koek. During the same season, Leutze received $6,000 for his "Venice Victorious;" Gignoux $6,000 for his "Half-Way up Mount Washington;" Bierstadt $10,000 for two pictures. Mr. Bierstadt has recently sold his "Rocky Mountains" to an English collector (Mr. McHenry), for $25,000, and his "Storm in the Rocky Mountains" to another Englishman (Mr. Kinnaird) for $20,000. After this latter picture had been engaged, the artist was offered $30,000 for it by a New York merchant, but it went to the foreign purchaser. Mr. Huntington subsequently sold his "Republican Court" for $20,000.

TOWN GOSSIP.

For the past week New York has not enjoyed any great sensation, and paterfamilias has sipped his morning Mocha, and glanced at his morning paper, with the comfortable assurance that the world, or at least that portion of it in which he is directly interested, revolves in its usual orbit, and has been put on its good behavior. Moving day has come and gone, with perhaps less than its usual amount of ludicrousness and discomfort. The flurry about high rents and unfeeling landlords has in a measure abated, and tenants have submitted with as good a grace as possible to what they termed extortion, and endeavor to make themselves comfortable in the houses they had previously occupied, or in others to which necessity compelled them to repair. The good people of this city may not believe in the transmigration of souls, but it is evident that they are quite unanimous in their practice of certain other transmigrations, which make one day annually memorable, involving a general breaking up of those little domestic arrangements which add so much to the enjoyment of life. Seriously, this yearly change of quarters, so characteristic of our city, should be discontinued, on account of its baneful influence upon the tone and morals of metropolitan society. People who expect to occupy their dwelling no longer than a few months, do not care to form those social ties and cultivate those friendships which elevate and ennoble both the family and community; they live too much within themselves and for themselves, and seek in questionable ways what ought to spring spontaneously from their own hearts and be found in their own homes.

Those pleasant spring days attract to the streets in large numbers those fair ones, who toil not and spin not; and our avenues are gay with the throngs of promenaders, who gladly escape the dreary confinement of a long winter, and devote the few weeks before the summer campaign at the watering-places to a saunter down Broadway or an airing in the Park, which just now is putting on its new dress, and promises more than ever to be the pride and boast of New York, and a perpetual beauty and joy.

Wall street has been somewhat excited by the disclosure of another stupendous and successful forgery, far more daring and adroit than the almost forgotten Ketchum frauds; the amount of money involved is only the bagatelle of between three and four hundred thousand dollars, but that the shrewd financiers of the Stock Exchange should allow themselves to be repeatedly victimized by rogues, is a tribute to the skill of the rogues, however the financiers may regard the operation.

The energetic and almost despotic measures of the Board of Health inspire the confidence that, should the dreaded cholera visit our city, it may not prove so severe a scourge as on previous occasions. There is nothing like panic, which is always more fatal than disease; and while we can hardly hope to escape entirely, we can mitigate and control the power of the pestilence. There is a general removal of nuisances, low haunts of dissipation are closed, the tenants of cellars transferred to airy and healthful quarters, provision made to bestow proper care and attention upon any cases that may arise, so that we all feel everything is done that can be done to avert the dreaded visitant.

The new excise regulations meet with less opposition than was expected, and when they are in full operation we may look for a decided diminution of vice and crime. Inasmuch as we are not able properly to govern ourselves, it is fortunate that we are to be controlled by powers so generally acceptable as the Commissioners to whom the Legislature has delegated the management of our city; and so long as they give us clean streets, healthful homes, and general order and quiet, we will not be too critical as to the means employed, and to a little overstepping the modesty of the law.

There is very little to chronicle in the theatrical world. Mr. Barney Williams and his wife are the dual attractions at the Winter Garden, being really two head-centres who have no enemies. At the Olympic, the "Three Guardsmen" still rule with undiminished might; but despite their popularity, a new sensational drama is to be produced in a few days. It is rumored that Mr. Wood retires from the management at the close of the season.

The chief interest of the week has centred in Wallack's—where Lester Wallack, the gentleman par excellence of the American stage, has been performing some of his favorite characters to crowded, and we were almost on the point of adding, "affectionate" audiences. It is pleasant, in these too fast and modern days, when parents are considered passé—dead—and buried, the very minute the incipient mustache ruffles the face of that inspired infant, a son of 17—it is pleasantly retributive, we repeat, to be able to say to a son, that in his best efforts he reminds us of his father. We give the author of "Rosedale" credit for being capable of appreciating the compliment we now pay him, that, being an artiste, every year will make him "a wiser and a better" actor. Among the many claims of Mr. Lester Wallack to the public respect, not the least is the gentlemanly repose which presides over his establishment. It is truly the Parlor Theatre, where the best bred and quietest people in the city meet in silent incognito. A sort of suppressed emotion even presides over their most enthusiastic applause.

Miss Bateman's careful rendition of Juliet and Parthenia have filled Niblo's every night, while Barnum presents, as usual, an unrivaled selection of amusements.

At the Broadway, the daring and outré performance of Miss Adah Isaacs Menken, as "Mazeppa," has drawn crowded houses. We must not forget to commend the lessee's common sense and common honesty in abandoning the system of charging extra for booking places. When managers content themselves with filling every seat, they will draw a superior class more frequently to their entertainments.

Those very clever and well-trained girls, the Worrell Sisters, with a tolerable company to support them, have been performing at Wood's Theatre, in "The Elves; or, The Statue Bride."

Brooklyn, once only celebrated for its churches, is fast becoming famous for its gayeties. Robert Heller, who combines more varied accomplishments than any other artiste of the day, has been performing to splendid and fashionable audiences at the Brooklyn Athenæum. A most finished and effective pianist, he is one of the expertest of prestidigitateurs; added to which, his charm of manner gives to every word he utters a peculiar significance. These merits render an evening with him not soon forgotten.

After a very successful season, Conway is about closing his theatre. Mr. Davidge, one of the best comedians on the stage, and who has been Conway's leading card, is about starting on a summer tour, in conjunction with several others.

Apropos, we are glad to notice that the theatrical secessionists have discontinued that absurd standing item in their announcement, which informed the public that they did "not advertise in the New York Herald," which, being translated into plain Saxon, meant, that although the Herald did not advertise them, they advertised the Herald.

Mr. J. S. Thomson has been giving a series of popular concerts at Dodworth Hall, and his efforts have been remunerated by a fair success.

BOOK NOTICES.

"Jargal," by Victor Hugo, is one of the early productions of the eminent French poet, and the volume before us, published by Carleton, is an excellent translation. "Bug-Jargal," which preceded "Hans of Iceland," was written when Victor Hugo was but 16 years of age. It is a novel rendered interesting to the American reader, from its historical references to the revolt of the blacks of San Domingo in 1791.

The American Art Journal has entered upon its fifth volume, and continues to improve. In many respects it is the only periodical published here that is devoted to music in purely an artistic spirit, since the editor and proprietor, Mr. Henry C. Watson, is himself a most charming composer, as well as an accomplished musician and agreeable writer. Belonging to no particular clique, he has no special interest to serve, and hence his criticisms demand a respect seldom deserved by musical critics. The paper contains, in addition to a large mass of musical intelligence, a very pleasant melange of varied reading, selected with great taste and discretion.

Private Miles O'Reilly's "Baked Meats," is another neat volume, just published by Carleton, and a very healthy look of humor there is about it. The Private's "Baked Meats" are of the kind which ever enlist public favor.

F. A. Brady has just published "Fanny Hervey," a work of interest, which recommends itself by its purity of style and the delicate features of its characters. "Fanny Hervey" is catalogued in Brady's first-class novel series.

From Dinsmoore & Co., of Boston, two books have come to our notice: "The Physiology of Marriage" and "Moral Philosophy of Courtship and Marriage," by William A. Alcott, M. D. Both works embody much that will repay the trouble of perusing.

For notice of "Exhibition of the National Academy," see page 139.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Dr. Draper's recent work "On the Future Civil Policy of America" has been translated into German and published at Leipsic. His forthcoming "History of the American Civil War," will be published in America, England, France and Germany simultaneously.

—— The Hon. Henry Barnard, LL.D., an indefatigable advocate of education, and editor of the admirable American Journal of Education, has recently been appointed head of St. John's College, Annapolis, Md.; and the Legislature of the State have appropriated $85,000, to be paid in yearly sums of $15,000, to aid in reorganizing that institution.

—— The Rev. John Kelly, of Jersey City, who recently died quite suddenly at the Church of St. Peter's, where he had ministered so long as to be known far and wide, was a man deserving a more than passing notice. He was born in Ireland, in 1801, but came early in life to America, and pursued his theological studies, if we mistake not, at Mount St. Mary's. While pastor of St. Mary's Church, New York, an appeal was made for Catholic clergymen to establish a mission at Liberia, not only to minister to the colored Catholic emigrants from Maryland and Louisiana, but also to extend Christianity among the barbarous tribes. After a few years he returned in shattered health, the only survivor of the missionaries. He then undertook to erect a church in Jersey City, and collect the scattered members of his faith. He not only succeeded in his attempt, but before his death saw several other churches, schools, asylums and sisterhoods carrying out his plans of educational and beneficent progress. He was a genial, cultivated man, ever ready and generous to the poor, a lover of books and study, and the possessor of a large and well-selected library.

—— It is said that there are about 150 organ-grinders now in New York, who decide each week the musical routes they shall take, in order to avoid any possible interference with each other. But few of these own their own organs; they are generally rented at $2 to $3 per week by a joint stock company, who have made a large fortune by the business. They live economically—their earnings, about $10 or $12 a week, requiring them to do so. They have adopted a peculiar mode of avoiding high rents, for several families occupy one room, undivided by a partition, the bounds of each room being so distinctly understood as to avoid all possibility of trespass on another's section. Gen. Jackson never hated paper-money more than these self-same organ-grinders; they love pennies and silver and gold. In many instances their children have been taught to play the violin and sing in the streets, a calling which brings them $3 a week. Living exclusively on maccaroni, their board costs them but a trifle, and they are accordingly enabled to hoard up riches for old age. Although they carefully avoid burdening themselves with the privilege of citizenship, they give the law but little trouble, an arrest among them taking place about once a year.

—— Work on the lake tunnel at Chicago has been delayed by an accumulation of gas. An unusually large amount recently collected and exploded, the flames extending along the ceiling for over 100 feet. By the explosion several of the miners were knocked down and others slightly burned

—— A gentleman from Alabama has furnished a tabular statement, by counties, showing the number of men belonging to the Union Leagues, which have been organized in that State since the close of the war. The aggregate is 18,000 and upward, of whom it is said two-thirds can take the test oath.

—— Hon. Anson Burlingame, American Minister to China, had a narrow escape from death lately. He was standing within 40 feet of the scene of the recent nitro-glycerin explosion in San Francisco. He has since embarked for China, via the Sandwich Islands and Japan.

—— The Southern Methodist Conference at New Orleans has voted to change the name of the church from "Methodist Episcopal Church" to simply the "Methodist Church."

—— The Treasury Department has received, through the United States Consul at Birmingham, England, $2,500 in gold, which was subscribed by the citizens of that place for the benefit of the freed race of this country.

—— A destructive fire occurred in Detroit, Mich., last week, which destroyed the depot of the Detroit and Milwaukee Railroad, a ferry-boat belonging to the company, and property to the value of $1,000,000. The fire was caused by the bursting of a barrel of kerosene oil, to which flame was communicated from a passing light. An explosion at once followed, by which the burning oil was thrown in all directions, setting on fire other barrels of oil, and extending the flames to the depot and ferry-boat, and at once enveloping them. A number of men at work on the boat lost their lives, in consequence of the panic which ensued. The boat floated out into the stream, communicating flames to several buildings along the docks, but was finally secured and removed to a distance from the shore. The mails in the depot at the time of the fire were destroyed, likewise a considerable quantity of baggage, together with many valuable papers belonging to the company.

—— One day last week a torpedo, which had been sunk for three years and one month in Charleston harbor, exploded off the beach of Sullivan's Island, in about eight fathoms of water. It is supposed to have been exploded by the dragging of a vessel's cable. It lifted an immense volume of water, and presented quite a grand appearance.

—— The Denver (Colorado) News, states that Raphael Grandjean, who has a large plantation in New Mexico, brought a train to that city, consisting in part of six full-grown camels, which were well loaded with wool. These camels have made six trips across the continent, from Fort Stanton to San Diego, California.

—— The cholera is gradually abating on the vessels at quarantine below our harbor. Most of the cases now under treatment will recover, and measures have been taken, which will doubtless confine the disease to the ships on which it originated.

—— The entire left bank of the Mississippi below New Orleans is inundated, an acre and a half of the levee having given way. This district is planted with sugar cane.

—— The Perry Monument on Gibraltar Rock, Lake Erie, the foundation-stone of which was dedicated with imposing ceremonies, in the presence of a vast crowd from the lake cities and towns, on the 10th of September, 1858, and the second stone of which was never laid, is at last to be built. The Sandusky Register says that Mr. Thomas Lawrence, of that city, is engaged in erecting the monument, at the expense of Jay Cooke, who has purchased the island.

—— It is proposed by the Quartermaster-General to establish three national cemeteries in the Department of Georgia, to which will be removed all the bodies of Union soldiers which do not now rest in graveyards or other permanent and decent grounds, viz.: At Atlanta, Andersonville, and either Savannah or Milton. There are supposed to be about 30,000 bodies of Union soldiers in the Department of Georgia.

Foreign.—The "Easter Banquet" at the Mansion House, London, was unusually elegant and animated. The Lord Mayor presided. The Duke of Cambridge represented the Crown and army. Mr. Adams, Minister of the United States, appeared as a most honored guest. The Duke of Cambridge denied that Fenianism had tainted the British army to any great extent.

—— The German question experiences little change. Ministerial notes were freely exchanged between Austria and Prussia, but in the correspondence the future of the Duchies is not mentioned. Austria now appears as the more firm belligerent, insisting that Prussia shall disarm before pacific measures are spoken of. The London Times still holds out the idea of a peaceful issue. The Frankfort money market was very much unsettled. The London Times endorses President Johnson's veto of the Civil Rights bill. The writer asserts that the negro, just emancipated by war, is entirely unfit to exercise the franchise, which the radicals seek to thrust upon him.

—— A singular incident has just taken place at Neufchatel, in Switzerland. At the death of a merchant in that city, on the credit side of his books the name of "God" was found to be inscribed for a considerable sum. No one knew of such a creditor, and on investigation, evidence was obtained that deceased, who was a man of great piety, had opened an account to the Father of All, and entered to it each year a share of his profits. The clergy have claimed the sum, on the ground that they represent God upon earth, while their demand is opposed by the authorities of the canton. The affair will probably be brought before the tribunals.

—— By the recent statistics of the kingdom of Italy, it has been proved that no less than 534,485 of its inhabitants are artists, of whom 407,722 are men, and 126,763 women. In explanation of this immense number, it must be remembered that all trades people whose occupations tend to the adorning and embellishing of either a house or an individual do not scruple to class their trade with this comprehensive title—thus gilders and jewelers call themselves artists.

—— At Salon, a little town in Provence, France, there is a pneumato-electric organ. The electric fluid has no influence either on the intensity, note or pitch of the sound of the instrument. It only replaces a system of complicated levers by one of insulated wires, instantaneous in their action. The current proceeding from the electric battery is conducted by metallic wires under the keys, by the action of which it is placed in communication with the valves of the organ.

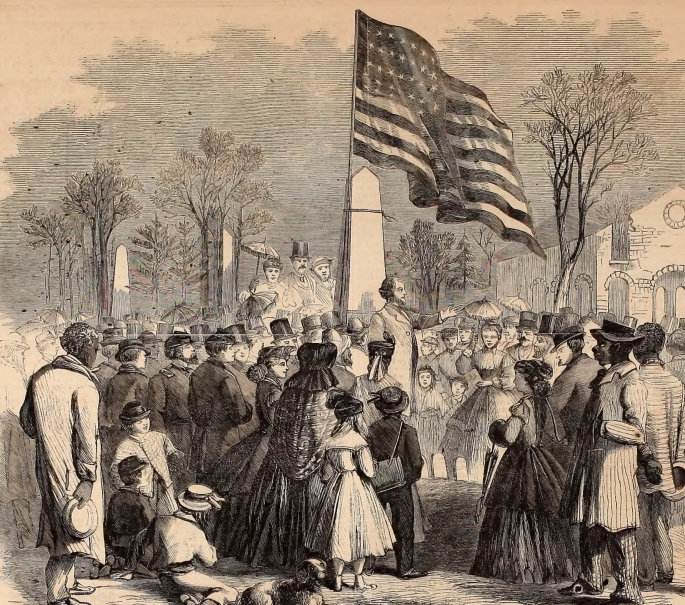
—— On the 16th ult., an abortive attempt was made against the life of the Emperor of Russia. As the Czar was entering his carriage after a promenade in the summer garden, a pistol was fired at him by a stranger, but the shot did not take effect. The intended assassin was immediately arrested and taken before the tribunal of police.

—— The other day a man got entangled in the crinoline of a woman who was walking along Ludgate Hill, London, and was thrown to the ground, and so severely injured that death ensued from effusion of blood on the brain.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON.

The Chief Magistrate of a great and free nation must ever be an object of especial interest, and the American people cannot become too familiar with the character, the antecedents, and even the personal appearance of the men, whom, from time to time, their suffrages place in the highest position attainable to human ambition.

The public is already familiar with the chief incidents in the life of the present occupant of that exalted post, and they need not now be repeated.



Mr. Johnson is, in the strictest sense of the common, but oft misapplied term, a self-made man. He has grappled with difficulty after difficulty, gaining new strength and courage from each struggle, and, in the spirit of Longfellow's Alpine hero, preparing himself, on the attainment of every fresh foothold, for the duties, the responsibilities, and the rewards before him, until, in spite of obstacles that would appall most men, he has achieved honor and greatness, and the respect of a great nation.

As President, Mr. Johnson's record has been a marked and peculiar one. He began his administration under circumstances especially difficult and embarrassing; questions of the gravest importance, and fraught with issues the wisest men could neither foresee nor control have pressed themselves upon him; but he has constantly been actuated by one motive—obedience to the Constitution; and steadily and sincerely pursued one object—the supremacy and restoration of that Constitution in all parts of our country.

Mr. Johnson was born in Raleigh, North Carolina, December 29, 1808. He removed to Tennessee in 1826, and was soon afterward elected to his first office, as Alderman of the village in which he lived. In 1835 he took his seat in the State Legislature, and served in both its branches. In 1843 he was sent to Congress, where he remained ten years. His next position was that of Governor of Tennessee, which office he held two terms, when he was returned to the United States Senate, where he continued until the outbreak of the rebellion. He was appointed Military Governor of Tennessee in 1864, and elected Vice-President of the United States in the same year. By the death of President Lincoln, Mr. Johnson became his successor, and is now our Chief Magistrate.

The likeness of Mr. Johnson on the first page is an accurate and spirited one, from an excellent photograph recently taken. The artist has succeeded admirably in catching the expression, and making the picture life-like and truthful, one that will bear study and scrutiny, and please more highly as it is more closely examined. These portraits of our prominent public men that we give from time to time, if retained, would form an admirable and valuable portfolio for preservation and reference. In addition to marked intrinsic merit, they possess an importance from this fact, and, as their cost is insignificant, every family should possess a collection that, years hence, will be invaluable.

Among the "Free Exhibitions" of indigenous American Art, the first in rank are those which find a place in the windows of Messrs. Ball & Black, jewelers, corner of Broadway and Prince street. The gems of native painting, few and select, may be seen in their palatial establishment. The latest on exhibition, and which attracts the admiration of thronging thousands, is an original, by one of our most promising artists, Granville Perkins, Esq., "Planting Shad Poles in the Lower Bay." It is a characteristic marine view, worthy of the rising fame of the artist.

DEDICATION OF A MONUMENT TO THE FALLEN HEROES OF THE 14TH NEW HAMPSHIRE REGIMENT VOLUNTEERS, AT WINCHESTER, VA., APRIL 10TH, 1866.—[FROM A SKETCH BY JAS. E. TAYLOR.]

DEDICATION OF A MONUMENT

To the Fallen Heroes of the 14th New Hampshire Regiment.

THE Soldiers' Cemetery at Winchester, Virginia, was the scene of an interesting ceremony on the 10th of April last. This was the erection of a monument to the memory of the New Hampshire soldiers who were killed in the battle of Winchester, in 1864. The occasion called together a large crowd of people, who listened, with earnest attention, to an appropriate oration by Col. L. D. Mason, State Agent of New Hampshire, for the care of her dead, and an eloquent discourse by Rev. W. F. Ward.

The monument is a plain marble shaft, with the following epitaph on its eastern face:

"NEW HAMPSHIRE
Erects this Monument to the Memory of her
BRAVE SONS OF HER 14TH REGIMENT,
Who fell in battle,
SEPTEMBER 19TH, 1864,
Upon this field, and are here buried in one common grave."

Thirty-seven bodies are buried beneath this tombstone, and thirteen more are scattered through the cemetery, making in all 50 souls from this one regiment. The arrangements of this ceremony were superintended by Messrs. Wood & Taylor, embalmers, and were so managed as to render the services especially solemn and impressive.

Thus is our country manifesting a just and deserved respect to the memory of those who have fallen in her defence, and we are glad to record the fact that measures have been taken to preserve from desecration the remains of the multitudes that now lie scattered on many battle-fields, until they can be collected and deposited in honored graves.

GENERAL DON J. G. DE LAS HERAS.

GEN. DON JUAN GREGORIO DE LAS HERAS died in Santiago de Chile on the 6th of February last, at the venerable age of 86 years. With him disappears the last representative of that great generation which revolutionized South America. After Bolivar and San Martin, no soldier did South America owe greater services than to General Las Heras.

In 1817 he saved the united army of Chile and La Plata in the disaster of Cancharayada, and prefaced thus the victory of Maipu, which decided the fate of Spanish America in the Southern Hemisphere, as that of Carabobo, its twin in importance and in glory, decided it in the North.

Gen. Las Heras was Commander-in-Chief of the First Auxiliary Expedition which went to Chile in 1813; was the second of San Martin in the liberating campaign of Peru in 1820. In 1826 he was elected President of Buenos Ayres, his native country, and in 1829, he returned to Chile, his adopted country, to live honorably and quietly, and in complete retirement from political discords.

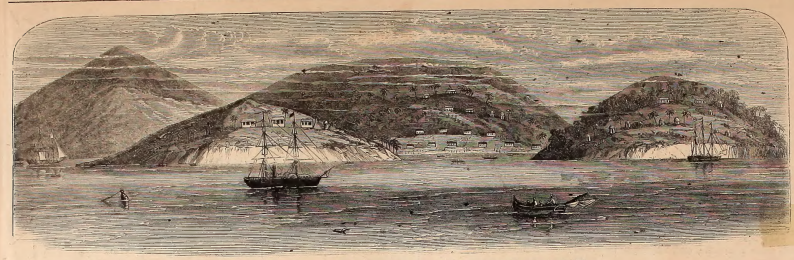
In this way Gen. Las Heras did not belong exclusively to any Southern Republic, and all claimed him as their own glory. For that reason he united the highest military titles of each one of them. He was Grand Marshal in Peru, Division-General in Chile, Brigadier-General in La Plata.

Gen. Las Heras always be onged to the Liberal party. He lived in the spirit of the age; he understood its infinite progress, and tried to follow it in all its paths. It was a touching sight to see how this old soldier occupied himself with that which was new, impulsive and daring. But one thing he seemed to look upon with indifference—the pomp of his own glory—because he saw in it only the effect of the past, and his ambition was to live for the future.

THE LATE GENERAL DON J. G. DE LAS HERAS, CHILE.

REV. JOSEPH RICE, D.D.,

Rector of St. Stephen's Church, New York.



DR. PRICE was born in Boston, and educated at Brown University, Providence, R. I. His degree was from Columbia College, N. Y. He was ordained by Bishop Griswold in 1829. In 1834 he was Assistant to Dr. Hawks, then Rector of St. Thomas's, in this city. He was then Rector of St. Paul's, Albany; and in July, 1837, accepted a unanimous invitation to St. Stephen's, where he is now. His reputation, both as a reader and preacher, has been of the highest character. Till within a few years the church was crowded, but removals from the neighborhood, and the increasing difficulty of the railroad travel, have compelled the vestry to sell the property, and locate up town. Dr. Price has reluctantly consented to the removal, and his former parishioners are prepared to rally around him as in days of yore. Dr. Price is on the shady side of 50, but yet asks no relief from any amount of duty. His elocution is the result of long and close study, but yet has the art to conceal art. He was pronounced by an English traveler the best reader of the church service on either side of the Atlantic, and his preaching powers are hardly inferior. He is very averse to all publicity, and has labored as hard to avoid honors as most men do to obtain them. He has, however, had some forced upon him, by his zealous friends.

He is among the few men who can fearlessly assert his opinions, and yet so charitably, kindly, and with such philosophic coolness, as to give no offense. He has now been Rector nearly one-half of the whole term of the existence of the church. He often unites parties in marriage whom he baptized in their infancy. He has a reasonable prospect of what he has richly earned, a tranquil and honored old age.

ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH.

ONE after another the old church buildings, which have for decades of years past been landmarks in our city, and around which cluster memories and associations of the most sacred and interesting character, are giving way to the demands of our commercial civilization. The New Yorker of to-day who reflects at all on the matters connected with his religious nature, can experience no feeling other than of sorrow when he witnesses the old church—in which he was baptized, where he learned the first truths of Christian doctrine, where he stood before the altar and vowed to "love, cherish, and protect" the then blushing maidens of his affections, now the long-time partner of his joys and sorrows—passing away forever, in order that its site may be devoted to trade and traffic. Where once stood the grand old church, whose history is fairly interwoven with his own, men now ply their business-tact and drive hard bargains one with another.

pose of that edifice, and build in a more aristocratic quarter of the city, a structure that shall be more in keeping with the financial status of the present congregation. This church, which is shown in the illustration, was built and opened for divine service in 1805. Since that period it has undergone many changes and improvements; till now, for a church of its class (for it is unpretending) it is considered quite beautiful.

Among the first worshipers at St. Stephen's, as appears by the family vaults now connected with the church, were many whose names in their day and generation were prominent in both political and social circles, and whose children are now among our most respected citizens. The ministers who have occupied the rectorship of this church are Rev. Mr. Stroebeck, Rev. Dr. Moore, afterward Bishop of Virginia; Rev. Dr. Feltis, Rev. Dr. Anthon, Rev. Dr. Hawks, Rev. Wm. Jackson, and the present incumbent, Rev. Dr. Price.

There is something solemn in the reflection that these old time-honored memorials of past men and past days are going from our vision and our remembrance; but the demands of business are inexorable, while the gradual advance of our population toward the upper portions of the city renders the removal of the churches both expedient and inevitable.

THE MANUFACTURE OF EYES.—A French paper gives some curious details of the manufacture of false eyes in Paris. The average sale per week of eyes intended for the human head amounts to 400. One of the leading "oculariste" receives one to a magnificent saloon, resplendent with gilding and mirrors. His servant has but one eye, and if you want to see the effect of one of the eyes, he wrings the bell and fixes the eye in the wretched servant's head, so that you may judge of the effect it will produce in your own or that of your friend. He charges 40f. to 50f. per eye. For the poor there are second-hand visual organs, which have been worn for a year by some eyeless duke or baron, and exchanged for a new one after 12 months' service. These are then sold to the poorer classes at reduced prices, or sent off to America, India, or the Sandwich Islands, where the colored races are not fastidious as regards the match. One of the Emperor Soloogne's generals heard of these artificial eyes, and wrote in Paris to order one. The oculariste, fluttering himself that a successful one would secure for him one of the Haytien crosses, devoted his utmost intelligence to the production of a chef d'œuvre. Six months elapsed; a small box reached him from Hayti. Across glittered in his imagination, when, lo! to his horror, within the folds of the cotton, lay his original eye, accompanied by the following note: "Sir, the eye you forwarded to me is of a tint that resembles the Spanish flag, and I am too patriotic to wear any but the color of my country." The oculariste proceeded at once to the Admiralty, there ascertained the color of the Haytien flag, and then manufactured a scarlet and green eye, which he forwarded by the earliest opportunity.

THE COUNTRY PARSON'S WIFE.

Who a Parson's wife would be?
From such a fate deliver me;
Careworn, haggard, faded and lean,
Such a poor forlorn woman never was seen!
Poor Parson's wife. Heigho!

She always comes out in the self same gown,
Dust-every youngster knows in the town,
With an old black bonnet she has worn for years,
And a faded old shawl, 'mid mirth or 'mid tears,
Poor Parson's wife. Heigho!

At story society, prayer-meeting, fair,
She is always expected to be the first there—
If some of her children are ailing in bed,
If husband has a sad, aching head—
Poor Parson's wife. Heigho!

Her husband is always sickly and lean,
Choked up in white necktie, spotless and clean,
And all the old maids pity him for her sake,
And think what a good Parson's wife they would make,
Poor Parson's wife. Heigho!

There's always some "brother," with buggy and horse,
There's always some caller, when baby's quite cross—
Some gossiping dames, come in to drink tea,
And peep round the house, "so shiftless," dear me!
Poor Parson's wife. Heigho!

She must know all the scandal, yet silently hear,
She must know all reproofs, nor murmur nor fear
But One whom she serves, at the last shall reward,
And welcome her into the joy of the Lord,
Glad Parson's wife, we know!

CHAPTER IV.—HUSBAND AND WIFE.

"HAS Cyril's death made you so very sad, Ralph, that not even I can comfort you?" said Mrs. Clifford of her husband, as he sat in a small chamber communicating with his dressing-room, and in which he was accustomed to transact his business affairs. He smiled, not sadly, but gratefully, lovingly, in her false face, yet gravely shook his head.

"You always comfort me, dear one. If I were dejected on my own account only, you would soon cheer me. But it is not so, Grace, although many would be sad who knew their doom had been spoken, who felt as I feel"—he laid his hand upon his heart—"that I have had my warning, and must soon go; yet I do not repine for that matter."

"I will not combat your opinion, love," answered she, "fallacious and ill-grounded though I believe it to be: with me, whatever you think is sacred."

"Sweet Grace, how I love you!" returned the old man. It is only for your sake that I regret to go. I have reigned here my allotted time; you gladly would I leave all to my successor, heaven knows, if I might only think he would hold it. Poor Grace, poor Ilse!"

Ralph Clifford bent his head and hid his face. His wife's sun still encircled his neck; her voice was low and soft, and seemed to tremble with love and pity; but her eyes looked down upon him with contemptuous scorn.

"And what is to prevent Rupert from holding his own, husband? Nothing, save a dark legend of your house—a morbid fantasy of your own—a——"

"Did you never read my uncle Roderick's will, Grace?" interrupted Ralph.

"His will?" cried Mrs. Clifford, involuntarily withdrawing her caressing hand. "I never even heard that he had made a will. I did not know that he could have made a will. Is not the land entailed? Father to son, uncle to nephew; has it not ever been so with your ancient race?"

"It has ever been so," returned her husband, gloomily. "Father to son, but never to son's son, since Cyril's time."

"Ay, ay," exclaimed Mrs. Clifford, impatiently; but masking her apprehensions with great effort, she added, in a soothing tone: "Let us not talk of that, Ralph; let us not think of it, if possible." Then, with affected carelessness, she added: "Do wonder dusty parchment at your elbow and said will?"

She reached her hand toward it, but he was beforehand with her, and gently, but firmly, he retained his hold upon it. "Nay, do not open it, Grace, for mere curiosity's sake."

"If he could but have seen her face in its rapacious earnestness—the intense longing of her greedy eyes; if he could but have known what a cost her to restrain the nervous twitching of those taper fingers, he could scarcely have talked of Curiosity!—his Cupidity aghast with Fear.

"I will tell you all that Roderick would have me tell, wife, if he were alive. I hide nothing from you—nothing."

"Nothing, Ralph," returned she, tenderly, her mind straining after the precious parchment like a greyhound in the leash. "If I thought you kept a secret from me, it would kill me."

"Would it so, dear one? Then, since I would have you live, you shall hear my uncle Roderick's will. He herein leaves Cliffe to Arthur his son, and to Cyril after him, for thirty years, and then——"

"But he could not leave it, Ralph. How mean you, then, he left it?"

"He thought he could. He was mad—the second son, and yet mad; think of that, Grace! No lawyer has ever seen this writing; it would count as nothing in his eyes; he would smile at the dead Clifford's ravings, and I do not choose that any man should do that. For thirty years he willed Cliffe to my father and my brother, after which he shall return—so it was—and resume his own again. I have seen his coffin in the chapel vault closed on a mighty pile—like enough dust, and the key is buried with him, that he may arise and let himself out when the time comes. The thirty years will very soon be ended."

"I trust Ralph, that you do not believe——"

"Your son, Grace, your husband, my husband, quietly; "I keep my own wits still, although they are sorely tried. I almost wish it was not so, and that I could deem that Roderick might come to life again. It is worse to think that ice was mad, having no right to be so; and rather than seem wrong—for this one will, I would lose many a fair acre of those which it so strangely devises. It was the mere reading of it which set me scorning. How goes it with you, Ralph, think you, Grace?"

He looks bravely, husband. He will fitly wear your honors after you, though not, I trust, for long, long years to come."

"He has heard the news, I suppose?"

"I told him myself, Ralph, lest some vulgar tongue should wound him with the rough delivery of it; and I charged the household not to speak of it within his hearing."

"You should have charged them not to speak at all," returned her husband, coldly. "Cruel heaven, are the misfortunes of our house to be the talk of grooms?"

"We cannot shun the tongue, Ralph; and since the law forbids to cut it out, as your high-handed race were wont to do when a menial's speech displeased them, the next best way is to direct its course."

"As wise as Ilse!" repeated Ralph, in a low tone. "You have done right, Grace, as you always do."

"Nay, husband, I have only done my best. Little, indeed, is the best I can do, in return for what I have received at your hands. I was low, and you lifted me up; I was lost, and you set me in honor." A shadow flitted over her husband's brow. "Not," she continued, "that I ever think of these things save when I am alone with you, as now. I have left the past behind me altogether. Connected with your race, although by marriage only, I feel that I am one of them."

"That is rightly said, Grace. The Cliffords, like the king, confer nobility itself. Never speak, then, of what was your father's lot, even to me. You are mistress of Cliffe; you will be so after I am gone—that is, until—" Ralph Clifford paused and the frown of thought overtaken by another ere it could break in speech. "And what did Rupert say when you told him of your cyril?"

"He said he was grieved to hear it, but scarcely surprised. He hoped Uncle Cyril would be buried at the Hall, and not in the family vault, which stood there. Then he seemed lost in thought, and answered me at random; but presently, during some trifling interruption—it was the organ in the gallery, played by Mildred Leigh, I think—he brightened up at once. Mildred is a favorite of his, and the companionship of the young. It is but a dull life he leads here, and fit to make a young man sad."

"Raymond is not sad," returned her husband, like one who, to gain time, urges something which he knows but little heed to hear.

"That is true," answered Mrs. Clifford, coldly. "To chase the stag, the fox, the otter, is happiness enough for him. Mildred Leigh is indeed a huntsman born, for any instinct of gentle birth that he possesses. Nay, even a huntsman would have some reverence for the race which he served, whereas Raymond—"

"Well, wife, what of Raymond?"

"Nothing, Ralph—nothing. You are grave enough already, without my saddening you further. And, after all, Raymond is not akin to me. Does he grudge an old man that which renders the last few years of his life less lonely, less drear? Even had we children, I trust that I am a mother in portion; they would not rob him of a silver-piece. Nay, I have left him thrice as much besides. Unnatural, unkindly, indeed, were he!"

"Hush, Ralph—hush. Be calm. Do nothing in anger. Let poor me, at least, be not the means of sowing dissension between father and son; for he is your son, you know, after all. What I was about to say was only this: that knowing how dear to me is the honor of your house, and with what worship I look upon the Cliffords, alien though I be, he scoffs and sneers at what should be held most reverend, at least, by one of their own blood; nay, he says 'blood' is nothing. Why Bone—a dog—is better! He did Blood is so precious, why, then, are old Bones so cheap? But I fear I vex you, husband."

Ralph Clifford's eyes were flashing fire. One hand clung to the table, grasping it like a vice; the other pressed against his heart. His white lips moved as with a spasm twice and thrice before they could shape "Go on."

"There is little more to say, Ralph; I have said already more than I intended. You must please hold this a secret; you must understand it is to me alone he thus speaks out. He flings his gifts about to all, 'tis true, making a mock of necessity; but he keeps his worst for me, because, as I have said, he knows the barb goes home. His aim at me is surest when he strikes through you and yours. For instance—"

"Ay, for instance," gasped Ralph Clifford; "give me that."

"He says 'the Fair Woman,' for whose sake Bertram killed his brother, and whom you yourself——"

Ralph uttered a cry of horror.

"I see her now!" cried he. "Some death is coming, and the Curse is falling! Look—look! There—there!"

"Dear husband, you are pointing to the mirror; you behold only the reflection of myself." She spoke as lightly as she could, but her voice trembled with genuine terror. "Dear Ralph, 'tis I. Do you not know your Grace?"

He shrank from her caress with almost loathing.

"Touch me not!" cried he, repelling her with one hand, while he shaded his eyes with the other. "I cannot bear it; so like—so like! Was it indeed the mirror?"

"Look for yourself," said she, 'and at the original."

She smiled her sunniest smile, and, with her head aslant, shook her fair locks about her in a shower of gold. A doubt underlaid that from that rigid form which, with menacing finger, had just glassed itself before Ralph Clifford's gaze, as Rebe from Mirzpah.

"Fair Grace!" cried he, enraptured, "how beautiful you are; it makes me young to look at you. How could I ever have come you for another, far less for that dread spectre—harbinger of ill! Thrice have I seen it. Was it not thrice, Grace? I can think of nothing but of thee."

"You told me thrice, Ralph, and that it boded death, or worse, to see the fifth day those messengers arrive, telling of Cyril's end. This must be more than chance."

"Ay, more than chance, indeed."

"Yet Raymond says there is no 'Fair Woman' at Cliffe save me—a cruel saying, when we think of what she was."

"Does he dare say that much?" exclaimed Ralph fiercely. "Does he think I am befooled, then?"

"Nay, he knows nothing of what you have seen. How should he, husband, save through me alone?"

"True—true; but he makes light of the legends of our house."

"Makes more than light, sir—makes merry with them, as with a churchyard tale told by a sexton to keep boys from leap-frog on the tombs. I am no more afraid of her by day of them than 'hobgoblin,' 'bogie,' and no more courteous term than 'dope' and 'fool' for those who have cause to know better."

She waited, looking for a storm of wrath, but this time it did not come. Ralph's mind had been working in a direction far away with all her skill, she could not follow. Like some out-mourned grief, which, suddenly finds its long-buried fe ast large, having emerged behind him, underground, by sap, so she stared, foiled, in her husband's quiet face, and listened to his measured tones.

"This may be, as you say, Grace; nay, if you say so, it must be so; but it must be hasty. He was my late wife's favorite son."

"Parents should have no favorites, Ralph. It is expected that is no reason why you should complete his ruin."

"You say well, Grace—parents should have no favorites. Cyril was the one whom work and such ill as undue partiality in father or mother toward any of their offspring."

"Where is the blame in the woman.

"And if, in spite of duty, such a feeling creeps into a father's heart, not only should he not express it, but every effort in his means to make up to the less beloved child for the injury he has involuntarily done him. At times, I fear, upon the contrary, I have been harsh to Raymond, vexed with him, because I am vexed with my own heart on his account. But he is so different from me—from that of all our race."

"Ay, it is indeed."

"And he will be a rough in manner, he has a feeling heart."

"He went a fishing this morning, though his uncle Cyril lay but two days cold," remarked Mrs. Clifford. "I saw him by the Beck's side myself. A feeling heart, forsooth! Nay, even if he has, what matter? Why should that poor excuse be taken for grave derelict of duty, for vice, for disrespect?"

"What would you have me do with Raymond, Grace?" asked her husband, thoughtfully.

"I, Ralph? Nay, it is no concern of mine. It is your great pleasure to pass over faults that are patent to the world, by all means do so; but seeing your solicitude upon poor Rupert's account——"

"Well, Grace?"

"I wonder at your blindness—that is all. Seeing aside the ill effect that Raymond's example might have upon his brother—for he has the strongest will, although he is the younger—it is strange to me you do not mark his assumption, his arrogance. Not only does he show respect for none, but lords it as though he knew he were the heir of all."

"Ah, does he so?" cried Ralph.

"He does not know his brother were already doomed. This very morning, in the library, he dared to twit him with his morbid feelings, his faithful dog, and angered him with hints at what might happen."

"Are you sure, wife?" inquired Ralph Clifford, greatly moved. "How know you this? Beware how you advance this thing, if you have no certain knowledge."

"I am no tale-bearer," returned Mrs. Clifford, haughtily. "I know it myself that so it was. Believe me, it is best that these boys were apart."

"But Rupert would be more dull than ever, Grace."

"Then give him meet and gay companions; set the old hall doors wide, and bid your neighbors come to friends with the heir of Cliffe."

"I cannot do it, Grace—you know I cannot do it; and if I could, there is no neighbor's son that is his equal. They would be flatterers all."

"Then listen, Ralph—I speak this, once for all—the curse will fall, and it is you who will have called it down. Some companionship Rue must have, or he will mope—some one that will cheer him and will sympathize with him—some one with the same tastes, but with a healthier spirit—one he can love, and who will return his love—and, above all, one who will render Cliffe, which is now hateful to him, familiar and beloved, as you have made its frowning walls to me, Ralph, and all beneath the eye of you, his father, who thus need never lose sight of your beloved son, but will be gladdened day by day to see this blessing work."

"And in whom is such a paragon—such a flower of friendship to be found?" asked Ralph Clifford, gloomily.

"Where you have found some comfort, or have told me to, dear husband—in Ilse."

Ralph stared in silence, then—she silent, too—observed:

"But Rue is a mere boy—a child."

"Then let him wait—if you think there is no danger in his waiting. In the meantime, let him engage himself, let the girl reside here—here with me—and her good influence begin at once."

"But her mother, this lone Grace? Who would consent to do it? Would it not arouse suspicion, too—the misfortune of our house being known at all—of the very last one dear? What girl of fitting birth and station would thus be wooed, or rather, would thus woo? You would not have her for a month or so——"

Ralph stopped and stammered.

"You are thinking of me, husband. I am not thinking of myself, but of you and yours. I answer what you are going to say with your own words: 'The Cliffords, like the king, confer nobility itself.' However, it is to me no more of this at present: only think upon it; there may be no occasion for the remedies you seem to think so desperate. There is no hurry for a month or so——"

"A month!" cried Ralph, with agitation.

"Well, a week, then, for two months. But, remember this: once let the mischief go too far, and although your race were twice as ancient as it is, and your revolt-ful ties times as long—an acorn, gentle or simple, pure or frail, would consent to link her fate with that of Rupert Clifford."

He will listen, if, I," groaned the master of Cliffe. "Leave me now, Grace; I cannot bear even your sweet company."

She stooped, meeting with her lips his stern, unconscious brow, and left the chamber without a word; but on the other side of the closed door she paused, and, with upraised to her forehead face, reflected in the dark and polished oak: "The doting fool is mine; I have thus sown the seed of much, and it will grow!"

CHAPTER V.—MR. CLEMENT CARR DINES WITH THE RAMBLE.

It has been well said with respect to early rising, that the morning song and the evening song of most human creatures are very different; persons of being up with the lark, of seeing the sun rise, of having a bathe in the river before breakfast, being often in a state overcharged with an enthusiasm in strange contrast with the loathing with which they are fulfilled. We draw the bill with the utmost readiness even in the hour of the morning so far away; but in the dark dawn of acceptance and liquidation, how we curse our former facility for autograph-writing! Similar, although in inverse proportion, are the alternations of the human mind before and after food. No man, save a fire-eater, can fight well fasting; and even on a plentiful repast, if a man is afraid of anything, it is the cook's flattery to call him courage.

Thus, Mr. Clement Carr, whose conduct on his arrival at Cliffe Hall before breakfast we have seen to have been somewhat pusillanimous, on breakfast, in a condition to bid defiance to the powers of at least the supernatural. He had consented to have been left to himself in the morning, kickshaws as trout and marmalade; while in place of tea, he had imbibed the whole of a flagon of old ale, as well as a large glass of brandy "to top up with," which is termed by would-be dyspeptic persons "a constable:" and he wanted to know about the ghost. He was now putting that in the housekeeper's room, and why the devil he had not been asked to breakfast with the family, and how the devil it is that he is to train dirt Mr. William Carter endeavor to persuade him that no personal slight had been intentionally put upon him; that it was not the conduct of the host, nor, at all events, of Cliffe, for the gentlefolk to take their morning meal together, and that the master of the house had broke his fast some hours, and even dined alone.

"I shall dine in his dining-room, however," he concluded Mr. Clement, with resolution. "I am not going to be fobbed off with accommodation of this sort twice; not going to be sat down at the same table again with a scarecrow like you. Fire and furies! am I not own brother to the mistress of the house, and uncle to wash-her-name, the other young woman? O cob, I dine with the family!"

When Mr. Gideon is here, he does not do so," suggested Clarke.

"Well, and what then? Hoosh Gideon? I suppose I can do as I think proper? Ain't I a—" Here Mr. Clement Carr had to contend with these sworn foes of all eloquence, and especially of the eloquence of indignation, called hiccups. "Ain't I a—Trout and marmalade always give them me; it's most astronery; nothing but brandy stops them. Wash was I going to say? Ain't I a gentleman bred? Wash the dush do you mean by my sleeping at the village inn? Don't interrupt, sir. O cob, there's no village inn. I shall sheep in the lesh room in this houssh."

"That's the Blue Room, where the ghost is, Mr. Clement."

"Who kairsh for the ghost? I shall shleep in the besh room, whether it's blue, or green, or yellow, or whatever colorish it is."

"Well, I dare say Miss Grace herself, as was, will be here presently," observed Mr. William Cator; "you had better tackle her about it; it's no use bragging to me."

Accordingly, when the mistress of Cliffe did pay the housekeeper's room a visit, not, however, until the morning had so far advanced that Mr. Clement Carr had seen fit to refresh himself with a second meal, and had thereby kept up his courage, he at once "tackled" that lady upon the lack of personal respect that had been paid to him, Clement Carr, Esquire."

"I am sure I am very sorry, brother," returned she, gravely; "you have had enough, however, I trust, to eat. I need not ask as to your drinking."

"What can one do but drinkish?" inquired her relative, in a tone half apologetic, half defiant, "shut up with a serving-man without any conversationish?"

"What does he want, Cator?" inquired Mrs. Clifford, contemptuously.

"He wants to dine in the dining-room, and sleep in the Blue Chamber, ma'am."

"Besh room in the housh," muttered Mr. Clement.

"You are very easily satisfied, brother; and so it shall be; only, before you dine, you must get sober. The young gentlemen of this family do not drink to excess, and what is more, there will be a young lady at table."

"Only Mildred Leigh, I supposh."

"Only Mildred Leigh, sir! May I ask by what right you take upon yourself to speak in that manner of a gentlewoman whom you have never even seen? If this is a specimen of your best manners, you are not fit for the dining-room of Cliffe Hall."

"But is she not my own neesh, Grace?"

"A misfortune of birth, sir, should not expose any person to rudeness. If you are determined to play the gentleman to-day, see you do not forget your part. Dine with us, sir, and welcome; but keep you away in the meantime from the ale-flagon and the brandy-flask, for—mark me—it would be better for you to drown yourself this day in yonder moat, than to disgrace me and mine at the table of the Cliffords!"

With this unceremonious and conditional invitation to dinner, Mr. Clement Carr was fain to put up, although, when he had obtained it, he did not feel by any means comfortable. The social distinctions after which we strain and strive, with a devotion that would win us heaven, if an attempt were directed to that end, are often very disappointing: placed among the gold fish in a sphere far removed from our own, we do not feel at ease; they are only common carp like ourselves, it is true, but we are conscious of the absence of the auriferous scales from our own backs. They are not lively fish, these gold ones, but their dull, steady stare is extremely disconcerting; and if it were not for the after-pleasures of boasting of our experiences in the crystal bowl, we should generally wish ourselves back in our native pond. The fox who observed that the grapes that hung out of the reach of his moderate exertions were sour, made a very just remark, and one which, in my opinion, by no means deserves the ridicule it has universally met with.

Mr. Clement Carr made every attempt of which he was capable to persuade the dinner-party at Cliffe that he was born with the auriferous scales, but therein signally failed, for he had not a characteristic in common with gold-fish, except their stupidity. He had determined to establish his character as one of the family by kissing his niece, upon his introduction to Miss Mildred Leigh in the drawing-room; but that young lady met him with so dignified and elaborate a courtesy, that he dared not venture upon such an act of violence. Mr. Rupert Clifford gave him his hand, and uttered a few words of polite welcome in his character of host; but Mr. Raymond drew himself up, and bowed, with no more evidence in that cold and stately curve of a desire to shake hands than is exhibited by the crescent moon. Dinner à la Russe was at that time unknown, but for frigidity and silence the meal might have been served upon a steppe of Tartary.

At first, Mr. Clement racked his brains for a topic of conversation, but finding nothing but a dissertation upon the treatment of the insane, which it fortunately struck him would be inopportune, he confined himself to asking everybody, one after another, to take wine; a ceremony which in each case froze him to the marrow. From a scarcity of cutlery, or some other sufficient cause, it was the custom at the Dene to retain one's knife and fork throughout the repast, and Clement stuck to his upon the present occasion, notwithstanding the reiterated efforts of the servants to remove them, with the tenacity of an ensign defending his colors. Upon the other hand, being unaccustomed to a napkin, and imagining it to be the property of the attendant, he pressed it upon his acceptance whenever he came near him; finally, on becoming conscious of both errors, he essayed the first few notes of a whistle, which elsewhere had often stood him in good stead in moments of embarrassment, but catching his sister's basilisk glance fixed sternly upon him, the tune quavered into silence, and he broke out into a profuse perspiration.

With much greater equanimity, as she had already hinted, could Mrs. Clifford have borne to see her brother taken out dead and dripping by the heels from the castle-moat, than thus misbehave himself. She dreaded to leave him alone with those young gentlemen (one of them, too, her sworn foe) when his tongue should be loosened by wine; and yet she could scarcely suffer him to leave with the ladies, as though he were a little boy. Nor, indeed, would he have obeyed her. He looked for the departure of the hostess and her niece as the period when he should begin to recompense himself for past restraint, as a gentleman attached to strong liquors, who has taken the temperance pledge for a limited time, regards the date of his enfranchisement. Nor, when the opportunity arrived, did Mr. Clement Carr throw away his chance. Bumper after bumper, bottle after bottle did he drink, and still did his youthful host and Mr. Raymond keep him company, as in duty bound. He had now not the slightest difficulty in selecting a topic of conversation, nor in illustrating the same when found, with much inappropriate grimace and gesticulation. He had really some talent for imitating the lower animals, and by the exercise of this accomplishment, he transformed the stately dining-chamber of Cliffe Hall into a dog-kennel, a nursery for kittens, and a sty tenanted by a sow with a young family. Later in the evening he arose and caught an imaginary bumble-bee in the red damask curtains, and pursued a fictitious mouse upon all-fours, till it found shelter under the sideboard. Never did performer, bent upon making himself agreeable, exhibit before so undemonstrative an audience. Mr. Rupert smiled, but it was with polite amazement. Mr. Raymond smiled, but it was with something like gratified revenge. Yet there was a reason common to both, though unconfessed by either, which made them regret that their guest's vulgarity was of so very pronounced a type: and it was this same reason which caused the young men to look at one another with their eyebrows raised, when Mr. Clement Carr expressed his opinion (somewhat tardily) that he had had enough of liquor, and that it was time to join the ladies.

"I think it is too late," observed Rupert, quietly, "to rejoin the ladies to-night; indeed, they have probably left the drawing-room."

"Stuff a nonshensh!" returned Mr. Carr; "musht 'av a song. I musht get a song out of Mish Mildred—shmack her shouldersh elsh!"

"What!" exclaimed the brothers, starting up with a single impulse, and regarding their guest with flashing eyes.

"My neesh," exclaimed Mr. Carr, apologetically, "my own neesh, you know. Now which of you young vaga—that is, young gentlemen—are sweet upon her? You, Mr. Rupert, ish it? or ish it you, Mr. Raymond? Ha, ha! I've foundsh you out. Leave me alone for seeing into a——"

"Sir," interrupted Rupert, with dignity, "these remarks are most offensive, and must not be repeated. You are not in a fit state to enter a drawing-room."

"Whash a matter with me?" inquired Mr. Carr, with virtuous warmth.

"You are drunk," observed Raymond, impetuously. "Do not venture to utter that lady's—any lady's name again within my hearing."

"Hoity-toity!" replied the guest; "so it's you who are her sweetheart, is it? Shly dog!"

"What my brother has said," observed Rupert, hastily, "is what I feel myself, and what every gentleman must feel." He laid a stress upon the word, such as could not escape the observation even of one less sober than the person he addressed.

"Take you care, Rupert Clifford," answered Clement, stung for the nonce into sober rage. "I have clipped the wings of as fierce bantams as you; you may come some day into my—"

"Your what?" asked a womanish voice, low and clear as the song of a snake-charmer. "What folly is this you talk, Clement? I am afraid you have been setting these young gentlemen but a bad example. How late you sit over your wine. Mildred has retired to her room, and I should have done likewise, had I not been attracted on my way by what sounded almost like a broil."

"There was no broil, madam," observed Raymond, haughtily; "there was only Mr. Clement Carr."

"Whash a matter now?" inquired the latter gentleman, awakened by the mention of his name from a slumber (induced by his sister's harangue) of the probable duration of two seconds, but which had left his mind a blank as to all past transactions. "Whash a matter, Grace?"

"Follow me, sir, and I will show you your room," observed Mrs. Clifford, icily; "it is the Blue Room, is it not?"

"The besh room in the housh," returned Clement, triumphantly, "whatever colorish it is."

She led him up the grand old staircase, ample enough for a hearse-and-four to pass its fellow—along the picture-gallery, silent, but all eyes, and through an echoing passage, where, from out the dim obscure, four footfalls seemed to come forth to meet their own.

"What a long way to come to bed!" observed Clement, greatly sobered by their cold and lonely travel, as well as by certain apprehensions which were gradually making themselves apparent, pushing their heads up like coral-islands above the ocean of wine which he had swallowed. "And whash my room got three doors for?" Mr. Carr was in a condition when objects are apt to multiply themselves to human vision, but he had not seen treble; there really were three doors to his room, although, when he had previously visited it, to make his toilet before dining with the family, he had not observed them. "Whash the baize-door for?"

"To shut out sound," returned the lady of Cliffe, in the same sort of tone that the wolf used when he made the opposite remark to Red Riding-hood—"The better to hear with, my dear. You should not object to that, brother. There are a good many baize-doors at the Dene."

If the object of this observation was to console, it certainly failed in its effect. With terror-stricken visage, Clement watched his sister light the huge wax-candles upon the dressing-table, and likewise those upon the lofty mantel-piece, until, what with that stately lustre and the huge wood-fire upon the hearth, the whole apartment looked designed for some dead Clifford to lie in state in.

"Where do you and your husband sleep, Grace?" inquired he, retaining the cold white hand, which would have bidden him adieu, within his own.

"In the east wing, at the other end of the castle."

"Oh, indeed; and by-the-by, if I should be ill in the night—I don't feel very well now—and should want Cator, where does he sleep, Grace?"

"I cannot tell, Clement; but probably over the stable with the grooms. You would be lodged in the best bedroom, you know, so you must put up with its little disadvantages. The great folks who have slept here have always had their own attendants about them in the ante-room yonder and in the page's chamber. There is not even a bell except the alarm bell"—she pointed to a massive silken cord hanging through a round hole in the ceiling, close to the bed-head—"which, should you ring, it will arouse half Craven. Yet even that did not save Sir Thomas. He was found lying stark and stiff here, stabbed to the heart, with his hand outstretched in vain for yonder rope, though ten score of men-at-arms would have answered his summons. Good-night, brother!"

She spoke in a harsh and grating voice, but Clement was very loth to lose the sound of it. He accompanied her through the triple door with officious courtesy.

"I suppose I shall be called in time, Grace?"

"Yes, you will be called—soon enough, doubtless. You had better not come with me any further, or you will lose your way back to your chamber."

She waved her hand, and left him with a firm, unfaltering step, which evoked its answering footfall from the other end of the passage—that nearest to the Blue Chamber—as before.

"Good-night!" cried he, his teeth chattering with fear, as he listened with positive anxiety to hear once more her familiar accents.

"Good-night," answered she, sardonically, as she opened the great door which led into the picture-gallery—"Good-night, and pleasant dreams." The quilted door shut behind her with little noise, but her words were repeated by the mocking echoes quite close, as it seemed, to his own ears—"Good-night, and pleasant dreams."

THE BARBACOAS MINES.

EVERY arrival from the Isthmus of Panama brings us further news touching the development of a very remarkable mineral district, which is thought by those familiar with the country to vie in richness with the modern El Dorados of California and Australia. This district lies between the Isthmus of Panama and the Equator, hemmed in on the one side by the mountain range generally known to us as the Andes, and washed on the other by the Pacific Ocean; this region is called by the natives Choco, and is as little known to the outside world as the country which Dr. Livingstone and Capt. Speke have recently had so much difficulty in penetrating; but, unlike that country, it is rich in all that tempts human avarice, its vegetable productions being the most valuable known to commerce, while its mineral wealth seems as great, as its placers are vast in extent, and its emeralds and pearls have no peers in the realm of precious stones.

Choco is penetrated by vast and magnificent rivers, capable of bearing large ships on their bosom, and the Atrato and San Juan vie with the Ohio and Mississippi in length and commercial importance, while the Patia, Mira and Telembi, though they have not the length, are equally important for commercial purposes.

These rivers all take their rise in the Antioquian range of mountains, a very lofty and important spur of the Andes, and drain a huge basin of alluvial land between the Antioquian and Coast range. This basin appears to have served as the deposit for the mineral riches swept down by constantly occurring inundations, which transform every mountain gulch into an impetuous torrent, bearing with it tuns of soil and rock which the action of time and the atmosphere had crumbled into dust, and all of which, being seemingly auriferous, have permeated these river banks and bottom lands from their source to their very mouth; indeed, it is almost impossible to select any point and subject a panful of soil to even a superficial analysis, without finding strong traces of gold; and the investigations of the writer of this article led him to believe that there are but few points on the Patia, Mira or Telembi, where gold-washing, systematically carried on by experts, would not prove unprecedentedly rich.

The town of Barbacoa, which has lent a name to these places, is situated in the southern part of Choco, and is the place of deposit for the rich mercantile productions of the district, of which the cities of Pasto and Tuqueres are the chief towns; here all the Peruvian bark, hides, tobacco and rubber are sent for shipment, by canoe, to the coast, and it is also the centre of a very rich mining district, whose inhabitants, principally emancipated negroes, know no other occupation than gold-washing. This gold is found near the surface, and is washed out in the rudest and most primitive way, the use of quicksilver being unknown, or deemed superfluous. The gold is of the finest quality, averaging 23 carats, and is largely mixed with platina, which metal, until a few years ago, was thrown away as dross.

Barbacoas and the gold placers contiguous are approached from the sea by canoes, forced up against the currents of the rivers Patia, Mira and Telembi; and the traveler wastes, by this wretched mode of conveyance, according to the state of the river, from 5 to 10 days, exposed to furious rains and clouds of musquitoes, while from the small place allotted to passengers, he is obliged, almost invariably, to be in a recumbent position. This, however, will be soon remedied by American enterprise, and commodious steamboats will shortly navigate these deep though turbid streams.

This district of country can be approached from Panama by a steamer leaving that point once every month, and touching at the ports of Buenaventura and Tumaco, from either of which points ready access may be gained to the gold placers by bungos, which being chartered there, proceed a few miles up or down the coast, and then strike into one of the many mouths of the afore-named rivers. The town of Buenaventura, of which a sketch accompanies this, is a place of very considerable commercial importance, being the outlet for the productions of all of Northern Choco, and is situated at the mouth of the River Dagua, which, flowing through a break in the Cordillera, is but a succession of frightful rapids; nevertheless, down this miniature Niagara millions of dollars worth of property are yearly carried in canoes, so small that the unfortunate passenger scarcely dares breathe as it shoots past the dangerous falls; but there is really little danger, such is the dexterity of the negroes who manage them, the one with nervous arm guiding with his paddle in the stern, while, standing erect in the bow, one foot firmly planted on the gunwale and the other on the thwart, the other, with eye intent, poises his long pole, ready, by dexterous touch, to swerve the frail boat from impending danger. In ascending this stream, the boatmen, wading waist, and frequently neck-deep, shove their canoes against the raging torrent.

Between Buenaventura and Tumaco, there are two small ports, supported entirely by gold-washing—Iscuande and Guapi—and which afford easy access to the placers; but their entrance is difficult and dangerous, on account of a heavy surf.

Tumaco, on the contrary—a sketch of whose harbor we offer—is always approachable by steamer, and the last starting-point for the mines, and is a lovely spot. It is built on an islet, about a mile around, and embowered in fruit trees, and it is only by seeing here and there a house peeping through the foliage, that one lying in the harbor realizes that a town of 1,500 people lies nestling within a few hundred yards of him.

The trees are all fruit-bearing, and the green and ripe fruit often may be seen side by side with the blossom, while magnificent flowers light up the dense shade like sylvan chandeliers.

Although it rains, as the natives say, 366 days in the year, yet, as the soil is sandy, and covered with a light turf, it is never too moist or muddy.

The houses are built like Indian bungalows, the inhabited part being on the second story, windowless, with no other furniture than hammocks, which answer the purpose of chair and couch.

From Tumaco—there being a large trade with the interior—access may be daily had with the mines; the conveyance, a bungo; time, from a week to a fortnight, and 20 miles of sea navigation at that!

From many explorers and surveys of this district, the writer is confident that even the most exaggerated accounts of its mineral wealth are founded on facts; but he is in duty bound to say that the climate is execrable, and where great care is not taken, it is apt to be deadly; and he would earnestly recommend any emigrant whose attention may be directed to this article before going, to provide himself with flannels to be worn next to the person, and never taken off, and with white India-rubber coat and blanket, and above all, to abstain as much as possible from water unmixed with spirit, and to keep both head and feet dry and warm.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE Universal Exposition Building in Paris.

THE "Champ de Mars," Paris, upon which the immense palace for the Universal Exhibition of 1867 is being erected, presents, at this moment, an aspect which it is impossible to describe. Without a sketch, one cannot form a precise idea of the works now being erected on this vast plain. From week to week the physiognomy of the building, unique in the annals of architecture, assume such dissimilar effect, that they are rendered completely unrecognizable.

We will not allude to the appearance of the palace of the Exhibition when completed. The ground upon which the army of Paris has frequently stood on parade, and displayed its columns of 50,000 to 60,000 men, is now furrowed with deep ditches and trenches, which remind one of a stronghold in time of war. The puffing of the steam-engines, the loud grating and gnashing of the stampers, the vehicles crossing in all directions, the calls of the workmen, the heavy sound of the unloading and reloading carts, the trowels of the stone-masons chinking upon the bricks, all this noisy bustle gives an incomparable idea of the power and genius of man.

The foundations of the colossal palace on which upward of 1,500 workmen are engaged, are just now on a level with the surface line, and the labyrinth of vaults and bases of pillars destined to support the building, will extend over 32 acres of ground.

On the 5th of March last, the cubic measurement of stone blocks and concrete used, amounted to about 80,000 cubic feet, and by this time the foundations are doubtless completed.

The vaults of the lower part of the palace are progressing without interruption. The vaults of the great ventilating gallery have already attained a length of 690 feet. As regards the transverse vaults, of 18 feet wide, they are completed upon a length of 330 feet. Among the works already accomplished, should also be mentioned 350 pillars standing erect, 9,900 feet of aqueduct, and 600 feet of gathering sewers.

At the factories appointed to contribute to the erecting of the Palace of Industry, the greatest activity also prevails. Several have anticipated the period of installation, and thousands of tuns of iron are awaiting transportation. The washing of the metallic stock to be used in the building, began on the 15th of April.

LITTLE HARRY IS DEAD.

BY MISS E. V. ROBERTS.

Just when bird, and bee, and blossom, with innocent joy are rife,
Just when all bright young creatures when anew to life,
Just when the green earth rejoices,
With its thousand gladsome voices,
In wintry death hath fled,
On this sunny April morning—little Harry is dead.

Oh, the strange and mournful silence! Oh, the gloom on our dwelling cast!
Of gleeful play and laughter we have seen and heard the last.
The sunlight never more will beam,
Glinting in merry, joyful prism,
In the golden curls of his head,
Nor the sweet lips offer their innocent kiss—little Harry is dead.

But the heavenly benedictions that with little children dwell,
Are lingering around us still; for a holy, peaceful spell
Is mingled with the bitterness
And the agony of wild distress,
For all our hopes fled—
The fond, fond hopes that centred in little Harry—dead.

"Be meek as the little children," were words from lips divine;
"And ye shall with these simple-hearted ones in my Father's kingdom shine;"
Perhaps we needed in grief to learn
How the holy precept to discern,
And the lowly path to tread,
And our Father sent to teach us our little Harry—dead.

What have we left to comfort us, and tell of our darling gone?
A little grave, in a sunny nook, where there was not one before,
For the daisies and the clover blooms to come slowly creeping o'er—
A little jewel set in a hillock face,
Unchanging and calm in its childish grace,
In the home whence he hath sped,
Is all that is left for our craving hearts of little Harry—dead.

CHAPTER LXXVI.—BLUID IS BLUID.

It was Sunday morning, and Mrs. Anne Milton sat at one of the bedroom windows at the "Magrel," watching the people going by to church.

Her godly daughter lay on the bed, staring with great, vacant eyes at the quaint little open window, with the pigeons flapping past it, and listening drearily to the bells.

Mrs. Milton had her Bible before her, and now and then read a passage from it aloud. Sometimes she would look up, with both her hands to her head, trying to give all her attention to it, and sometimes would toss up her thin arms, and moan:

"Oh, hush—hush—hush!"

After such a cry, the old lady would gaze out into the street with a stern and terrible look. And, indeed, her charge was growing a very serious and perplexing one. It had come upon her thus:

Phillis, after going through, with a sort of death-in-life apathy, all that Clarissa had demanded of her, had broken down suddenly—fearfully.

In order to go through with what she felt her solemn duty to Clarissa and the man he had so injured, she had bent every thought and every nerve to that end, and now, when it was all over, and she was free to think of herself and her poor, ruined life, her reason had once more nearly deserted her. She could not endure the sight of Clarissa's face or the sound of her voice, for each time she saw the one or heard the other, came the vision of some terrible scene of the last few days, and made her shriek and writhe with agony. She clung to her godmother, whose not unkind tyranny she had been used to as a child. From her she took food, and childings, and scraps of bitter comfort, almost patiently. Bitter comfort indeed! for Anne Milton was a righteous woman, who thought and said hard things of Phillis herself.

Clarissa, Phillis knew, would have been all tenderness, and would have poured him out on her bosom, and soothed her godmother supine to lean the poison out with caustic, and to heal with salt; and the poor girl had a homely, touching faith in the caustic and the salt, and accepted it shuddering but unresisting.

Clarissa had written at Phillis's request, and before the trial, to her father, the Cumberland shepherd, and only yesterday had received an answer dictated by himself and written by the parish schoolmaster—a few stern, respectful words, requesting her, as she called herself a friend of his daughter's, to tell her that she must never cross the threshold of his door again. There came one, also, to Anne—devote the encl osed twenty pounds (his savings of almost as many years) to her use, and tell her his purse, such as it was, should be always open to her—Milton, which she did not hesitate to show to Phillis. It was written by himself, and was harsher and more emphatic than the other, and contained some stinging, bitter words of blame for Anne Milton herself for giving Phillis the opportunities at his house of pursuance of practicing the fine lady, and said he knew now where the money came from, and he hoped they were not ill-gotten gains that had brought.

Phillis bore the blow meekly—indeed, she had all along expected it.

If anything, the letter did her some good. It turned her thoughts homeward, and filled her heart with a healthful and natural grief. All that Sunday morning she lay recalling sweet home pictures, and crying quietly at the thought of her babes-in-arms.

Her godmother was, in truth, almost more unhappy than herself, being utterly at a loss to know in what manner her duty lay with regard to Phillis. But she had a notion it was wicked to think and to plan on a Sunday, and so stuck bravely to her Bible, trusting to find light, sooner or later, in its pages. She relieved herself occasionally by hurling at Phillis any passages of Scripture that had a denunciatory ring in them, and the poor girl would either listen quietly and say as she ceased, "That's right, godmother;" or, she would knock home too nearly, would bury her face in the pillow, or moan out entreatingly, "Oh, hush—hush—hush!"

She lay, with her father's cruel letter on her breast, all church-time; and the summer morning seemed a year. But at noon, when the first noisy hurry of feet was heard on the street-stones again, and the knocking at doors began, and the smell of dinners going home from the bakers' ovens was on the hot air over the stocks and musks at the window.

Their own dinner was sent up, and Phillis cried out, piteously:

"Oh, godmother, I cannot eat!"

But her godmother made her eat a plate of rice, standing over her and feeding her; and she swallowed it somehow, and a tear with every grain.

Then began the long afternoon—with the prospect of lying there watching that stern old face over the Bible, and the light breeze coming in at the fly-darkened blind flapping in heat, and the smell of tobacco from the benches below, and the lazy hum of talking and cooing of pigeons.

"Oh, godmother, I wish I might die—I wish I might die!" she said.

Then her godmother began to scold her, and then to read to her, and with the familiar voice a blessed drowsiness at last stole over her, and she slept.

Anne Milton laid down her glasses, and looked at her as she slept with her hands clasped behind her head, and the tears standing in the folds of her closed eyes; and lifted her sprom to her own eyes as the thought came to her that the poor soul, by the look of her, would never wake for prayer granted.

She leaned back in her chair, and must assuredly have dozed for some minutes herself, and have dreamed of her own home, for when she opened her eyes she could still almost hear and smell the familiar noise and scent mingling with the hum below the window, the cooing of the pigeons, and the cackling of the hens.

She rubbed her eyes, and erected herself, and took a pinch of snuff.

Phillis was in the same voice, she was sure now, speaking on the stairs—a heavy footstep accompanying. Then she put down her snuff-box with a shaking hand, and rose to her feet as the door stood a gray-bearded, wild-eyed, rough-clad man. She gave a cry of joy under her breath, then sank exhausted with sudden alarm, and caught his hands, and said:

"David, David! mind, man, mind, or you'll kill her!"

With tremulous, joyful tugs, pushes, and whispered ejaculations of thankfulness, she dragged him into the room, and shut the door behind him with his grizzled head bent down, so that the sleeper might not see him immediately she woke.

But the sleeper was not lost in him, for the noise had disturbed her, and when Mrs. Milton looked at her, her eyes were open.

"Godmother," she cried.

"Phillis, lass!"

And to him her agitation, she went and sat down at the bedside, and kissed her. The girl seemed surprised and grateful.

"Oh, godmother, I was going to sleep while you were reading, godmother."

"There, tut, tut! never mind," answered Mrs. Milton, yielding stiffly to the embrace of the slim arms.

"I've had such a pleasant bit of sleep," said Phillis, looking round at the room with a sigh; "and I dreamed about home, and that lambing season that was so warm, and turned to frost in a night, and—and—and—I remember!"

"Yes, yes, I remember. Why, how rough you've got your hair; you're not fit to be seen."

"Oh, godmother, I dreamed about the birthday that came then. I was six years old, you know, and you brought the little red shoes, and I wore them. And don't you remember the sheep that let me ride on her back, and how I rode down the hill and through the beck? And how mother was fast, and I made her so fine, with daisy reins? And oft we went; her little lamb, tricked out with daisies, too, skipping at the side of us, and jumping up at us quite jealous o' me. No, don't mind me crying, godmother, dear; it's not wicked sort of crying."

Wicked or not, the sound of it made the grizzled head that listened sink lower and lower, and sway from side to side in the great rough hands.

"And I remember so well, dear godmother, how I broke into the thick of the lambing at the bottom of the field, and father came through the gate, and the schoolmaster pointed to my lamb, and says: 'Is this the pet o' the fold?' and father laid his hand on my head, and says: 'Nay, schoolmaster, this is—this is the poor man's ane ewe lamb.' And—oh! oh!" burst out the sweet voice, jarred with anguish, "to think that now he says, his ewe lamb's away, godmother, to die in strange fields!—to die in strange fields!"

The grizzled head rises and comes to the bedside, the horny hands are on the fair, wasted arms, gripping them tight, and drawing them round the bending neck.

"Ay, lassie, I should has cast you away; but I shall in future, I shall, lassie, bluid is bluid! Come hame! come hame!"

CHAPTER LXXVII.—KITTY'S COMPROMISE.

The grand day on which was to have been celebrated Mr. and Mrs. Sleuth's twentieth wedding anniversary, and which had been made such a day of trouble through Anthony Maude's arrest, was, in the meantime, hurried over, not sacrificed, but only put off to be kept at a happier period. The importance of the promised festivity was increased by several circumstances, which, instead of being celebrated when they came to pass, were, by family consent, carried on to the account of that day.

This gathering-clerk lay heavy on poor Harris's shoulders during the trial, and kept on increasing and still increasing, as, with the failure of Anthony's counsel to get a verdict, or paying it grew less and less; and on the day when the trial ended, and Harris had come home with the awful sentence resounding in his ears, the children, seeing him lay his head down on the table, and push the little majestic bowl of punch to the far end, with real significance, for they felt their debtor was bankrupt, and each tried to swallow his or her share of the beverage before they knew might, touching with sympathizing hands the chair on which he sat, and the table on which he hid his face from them.

But when the news of Sleuth's confession and Anthony's pardon reached them, Harris was beset more than ever with the grand day, and was greatly puzzled as to what to do, for everything he proposed was cried down as being many degrees worse than the proposition before.

At last, however, one morning, when he got up with a headache, through having racked his brains all night, he hit upon a happy plan that, as he had yet proposed, sudden light and relief came in the shape of a letter from Anthony, bidding all the family to dine with him at Kingston.

Not only on the day itself, but on the three days before it, was the dull-looking house at Long Wickham in a state of excitement, deranged, disorderly, happiest, busiest house in all the town. What preparations had to be made. What a frying on and dressing of fowls there was. What a cobbling and fattening of the horse, and tender anxieties as to his probable state of health on the day. What embellishments of the carriage, to the beauties of which they had scarcely done justice by the gaze they had given it on the day. What made-mends for their neglect by spending whole hours in it—to air the cushions, they said—and Harris's coachman, who was proud of his charge, was driven to distraction by the little gray pensioners of the stables.

During those days of bustle, and noise, and irregular meals; of wild, disorderly preparation, and vague, delightful anticipations, Harris and his wife had one resource of comfort, and could shut them steady, and keep them from going wild and running riot with the children. This trouble was Kitty. They could not leave her there, since to be parted from Kitty a night or two before the fire, and both Harris and his wife longed to see him, and speculated on his thinking and remembering about him. They watched Kitty with much curiosity and anxiety, but it was hard to tell what her feelings were respecting him. She cried with pleasure when she heard what he had done for Anthony—but so did they all. Her father and mother, into the bargain, heaped a dozen times a day that they might find him with Anthony, but Kitty never said a word about it.

On the eve of the grand day, as the two lay awake, thinking about them each, Harris said, suddenly, as if the idea just occurred to him:

"I say, Betsy, you must stop that now."

"Stop what?"

"Thinking of anything about Kitty. Mr. Anthony might have took it all very well when he was what he was, but now it's very different; he's got his rights, and he's going to set up to 'em. Now, I dare say it's all our own conceit in the girl made us think what we did. At any rate, it's our deuced luck if it that light under the present circumstances."

The next morning was bright enough to nearly blind the zealous little eyes that opened so early to look at it—cloudless, blue, warm, hazy—in fact, the very perfection of a summer's morning. The ground, young and fresh, pronounced so terribly fresh, it took Mr. Gibson, the foreman, and the blacksmith from over the way to hold him in. He stamped, pawed the ground, and snorted, and stiffened his ears, and seemed mad to see what lay behind the colored mist that hung in the distance across the road, from tree to tree, like triumphal flags, and canopies, and fantastic aerial arches for a royal party to pass under.

"Here's a wedding-day, old girl!" whispered Harris, handing in his wife in her silver-gray satin. "Mind, Betsy, I never saw you look better in my life."

Tom had insisted on driving, and the two boys were to squeeze in beside him. The mason's sons, Dan's two rivals, came to pass the carriage. There was a stool to get for Elizabeth Jane's feet, as she sat between her father and mother on one seat; and there was to be arranged two small children on the other, so as to leave room for Kitty. They had to wait a few minutes for her, and then the carriage began to hum, tackle and cut, like a beehive, as she came down the garden; and indeed, never was there a more charming queen of the merry party than Miss Kitty in her white muslin slip, silk bodice of Pomona green, and hat of satin straw, its bread brim looped up on one side with damask roses.

She smiled at the mason's sons as she gave them her long blue gloves and parasol to hold at the carriage door, but because she felt more pleased with them than usual, but from being so confused by the cries of "Oh, Kitty!" that she could scarcely tell one person from another. Her mother and father, as she sat down, looked at one another with eyes in whose joyful pride was mingled a sort of apologetic expression, as if the two thought of their talk of the night before, and said silently to each other, "Well, we cannot help it, you know."

Tom sprang to his seat. The blacksmith and Gibson pulled the horse's head round to one side, one to another. Harris put out his long face and implored Tom to start carefully; the stout little horse bounded and reared, and then, with a treacherous weight behind him, then darted off as if he had nothing at all. Then came the exclamations and cheering of the boys, and the delight of seeing well-known things it had taken so long to toil past before, fly, as it seemed, to meet them.

But it is impossible for words to express what a journey, what a day it was; how everything was praised—the fields, the breeze, the sun itself—till the mere mention of it in a hushed tone made their own cheeks burn. And then, the reception of the party by Anthony and his friends! How difficult it would be to say which, for any of them to describe! is afterward, and do injustice to everybody's feelings on the occasion! They could tell, of course, the how facile—how Anthony stood outside his door—the door of the house Harris had visited on the day—bareheaded to receive them; how awfully nervous Mrs. Harris got as she thought of little Ellis who had had with him on the subject of Anthony Jane's right to make his designs with greasy mufin and bread-and-butter. How Harris wished, for the moment, he was not such a hypocritical common-looking man as he felt sure he was, and then how he forgot all about it with his hand in Anthony's grasp, and words of congratulation on Anthony's good fortune on his lips. How Clarissa, the lady whom they all knew so well, and honored so much, stooped and kissed the children, one very one, and how she took both their mother's hands, and said something so charming to her about her care of Anthony, and how gratefully she turned and thanked Harris for finding her such a bridesmaid as Kitty. How Anthony introduced them to Dr. Pompess, and how gallantly, overflowing, superabundantly Pompess descending to was.

But still no Esau appeared, and at first Anthony turned off all inquiries concerning him by saying he was in London; and it was not till the feast on the lawn was over and Dr. Pompess had drank everybody's health, how Clarissa's to little Elizabeth Jane's, and Harris had enjoyed a "here we go round the mulberry bush" with his children, that a piece of news came out which made "the grand day" as suddenly gloomy as if some dark cloud had suddenly covered the sun.

Anthony first took them all in-doors, and read them a deed of gift he had had prepared, giving to himself Harris's farm, in trust for Esau, in case they were now in, and the surrounding land, and also Anthony's share in the business of John Harris & Co., on condition he had back the name and arms of Maude with as little delay as possible.

That his partner would do this had been poor Harris's hope for some days past, and when Anthony told him that the lad had flatly refused to accept the deed, and had declared his intention of going abroad for a long, long time, Harris's anger, and the pale eye gave one look of the greatest reproach and grief at a certain little fair, drooping head in a state of distress, and then it was swept his partner and the lad he had begun to look upon as one of his own sons, was a blow that struck him to the heart. But he nobly stifled every thing he was concerned in. He stood looking down on the floor for some time after Anthony had ceased speaking, twirling his two thumbs round and round one another, and it was not until the doctor gave one of his impressive coughs that he was roused to recollect himself, and reddened up at the thought of his having so far forgot his manners as to have thinked of his own private feelings than the good company in whose presence he was. He, therefore, rallied as much as he could, and remarked to Anthony that Mrs. Harris, who was blubbering in her handkerchief, and crying out emphatically against the poor lad's being sent to foreign parts to be skinned alive and "tommy-hooked."

In spite of Harris's spasmodic efforts to restore cheerfulness to the party, his wife's low spirits were rapidly becoming contagious, when the door was thrown open, and who should stand before him but the object of their grief.

He stood with the door in his hand, looking at them first with amazement, then gloomy annoyance.

"Esau, let me explain," said Anthony, going toward him.

Esau looked at him like a young savage.

"Upon my word, Tony, this is kind. I thank you for this." And he looked as if he should like to fly at him. "I arrange a meeting with you alone, to say good-by to you, and this is how you do it. I thank you."

He was for dashing out again; but Clarissa went and took hold of his hand, and said:

"Esau, you'll never grieve them so deeply as not to speak to them?"

And feeling very ridiculous in his passion, with a moaning woman on each side of him—for Mrs. Harris had taken his other hand—and perhaps seeing, with half an eye, that a certain little girlish face had, since his entrance, vanished from the room, he allowed himself, with an ill-grace, to be led to Hazza, whose warm grasp and moist eyes reproached him more than words could have done for his ungrateful intention of going away without seeing him.

A look from Clarissa drew Anthony's attention to the vacant chair, and, after a whispered word with her, he, too, was missing from the room.

The room through which Kitty had gone led into a little room with long windows opening to the garden. Anthony, when he first went in, thought nobody was there, for it was twilight by this time, and he could only see straight from the door to the window, but a voice cried out to him instantly:

"Oh, Mr. Anthony, what shall I do? Let me go back to the Miss Pattisons, Pray—pray ask father to let me go back, so as he may stay. I'm making mischief with everybody, and I'm sure it's not my fault. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!"

She came forward a little in the moonlight, her rosy hands clasped on her green bodice, her face drooping low over them, the prettiest picture of distress imaginable.

"Now, Kitty," said Anthony, assuming a very grave and paternal tone and manner, as he placed her a chair, on which she dropped, tremblingly, "I have long wished to have a little talk with you. Do you know, Kitty, I don't think you have behaved altogether fairly to me?"

The tearful little face looked up and assumed a surprised and retrospective air.

"Here have I," went on Anthony, "always made you my confidante, and told you my many troubles and hopes, which I would not have done to any one in the world but yourself."

"And, oh, sir," interrupted Kitty, "I do so like you! She no more likes you now you told me; and what a sweet dress she has on! Is it the same both sides, or, do think?—and will it wash?—and don't you like mother's, Mr. Anthony?"

Kitty bit her lips, and was much ashamed of this bit of gossip the instant it was uttered, but Anthony knew it was said in that guile which belongs only to the purest simplicity of heart; and he smiled, to remember that he himself in his rhapsodies about Clarissa, had often talked to Kitty about the colors that became her best, and both had even gone so far as to wonder whether Kitty would first see her in. And it was her mother's first satin gown that was being worn on this grand day; that, too, he knew; for it had been consulted during the inspection of numberless patterns? So his only amused and said on:

"My dear Kitty, you are still a child to me. Your mother looks charming; and Clarissa says we shall wan no roses in the church to-morrow if you are there. But to return to what I was saying. Do you think, now, you have used me well, Kitty, in listening to all my confidences, and never telling me one word about yourself?"

Kitty looked down, guiltily silent.

"And yet you must know well enough," continued Anthony, "that one subject on which you have never breathed a word, I must, just now, especially, have the deepest interest in. Now, mind, Kitty, do not mistake me. I am not the only one in the world, influence you in the matter, one way or the other; but I do think it is natural that I should wish to lose the only relative I have that I care for, on your account, as it seems, without hearing from your own lips whether it is absolutely necessary."

"I could go back to the Miss Pattisons," sobbed Kitty, "and then it wouldn't be necessary—would it?"

"I don't think it would make any difference, Kitty. I believe that if you were there for three years, it would be the same with Esau when you came back. No; I think decidedly it is better for him to go, if you are sure there is no hope for your ever caring for him. But, Kitty, what I want to say to you is, be very sure in your own mind, and let your father and myself be sure, that this separation—which we shall both feel keenly—is best for your happiness. It is not only my unwillingness to lose Esau makes me anxious to keep this from you, but my fear that he will never do any good away from us all."

"Oh, no!" sobbed Kitty, with her head almost in her lap, "has he done any good with us?"

"If you know what he was when he first came to me," answered Anthony, "I think you must say that he had; but you must remember, Kitty, that Esau's life has been a very strange one. I do believe—and you know me well enough, I trust, to feel sure that I would not deceive you on such a matter—but I do believe that he only wants some good and strong motive in life, and he would be as steadfast as a rock. He won't do his duty because it is his duty. I have spoken roughly for him, Kitty, from the first, and he turned his back upon it and hated it. I'm afraid he won't find it any more tempting when he comes to know one who would have made it attractive for him over whatever thorns and stones he had to follow it; but she knows best whom she will entrust her not to make mistakes. Don't do, for my sake, Kitty, and your father's, what you would not do for your own, through fear of mistake, and would bring trouble, as nearly all mistakes do. Don't think you will try and care for Esau if you do not already do so. You never will. You have seen enough of him, in all conscience; but now I am going to ask you, Kitty, to be as kind and faithful a little friend as you have always been to me, and to tell me frankly—"

Anthony paused an instant, and the fair, bowed-down head little dreamed what had made him do so—namely, the sight of a dark face at the window, vehemently signing to him to take no notice.

"To tell me frankly," continued Anthony, "do you now love him?"

There was a stinging noise in Kitty's ears, and she almost wished the floor would open and swallow her up, to save her answering Mr. Anthony's question. He had bent lower and lower. She felt a hand on one of hers. How kind Mr. Anthony was—how very kind; but, how true, should she tell the truth and answer? She had gave here such a friendly and assuring grasp, she felt she must speak.

"But, sir," she sobbed, without looking up, but pressing the hand timidly and gratefully, "wouldn't it do if—if—if you told him I was only going home for a little time—that is, I mean, if I tell you I—I love him?"

And she pressed the hand again, as, overcome by emotion, Mr. Anthony rose in the capricious and troublesome, and lifted up a tearful little face.

"Kitty, my darling, that will do," said Esau, whose hand he held, and whose face here touched as it looked up.

THE END.

EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

As usual on the evening previous to the opening, the National Academy of Design invited their friends to a private view of their pictures. We regret that the Academy had the bad taste to repeat an offense which was very freely commented upon last winter. The Council have again publicly offered their invitations for sale. There is no need to comment upon such a course of conduct—the very mention of the fact should be sufficient condemnation. If the two or three gentlemen who have the management and control of the Academy showed less desire to turn an honest penny on every occasion, they would be more likely to command the full respect and the generous support and courtesy which it formerly enjoyed.

The first feature which strikes one on entering the Academy galleries should naturally be the pictures on the walls. In the present case, however, the first thing one sees is the wall itself, which has been so ill selected to hang the pictures against is a very beautiful delicate shade of green, which is in itself very fine, and contrasts admirably with the deep red tone employed for the base and cornice, but is unfortunately the most damaging that could possibly have been selected as a back-ground for an oil painting or any description whatever. The consequence is that the well-known property of forcing all pure colors to an unnatural degree of intensity, and at the same time of rendering more or less indistinct all that is near, is in this instance Mr. Gignoux's large landscape, in which the beautiful aerial tones of the middle distance and the opposition of the gray wall into painfully crude blues, reds, on the contrary, the corresponding tint of the large upright picture is forced by the same unfortunate gray wall into hot and artificial-looking tints, which the painter never put into it. It is a wonder that some of the managers of the Academy, who, after so many years' experience of hanging their exhibitions, ought to be supposed to have some practical knowledge of the subject, should have committed a blunder which any reasonable house decorator would have avoided. It is a simple test which can be safely used to hang all classes of pictures upon any wall, to choose a background of a color which, give equally a glow to warm pictures, and a silvery quality to cool ones.

A certain class of artists seem fit to class as disappointed painters, Bohemians, and leger-beer drinking artists, all who have reached a point of success from a point of view, that is, the living credit where it has been due, and consequently, the corresponding contempt for any duty of the critic to view everything with a lenient eye, and that for mere pointing out of faults, which, if they do not be bad—entitles a man to the respect and admiration of the public. Now, this is wrong, and if sometimes persevered in, will do more to ruin the prospects of art in this country than all the contempt that is showered on foreign pictures. Young painters will become intimidated with mingled praise and blame, and will settle down dull into the same error, and all because there is a certain class of men who are afraid to praise, and afraid to speak the truth. We should not have spoken as we do, were it not that we have the opinion appear to be gradually shaping itself to this style, and we consider it the duty of every one who has the love of art and the true interests of Art at heart, to raise up their voices in solemn protestation against it, and show that, long before long, bring down American Art to a level of mediocrity.

The best portraits exhibited are, as usual, those of Mr. Elliott and Mr. Baker. Mr. Elliott's heads are always very fine, and are characterized this year by unusual force of drawing. Mr. Baker's full length portrait of a boy, in the south room, has hardly any of this quality, and is the finest production of his brush, perhaps than that we have ever seen. Mr. Baker's heads seem to be only portraits of the clothes which are worn, and the shadows are correct in color. His portrait of Mr. Elliott is particularly noticeable for the head, which gets to make up a fine portrait.

There are other portraits, good, bad and indifferent; of some of these we may speak by-and-by; of the rest, the less said the better.

It seems to us, looking at the subject from a merely common-sense point of view, that it would be highly desirable necessary in painting a picture. In the first place, color is the distinctive quality which gives the representation of form, without color, becomes merely a flat and shadow picture, and has no business in the parlament of art; consequently, if a painting fails in color, it fails in the most important element, and that artist should have made, not a painting, but a drawing in black and white, which is the true field for form. Therefore, is the first requisite in painting. The second requisite is perspective, and this is so much a matter of fact to this, that it should look like the thing it is intended to represent. We think we have stated these two simple canons in criticism in noticing the pictures in the Academy, and we trust they will be borne in mind by the Council.

Nos. 2 and 129, "Designs for Fans on Kid," by Mr. Hoppner, are beautiful examples of color, strong in color, free in design, and altogether admirable.

No. 3, "Sketch for Ornamental Drawings, by Mr. A. Hunt, although somewhat tricky in execution, we may pass in an effigy.

Not. 13 and 73, Portraits, by Miss Harriet E. Cheney, appear to us very much alike, and are both pleasing heads of the late Mr. Seth Cheney.

No. 19, "A Rocky Suspension Bridge," by G. W. Flagg, possesses scarcely a redeeming point. It may well be asked why so many such, and worse pictures in the National Academy, when paint really fine pictures, have been hung over doors and in dark corners, when such things as this, painted by Academicians, are hung on the eyelines and in prominent places? The preceding remark might be equally applied to—

No. 115, "Portrait of an Equitarian Dog," by Mr. W. S. Hoaut, which is simply, curious.

No. 110, "Sketch from Nature," by Mr. John Pope, is a most excellent piece of drawing, and particularly good in expression.

No. 81, "A Stall in the Arms Bazaar at Constantinople," Walter Gould. In this the contrast of color is good, also the details of arms. The attitudes are easy, thoroughly natural, and the flesh is good throughout.

No. 82, "View on Wappinger's Creek, near Poughkeepsie, N. Y.," Jerome Thompkins. A broad, free, landscape in the very well characterized and painted; shadows cool, and reflections good, and the whole picture has a good, and true effect.

Nos. 44 and 65. A. H. Wyant and J. B. Bristed. Two little pictures of color—dull, cold, gray and dismal, but full of feeling; the other warm and rich in the last. Both of a promising kind.

There are some good architectural designs in this the first room.

SOUTH ROOM.

No. 136, "The Cactus Pitaha," by Mr. W. J. Hays, is finished with the minutest detail truth; and the hum-ming-bird, which he has introduced, is very brilliant in color.

No. 140, "Cloud Towers," by Mr. E. Benson. Mr. Benson is one of the few landscapists, in his pictures one can only look for a truthful representation of nature. There are two clouds painted in this picture; a gorm of rand running out into the sea, and a pile of cumulus, clouds in the sky. The first point of sand Mr. Benson has drawn a scabby figure; but as he has failed to make any thing of it, we will not say a word to it. It must necessarily be supposed that the unfortunate artist was driven to this figure by every way, by the rushes over, which argues a great want of prudence on the part of the painter, and a great want of prudence on the part of Mr. Benson.

No. 105, "Autumn Afternoon, Hurez," by Mr. T. A. Richards. Mr. Richards exhibits five pictures, all of which are good, but this one is the best, and is much better than the pictures he usually exhibits.

No. 106, "Lake Scene in the Shadow," by Mr. M. Oliver, Jr. A badly drawn figure, with an opposite effect.

No. 175, "The Mill in the Dingle," by Mr. A. F. Bellows, is a picture full of feeling of nature and greens, and fine in handling. It is altogether one of the best pictures in the exhibition.

No. 180, "Pond Lilies," by Mrs. Jane Hunt, is a most delightful picture, full of feeling.

No. 190, "Still Life," by Mr. J. C. Dolph, is very strongly and truthfully painted, and very fine in color.

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO.

THE last mail from South America brings us the intelligence, of the bombardment of Valparaiso by the Spanish fleet, which for some time has blockaded the harbor of that city. On the 27th March, Admiral Pareja delivered the authorities on the 31st he should bombard the city, unless the terms of the Government were complied with, and gave four days' notice, in order that women, children and non-combatants might escape from danger. The Chilean Minister of Foreign Affairs decided that the terms proposed by the Spanish Admiral could not be complied with, and it was known, consequently, that a terrible alarm was manifested in the city, and many of the inhabitants began transferring their goods and furniture to places of safety.

In the meantime, strenuous efforts were made by the representatives of foreign powers, more especially by the United States Minister, Gen. Kilpatrick, and Commodore Rogers, to avert the threatened storm and save the city. Commodore Rogers, in command of the United States Admiral Nunez would forego his determination and leave the harbor. But all these negotiations and all difficulties could be made, and all foreign opposition to the Spanish bombardment was overruled, and the fleet came into city. Early on the morning of the 31st (the four days' grace having elapsed), he noticed the foreign squadron in the harbor getting under way. The flagfish squadron first complied with this notification. Admiral soon after, the whole of the Spanish fleet, which dropped into line a mile and a half from the shore. The morning was one of the most beautiful of the season, and the sea, for the bay, smooth as mirror, reflected the outline of every vessel, while thousands of spectators thronged the adjacent hills in anxiety the impending attack. shortly before eight o'clock the enemy's vessels began to manoeuvre, the fire of their batteries was opened, and the bombardment in front of the Mole, and about a mile from the shore, was in full progress. At 8:30 A. M. the first few shells shots as a warning to the non-combatants of the city, that the attack was about to commence.

A few minutes after, the Mole de Madrid, followed by the Blanca and the Vencedora, started in. The leading frigate was followed by four Mole, and the twelve minutes past nine, opened from her starboard with a single 32-pounder, at a distance of 300 yards, the signal for the fire of the whole squadron. The Custom House. A cheer of defiance from the hill above was answered by a cheer of defiance, and the Blanca joining in the fire, both vessels thundered at the Custom House. Immense clouds of red dust rolled up, like columns of smoke, from the walls, as the shot struck them, and the reverberations from the surrounding hills added to the terrific effect of the guns and the devilish scream of the shells. As the frigates followed the arc of the beach, and lost the range of the Custom House, they directed their opening spun to the opposite the Roles (or Exchange) and the palace of the Governor. Several shells struck the latter, and when the frigates, turning their heads outward, moved into position with their port guns bearing on the Custom House, and commenced firing.

In the meantime, the Resolucion had dropped astern of the Esmeralda, and opened fire on the Custom House. The Vencedora coming in more rapidly, sent a few her rifled 68-pound shells into the Custom House; and, passing the Esmeralda, the Blanca turned and took a position from which she could fire through the Mole, and also at the Custom House, the Governor's Palace and the Custom House.

At this time, half-past nine, the frigates commenced a steady fire, the Mole de Madrid and Blanca firing rapidly, their shots going in and through the Custom House. The Vencedora, Esmeralda and Resolucion not averaging more than one every five minutes, and doing much damage to private buildings. The Blanca's fire kept up with a constant fire on the depot, in which the Vencedores occasionally joined from her starboard guns. The shells from the Spanish fleet were very well, most of them passing up on the hills 200 feet high. There being little or no wind, the smoke settled down heavily, and drifted off toward the eastern part of the city, so slowly that its movement was scarcely perceptible, the blue-ringe from the mouth of the guns rising up and preserving their symmetry for many minutes. A spanker-gaff on board the Esmeralda caused great, back astern of the Villa de Madrid and remained silent for some time. Ten minutes after the bombardment opened her fire on the depot and moved up near the Numancia, the other two vessels continuing the bombardment.

The shots of the Vencedora crashed through the Exchange, and then struck the palace, knocking the mortar in all directions. Many of her shells passed through rows of houses several squares from the public buildings, setting them on fire, and threatening the destruction of large portions of the city.

The bombardment continued with great severity for three hours, when, having thrown between 2,000 and 3,000 shot and shell, the Admiral gave the signal to withdraw, and the bombardment ceased.

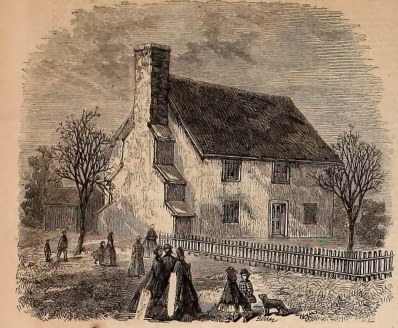
The destruction of property was very great. The warehouses, containing several millions of dollars' worth of merchandise, were burned down, and many. The Hotel de la Union, and all that portion of the city in the immediate vicinity, were consumed.

Numerous fires broke out during the night, the people on the heights rushed into the city and strove to check the conflagration, but in vain; the city partially burned. Owing to the fact that most of the inhabitants had left the place, the number of killed and wounded was comparatively small.

Notwithstanding the promises of Admiral Nuñez to respect the church and the hospitals, numerous religious and charitable institution was shelled, as well as a portion of the city composed alone of private residences. The churches are all situated in localities remote from the public buildings, and were designated by large white flags. They could not have been struck by shot unless the Spaniards had intentionally fired at them. None of the churches or hospitals were struck less than two shots and the Convent of the Barron, on the hills, which was occupied by women and children, was struck 31 times. Many of the women and children in the convent are ladies whose every one supposed they would have been secure. And a number of children are reported to have been killed in other localities distant from the objects threatened by the Spanish fleet in his manifesto. Shots were also fired at the groups of spectators on the hills from the business part of the city, rendering it necessary for the authorities to station a force of soldiers upon the ridges back of the town, so as to prevent the people from collecting in large numbers and thus drawing the enemy's fire.

It is understood that Coquimbo, Calders, Callao, and all accessible points on the coast are to be occupied in a similar manner, and that the orders of the Spanish commander are, to do all the damage he can, with the force at his disposal.

Our illustration of it's affair shows the position of the attacking fleet, and the portions of the city that were the especial objects of vengeance. The Custom House stands at the end of the Mole, and near it are the warehouses that were burned. The palace is back from the Custom House a short distance, and is marked by the flying flags. The entire view is taken from the palace of the attack, and will convey to our readers a vivid conception of the outrage upon a defenseless and unresisting city.



A KING'S FUNERAL.

PROBABLY no greater, possibly no less amount of show and pageantry were ever crowded into human day than at the funeral of the late King of Belgium. Some months since we described that in which the intellect checks failures, and whose when checks were successful and panicked in the style of the latest and costliest Spanish idea. We wrote in Temple Bar describes the scenes and incidents of the funeral of the King, giving the place of honor to the "Car," which we have parked through the streets, and with the construction of which every one was familiar with some familiarity."

"We walked slowly around the gigantic shell. Despite its air of sculidity, the vast mass tottered treemblingly when touched by the hand. Underneath was the frame at its foot, and looking up, at the request of our friend, we saw that it was made of iron bolts and fragile that we asked how much the coffin it was to support would be likely to weigh. 'Not more than an English fowl.' How, then, will it be raised to the bier in the vaults of the church, and how will the final structure support its weight? 'Oh, you don't understand. The bier is only ornamental, and will be left there.' And the diminished interest in the subject talked of was very apparent in the tone of the answer to our remark—'we observe in here, between the wheels, so that it will be easily the wheels will be taken off, and the hearse will be will touch their hearts to see the crown and sceptre and the cloak upon it, as it is drawn slowly through the streets to-morrow. No one will suspect that it is not there.' 'Not even here, a few feet from the ground; and the heavy gold fringe will hide his insect.' The practical difficulties of the arrangement have to be corrected. Quickly resting in a sort of boot, and unsupported by the wheels, it has been proposed that the hearse should be stopped at Laeken, the Belgians, were accustomed to the sight of the coffin, and that the ceremonial there should be performed. This was considered on the property-bier high in the air, and of such a weight as to admit of going upon the portion of the car where it really is."

TO LADIES ANYWARDLY SITUATED. — The editor of the Englishwoman's Domestic Magazine warrants the efficacy of the use of the following recipe for applying to a gentleman when they pop the question: it is highly recommended by a lady who has tried it, and very often upon your eyes with a good deal of weather and cheese, and you will find it very easy to say, "Will you have me?" Should he not hear you distinctly, what do you mean, dear Alfred?" If the lawyers are very slow, you can sprinkle, or sneeze, or cough and Very suitable for brunettes: Give a start, flash a glance at the gentleman you intend to bid—with rising color your reaction; one hand pressed high on your bosom will express fear; both hands, joy. Should he speak to anybody, and generally considered a clincher. Burst into tears, and exclaim, "Oh, you have killed me!" If he can't cry, drop your head upon the inquisitor's shoulder, and murmur, "Yours, Willy!" Should he "cave," and nice little style, it is enough to say, "No!" pout, and shake your head, and look pretty.

SINGULAR CASE.—One of our exchanges says there is a young man in a town in Vermont who cannot speak to his wife without a fight. Their differences arose between his mother and her husband, and for a time their love was almost destroyed by them. This difficulty was subsequently healed—the child was born, and all was fine—until he left home to settle within a mile his father was invariably silent. It continued so till it was five years, when the fathers, being somewhat exhausted his powers of persuasion, threatened it with imprisonment in the county jail. Still, no improvement was inflicted, it clouded nothing but sighs and groans. Finally, the son, in a fit of anger, struck his father was calmly endeavoring to speak. All who were present stood in blank astonishment, and the assailant left the child to speak to his father; and the injured there to speak to his son. Neither was able to converse with his parent could only produce the most inarticulate sighs and groans. A similar case, to the latter, which occurred when the son was about 20 years of age. Many a time he has tried to induce him to speak to his father; and although he has succeeded in getting his associates about other matters, immediately upon the mention of his father's name he would refuse to converse. We have no doubt that the difficulty in both cases arose from a trifling matter, but which is now almost beyond the power of healing upon the parties of the fearful breach.

FRONT VIEW OF THE OLD STONE HOUSE, GUILFORD, CONN.

REAR VIEW OF THE OLD STONE HOUSE, GUILFORD.—FROM SKETCHES BY H. C. CURTIS.

THE OLD STONE HOUSE

In Guilford, Conn., the Oldest Building in this Country.

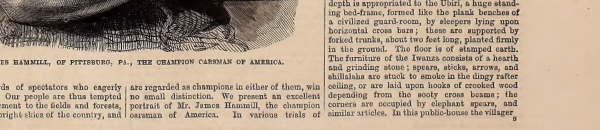
THOSE fond of cherishing relics of the past, will be pleased with the sketch of the old stone house in Guilford. The spirit of the American people inclines to the practical, rather than the venerable, yet few will contemplate this token of a former generation without deep interest. It is one of the old landmarks, rapidly giving place to the requirements of the day, but around which many tender associations still cluster, and which might furnish the theme for an instructive homily.

This building was erected by the company who first settled the town, about the year 1640. The leader, or head of the company, was Henry Whitfield, a minister of the Church of England, and one of the number of those who were called Non-Conformists.

This house was built for him. The stone of which the building is constructed was brought on hand-barrows from a ledge some considerable distance from the place where the house stands. The cement used in building the walls is said now to be harder than the stone itself. The walls, which are about two feet in thickness, were plastered 15 or 20 years since.

Mr. Whitfield, and several others of the company who came to this place in 1639, returned to England in 1649. This house was used by the first settlers as a kind of fort for some time, to defend themselves against the hostile savages, and afterward by the inhabitants of the town as a place of refuge from the shot and shells of the British men-of-war that passed up and down the sound during the war of the Revolution. The first marriage which took place in this town was solemnized in this building. The supper which was provided for the occasion consisted of pork and peas. This house is now occupied, and in good repair.

OUT-DOOR SPORTS.



THE increasing attention devoted to out-door sports, ball-playing, rowing, etc., is especially commendable, and everything that will foster these innocent, healthful and invigorating pastimes should be encouraged. We have heard much of the physical degeneracy of the American people, who have often been represented as becoming effeminate, and receding from the standards of manly development recognized in other countries, and we have been ready to admit that, in some respects, the charge is well founded. Our system of education, our modes of business, our social habits, all tend to excite the intellectual powers at the expense of the physical; and so we have gained mental activity and acuteness by sacrificing bodily vigor and endurance.

The old epigram, "a sound mind in a healthful body," has been too much overlooked; but the day of such folly is past, and we are now beginning a course of education that makes good health and muscular energy paramount. In all our cities and large towns, ball and boating, riding and other sporting clubs are organized, and have their regular times for exercise, and their diversions are not less advantageous to themselves than interesting to crowds of spectators who eagerly watch the games. Our people are thus tempted from their confinement to the fields and forests, the pure air and bright skies of the country, and benefited incalculably, both in a physical and moral point of view.

Ball playing and rowing are perhaps the most popular sports at the present time, and those who are regarded as champions in either of them, win no small distinction. We present an excellent portrait of Mr. James Hammill, the champion oarsman of America. In various trials of skill and speed, he has almost uniformly been successful, and in contests with the most accomplished oarsmen of our country was declared the victor. On the 21st of April he sailed for England, for the purpose of testing the abilities of Harry Kelly, the acknowledged champion of that country, and should he succeed in making arrangements for a race, he will doubtless prove that American boats, like American yachts, are always the winning craft. Mr. Hammill took with him a boat built expressly for his use, which is 33 feet long, and weighs only 28 pounds. With this boat he is confident he can maintain his reputation as a successful rower. Mr. Hammill is still a young man, being only 29 years of age, and is a resident of Pittsburg, Pa.

AN AFRICAN VILLAGE TAVERN.

THOSE familiar with the elegancies and comforts of modern hotels, would find themselves sadly out of place in an African public-house. But as our ideas of comfort and luxury are relative, possibly the savage enjoys himself as much, in his own estimation, with his boon companions, as the frequenters of the Metropolitan or Fifth Avenue Hotels in New York. A late traveler in Eastern Africa thus describes the village "public-house," called in that country the Iwanza:

"Of these buildings there are two in every settlement, generally built at opposite sides, fronting the normal Mremba tree, which sheds its filmy shade over the public court-yard. That of the women, being a species of harem, was not visited; as travelers and strangers are always admitted into the male Iwanza, it is more readily described. This public-house is a large hut, somewhat more substantial than those adjoining, often smeared with smooth clay, and decorated here and there with broad columns of the ovals before described, and the prints of palms dipped in ashes and placed flat like the hands in ancient Egyptian buildings. The roof is generally a thatch raised a foot above the walls, an excellent plan for ventilation in these regions. Outside, the Iwanza is defended against the incursions of cattle by roughly barked trunks of trees resting upon stout uprights; in this space men sit, converse, and smoke. The two doorways are protected by rude charms suspended from the lintel, hares' tails, zebras' manes, goats' horns, and other articles of prophylactic virtue. Inside, half the depth is appropriated to the Ubiri, a long standing bed-frame, formed like the plank benches of a civilized guard-room, by sleepers lying upon horizontal cross bars; these are supported by forked trunks, about two feet long, planted firmly in the ground. The floor is of stamped earth. The furniture of the Iwanza consists of a hearth and grinding stone; spears, sticks, arrows, and shillalahs are stuck to smoke in the dingy rafter ceiling, or are laid upon hooks of crooked wood depending from the sooty cross beams; the corners are occupied by elephant spears, and similar articles. In this public-house the villager spend their days, and often, even though married, their nights, gambling, eating, drinking, smoking, chatting, and sleeping, like a litter of puppies, destitute of clothing, and using one other's backs, breasts, and stomachs as pillows."

THE ORIGIN OF CAST IRON.

THE cast iron which comes from the blast furnace may, from its useful quality of fusibility, be immediately used, as every one knows, for manufacturing purposes, by re-melting it and pouring it into molds of any required shape, this being the business of the iron-founder. Simple as this appears, the use of cast iron is only of modern date compared with that of its purer rival. It may be obscurely traced to the fifteenth century, if not earlier; but the process of casting was beset with many mechanical difficulties, which were not thoroughly vanquished till about 1700, when Abraham Darby, an intelligent mechanic, who had him with four of the sheep which he had saved. He sold their wool in order to buy better clothing for himself, and afterward disposed of the sheep, so that he might obtain money to travel to Bristol and seek his fortune. Afraid of being pressed for a soldier if found in Bristol out of place, he requested his master to recommend him as an apprentice to a relative, who was one of the partners of the celebrated Abraham Darby of the Baptist Mills. The boy was accordingly sent into the brass works until he should procure employment. As he was looking on during the trials of Dutch workmen to cast iron, he said to Abraham Darby that he thought he saw how they had missed it. He begged to be allowed to try, and he and Abraham Darby remained alone in the workshop the same night for the purpose. Before morning they had cast an iron pot. The boy Thomas entered into an agreement to serve Abraham Darby and keep the secret. He was enticed by the offer of double wages to leave his master, but brought some Dutch workmen to establish a brass foundry at Bristol, conceived that cast iron might be substituted for brass, and prevailed upon his workmen to make the experiment, but without success, until a happy incident occurred, in connection with which the following interesting anecdote is related: About this period a Welsh shepherd-boy, named John Thomas, succeeded in rescuing a flock of his master's sheep from a snow-drift, and later in the spring of the same year, during heavy rain and the melting of the snow, he swam a river to fetch home a herd of mountain cattle. These he collected and drove to the river, but the ford had now become a boiling torrent. He nevertheless crossed it on the back of an ox, and brought home the whole herd in safety. As a reward for his courage, his master presented he continued nobly faithful, and afterward showed his fidelity to his master's widow and children in their evil days. From 1709 to 1828 the family of Thomas were confidential and much valued agents to the descendants of Abraham Darby. For more than 100 years after the night on which Thomas and his master made their successful experiment of producing an iron casting in a mold of fine sand, with its two wooden frames and its air-holes, the same process was practiced and kept secret at Coalbrookdale with plugged keyholes and barred doors.

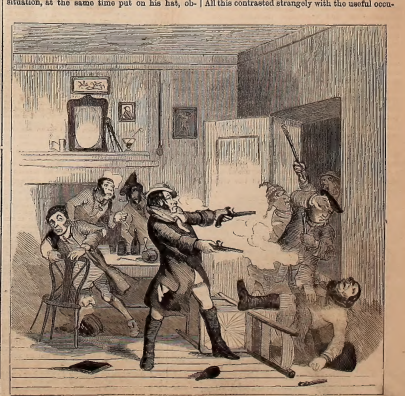
NOTORIOUS CRIMINALS OF THE OLDEN TIME.



Lewis Jeremiah Avershaw.

THIS criminal was one of the most daring and unrepentant sinners that ever died by the hands of the executioner. There has too frequently been, among the most hardened, an affected contempt of death and a foolhardiness of behavior, on their exit from this world, which makes every one shudder. In this criminal it was peculiarly exemplified.

Avershaw was an old offender, and had committed numerous crimes which called aloud for justice. He was at length brought to trial at Croydon, in Surrey, England, on the 30th of July, 1795, charged on two indictments; one for having feloniously shot at, and murdered, David Price, an officer belonging to the police-office; the other, for having, at the same time and place, fired a pistol at Bernard Turner, another officer, with intent to murder him. The prisoner at the bar, being a person of ill-fame, had been suspected of having perpetrated a number of felonies; and the magistrates having received information against him, sent, as was their duty, an order for his apprehension. To execute the warrant, the deceased, Price, and another officer, went to the Three Brewers, a public-house, where they understood he was drinking in company with some other persons. At the entrance of a parlor in the house the prisoner appeared in a posture of resistance; and holding a loaded pistol in each of his hands he, with threats and imprecations, desired the officers to stand off, as he would discharge fire at them. The officers, however, attempted to rush in and seize him; on which he discharged both the pistols at the same instant, lodging the contents of one in the body of Price, and with the other wounding Turner very severely in the head. Price, after languishing a few hours, died of the wound.

He was accordingly tried; and, upon the testimony of one witness, found guilty on a second capital indictment. The prisoner, who, contrary to general expectation, had in a great measure hitherto refrained from his usual audacity, now began, with unparalleled insolence of expression and gesture, to ask his lordship if he "was to be murdered by the evidence of one witness?" several times repeating the question, till the jury returned him—guilty. When the black cap was put on, the prisoner regardless of his dreadful situation, at the same time put on his hat, observing the judge with contemptuous looks while he was passing the sentence.

At the place of execution, he appeared entirely unconcerned. He had a flower in his mouth, his bosom was thrown open, and he kept up an incessant conversation with the persons who rode beside the cart; frequently laughing and nodding to others of his acquaintance whom he perceived in the crowd.

NOTORIOUS CRIMINALS—THE CAPTURE OF JESSE AVERSHAW, AT CROYDON, ENGLAND.

AN INGENIOUS THIEF.

CIVILIZED rogues, however dexterous, cannot claim a monopoly of skill in their nefarious provocations, and they might even learn some new tricks by studying the secrets of the "profession" in other lands. The illustration shows how Australian savages manage to increase their possessions by other means than honest toil.

Sir Thomas Mitchell, an English traveler among these aborigines, thus relates his experience with a fierce tribe, which he met in the course of his explorations:

"When the blacksmith of the party rigged up his forge for the purpose of making some smithy repairs, and arranged his tools and began to ply his bellows, their amusement reached a climax. All this contrasted strangely with the useful occupation of honest Vulcan, whom I had positively enjoined not to laugh or stop working. At length I prevailed on an old man to sit down by me, and gave him a clasp-knife in order to check the search he was disposed to make through my pockets. Meanwhile the others came around the forge and immediately began to pilfer whatever they could lay either hand or foot upon. While one was detected making off with a file, another seized something else, until the poor blacksmith could no longer proceed with his work. One set his foot on an ax, and thus, all the while staring the overseer (who eyed him) in the face; he quickly receded several yards, jumping backward to another, who stood ready behind him to take it. Some jogged others at the moments most opportune for seizing something, and an old man made some amusing attempts to fish up a horse-shoe into the hollow of a tree. The best of this part of the scene was that they did not so much mind being observed by any one, except the blacksmith, supposing they were robbing him only. He was at last tempted to give one of them a push from him, when a scene of chanting, spitting and throwing dust commenced on the part of the thief, a stout fellow, who carried a spear, and which he made something like a motion to use. Notwithstanding all the vigilance of several men appointed to watch the articles about the forge, they carried off an excellent rasp or file at last. They left our party, however, in a perfectly civil way, and we were right glad to feel at peace with them on any terms."

SPEARING TURTLE.

A CAPITAL description of hunting the turtle is given by Bard, a celebrated English traveler, who witnessed it.

"I became eager," says he, "to witness the sport of turtle-hunting, which is regarded by the Musquitos as their noblest art, and in which they have acquired proverbial expertness. I was quite concerned on finding how little provisions were taken in the boats, since bad weather often keeps the fishermen out two or three weeks. But Drumer (the head man of the tribe) insisted that we should find plenty to eat, and we embarked. We caught the land-breeze as soon as we got from under the lee of the shore, and drove rapidly on our course. Although the sea was comparatively smooth, yet the boats all carried such an amount of sail as to keep me in a state of constant nervousness. One would scarcely believe that the Musquito men venture out in their pitpans, in the roughest weather, with impunity, riding the waves like sea-gulls. If upset, they right their boats in a moment, and with their broad paddles clear them of water in an incredibly short space of time.

"We went literally with the wind; and in four hours after leaving the shore were among the cays. These are very numerous, surrounded by reefs through which wind intricate channels, all well known to the fishers. Some of the cays are mere heaps of sand and half-disintegrated coral-rocks; others are larger; and a few have bushes and an occasional palm-tree upon them. It was one of the latter, where there were the ruins of a rude hut and a place scooped in the sand containing brackish water, that we landed and made our encampment."

But Mr. Bard, eager for the sport, accompanies a native of the name of Harris, and two men to paddle the boat, and starts alone. The apparatus used for striking the turtle consists of a long hollow staff, and the spear-head is fastened to a line which passes through rings by the side of the shaft, and is wound to a piece of light wood which acts as a float. When this is thrown, the line remains, and the float rises to the surface, which is seized by the fisherman, who then leisurely hauls in his fish. The spear-head being ground down very sharp, makes but a small hole in the shell of the turtle, and does not greatly damage its commercial value.

MR. JAMES STEPHENS.

THIS gentleman, about whom so many contradictory reports have been circulated, is said positively to be on his way to this country for the purpose of correcting some irregularities connected with the Fenian cause, and giving a new impetus and vigor to its waning fortunes.

In view of the palpable blunders the leaders here have made, and the existing dissensions among them, it remains to be seen whether the original Head Centre can inspire his adherents with sufficient prudence and determination to insure success. He, undoubtedly, possesses their unbounded confidence, and will do more than any other man to retrieve the errors of the past, and give a proper direction to the efforts of the future.

SOME years ago, in a fracas which occurred not a thousand miles from Vincennes, Indiana, a man accidentally present was severely wounded with a knife by one of the belligerents. Much alarm was excited, and doctors were hastily sent for, and one Esculapian came "armed and equipped," as he thought was exactly right; at any rate, he went to work upon the case as if he was going to do something. Rolling up his sleeves, and "diving into it," he said to the horror-stricken bystanders:

"Bad case—incised cut of the prineum membranus—and—through the umbilicus misintary to the lineralbum. The viscus and the signum are incised—and the piluric orifice of the hepatic ductus, is lacerated to the anterior spinus of the attachment of the fifth gang."

It was too much for a particular friend of the poor sufferer. He gave up, and hastened out into the fresh air to revive his fainting faculties. While walking up and down, painfully and despairingly wringing his hands, in front of the saloon where the mischief had been done, an acquaintance came hurriedly up and said to him:

"How is Sam?"

He replied:

"There is no chance in the world for him; he must die, poor fellow! The Latin parts of his bowels are all cut to pieces!"

Is it any wonder that Sam died?

THE "CLAQUE" IN PARIS.

IN many parts of the East, and in barbarous countries generally, not excepting England, there are professional mourners, who attend funerals, and either howl or cry, or else wear sombre habiliments and affect great grief, "for a consideration." Something similar is the rule in French theatres, where applause is given by persons hired for the purpose, there called "the claque." A recent letter-writer tells us something about the Parisian claque:

"Although many Americans know what the term claque means, it may be well to mention that it is an institution peculiar to Parisian theatres, a certain portion of whom (the parterre) being set apart for the occupancy of a band of men, under the leadership of a chief, whose sole business it is to applaud, as their leader may direct. Those of us in Paris who have no knowledge of the claque except through remarking that the noisy clapping of hands during a performance all proceeds from one spot, can form no idea of the extent to which this disreputable trade is carried, and the large sums of money which the 'directors of theatrical successes' amass by their strange industry. There are several of these chefs de claque who are landed porprietors, and some of them are known to retire after a few years, to enjoy the competency they have earned by the sweat of their—hands. Others, again, lend money at usurious interest to managers in distress; for, though the impresario does not often grow rich, the claqueur always does, selling at a high price applause which costs him nothing, and profiting daily by the absurd variety of actors, who eagerly pay a round sum to be 'called before the curtain,' at the end of the piece.

It sometimes happens that a claque leader sells his 'enthusiastic approbation' in three or four different theatres, in which case he superintends in person the most important establishment, and confides the others to experienced lieutenants, grown gray beneath the chandelier. The great man, in these cases, never appears at the branch concerns, except at the dress rehearsals, which take place just before a new piece is brought out. His object then is to listen to the play, and to select the portions to be applauded, giving his orders accordingly to his aides-de-camp.

"In act 1, scene 4, for example, Mlle. X. is to have a 'Bravo!' When the low comedian enters, there is to be a loud pounding on the floor with canes and umbrellas. Act 2, scene 1, is perhaps rather feeble, not to say stupid; enthusiastic applause, to cover up the defects. And so on, for all the world like the disposition of a General on the evening of a battle. Everything is arranged in advance, and nothing left to accident, the lieutenant rigorously executing his superior's directions. This system has its merits, certainly, but it is not without some disadvantages, one of which is, that the aforesaid lieutenant may give the signal to applaud a particular scene which may have made a great impression on the chef de claque, but fails to strike the general public in the same favorable manner—whereupon there naturally arises a conflict of opinion, which, in the minor theatres, now and then leads to discolored optics and sanguinary noses, and results ordinarily in a night spent in the station-house and a fine in the morning, the sufferers being mostly inoffensive people, who, excited thereto by sudden choler, have assaulted the claquers in the exercise of their profession.

"I am afraid that M. Emile Augier's experiment of suppressing the claque will not be a permanent success, for it has often been attempted, and in each instance the claque has soon returned with flying colors. The fact is, the general public—that is to say, the paying public—has always been accustomed to hearing the applause of hirelings, and where there is no claque, there is no applause."

THE SKILL OF CHINESE LABORERS.—The scaffolding for the purpose of covering the court is proceeding rapidly, the chief supports being now completed, and the upper part in process of being covered with light bamboos, placed about two feet apart. These act as supports for the matting, which is all double, having lining formed of the millet stalk. Some of these sheets of matting are fitted on bamboo frames, which are not intended to be moved; while others are so arranged that by halliards they can be pulled open or shut, like window-blinds, thus enabling the court to be covered or uncovered according to temperature, rain, or other circumstances. The skill and ingenuity which the men display are remarkable. They move about on the top of this work, some 40 feet from the ground, with the agility of monkeys, and run up and down the straight poles like squirrels, using only their hands and the soles of their feet. A leg of mutton on the top of a greased pole would stand a poor chance of remaining long an object of competition among Pekin scaffold constructors. The framework is secured only by ropes and twine, and great economy is exercised in picking up and removing the portions that are in excess, several little boys going round in the evening, before the men leave, and picking up all the scraps that have been cut off and thrown down. The Chinese workmen display great expertness in throwing materials from one to the other to a considerable height. I noticed this today amongst the scaffold men, and it recalled to my memory having seen one of the mason's laborers taking a spade full of morter, and throw it, spade and all, to a man on the roof of a house, who caught it without dislodging a particle of the mortar. The paper-hangers, also, are very expert in throwing up sheets of paper, with one side covered with paste, ready for being put on the wall. Their paper for room purposes is very good, the "satin pattern" being that most commonly used. Paper of this kind is not kept in rolls, as with us, but in squares of about 12 inches by 10 inches. One man stands by the table and applies the paste, and then adroitly throws the sheet up to another one, who fixes it on the wall.

A TEXAN correspondent of Wilke's Spirit of the Times, tells us the following story of his stallion "John": "Our saddle ponies turned loose in the pasture, preferring liberty and grass to the saddle and the spur, were often very hard to drive into the corral, and at length became so cunning in secreting themselves among the thick chapparel, that it was quite a labor to get them up, and almost impossible to effect it on foot. John had been taken up to recruit him on corn after his season's labors, and was the only horse on hand, and John was put in requisition. A young lad rode him down to where the ponies were concealed, and attempted to drive them up; but they ran and dodged until the horse suddenly seemed to become aware of what was wanted, when he rushed at them in wild excitement, leaving his rider hung in a wide-spreading mezquit, and taking the affair into his own charge, he brought the whole bunch of recusant ponies flying into the pen, right glad by any means to escape the formidable teeth and the heels of their pursuer. After this, if John was in the stable, we had no difficulty in penning our saddle stock. One of our young men, between whom and the horse there was a warm and mutual attachment, would leap on his bare back, and often without a bridle would gallop off down the pasture. "Will," making the horse fling out and nicker in his play, and guiding his course by a slap on the neck, would ride at the ponies to be penned; then leaping off his horse, he would dismiss him with a slap on the flank, confident that John knew his work and would do it; and the ponies soon learned that all attempts at evasion were vain, and made at once for the corral. That no one may be received by the belief that stock-raising in Texas is all profit and pleasure, it is just that the end of poor John be recorded; he fell a victim to his zeal in this very vocation of penning ponies. One unlucky brute had, contrary to rule, been turned loose, with some 30 feet of stake-rope dragging behind him; upon the end of this rope it was John's fate to tread, while running at full-speed; the end of the rope coiled around his leg and threw him violently. Some vital organ was ruptured, and he never moved again.

A GENTLEMAN talking to another on the subject of marriage, made the following observation: "I first saw my wife in a storm; courted her in a storm; was betrothed to her in a storm; married her in a storm; lived with her in a storm all her life; but, thank heaven, I buried her in pleasant weather."

JOHN BROUGHAM'S "Tread Light, for my heart is under your feet, love," is more than equaled by a lover who thus goes skating on his lady's heart—

Thy heart is like a frozen lake,
On whose cold brink I stand;
Oh, buckle on my spirit's skate,
And take me by the hand,
And lead, thou loving saint, the way,
To where the ice is thin,
That it may break beneath my feet,
And let a lover in.

ONE very cold night D. was roused from his slumbers by a very loud knocking at his door. After some hesitation he arose and went to the window and asked:

"Who's there?"

"A friend."

"What do you want?"

"I want to stay here all night."

"S'ay there, then," was the benevolent reply.

A STOICAL Scotchman was addressed by his sick wife:

"Oh! John, I shan't leave this bed alive."

"Please thyself, Betty, and thee'll please me," returned John, with great equanimity.

"I have been a good wife to you, John," persisted the dying woman.

"Middlin', Betty, middlin'," responded the matter-of-fact husband.

The above enigma, which should be studied and practiced by all, we saw posted in one of the windows of a store the other day. That no one may lose the meaning of it, we give the explanation, "Hand over what you owe."

PARIS gossips let off a rich joke on the distinguished Frenchman, M. Emile de Girardin, who recently gave a dinner in Paris to Abd-el-Kader, and during the conversation said: "I shall be happy to present you with my 'Two Sisters,'" meaning his new play. In translating, the explanation that it was M. Girardin's play was left out, and the Emir politely replied that "he would be very happy to accept the ladies, although his harem was quite full."

THE following is the conclusion of an epitaph on a tombstone in East Tennessee: "She lived a life of virtue, and died of cholera morbus, caused by eating green fruit in the full hope of a blessed immortality, at the early age of 21 years, 7 months and 16 days. Reader, go thou and do likewise."

WHILE urging the united efforts of Christians of every name to reach and rescue the neglected masses of our country, one of the speakers at the convention in Cleveland, related an anecdote that showed that the word "denomination" was not restricted to its theological meaning. A Western farmer, who wished to invest the accumulations of his industry in United States securities, went to Jay Cooke's office to procure the Treasury notes. The clerk inquired "What denomination he would have them in?" Having never heard that word used except to distinguish the religious sects, he, after a little deliberation, replied:

"Well, you may give me part in Old School Presbyterian to please the old lady, but give me the heft on't in Free-will Baptist."

THE rather architectural expression is used in Paris to express that a lady is powdered in the face, "She has renewed her façade."

WHICH are the two smallest insects mentioned in the Bible? "The wicked flee," and "the widow's mite."

WE do not know a pleasanter gift that a gentleman can give to a lady, be she mother, sister, wife or friend, than a Musical Box. In the household where there is no piano, it is indispensable, since without any solicitation it dissolves into beautiful music. Paillard, of No. 21 Maiden Lane, New York, has a very large assortment of these beautiful boxes.

HIGH SALARIES.—The salaries of the Lords of Admiralty are set forth in a parliamentary paper just published. The Duke of Somerset receives £4,666 a year; Sir F. W. Grey, £1,876 10s.; Rear Admiral Eden, £1,566 5s.; Rear Admiral Fanshawe, £1,566 5s.; Rear Admiral Drummond, £1,566 5s.; and Mr. Fenwick, M. P., £1,000. Lord C. E. Paget gets £2,482 10s., and Mr. Romain £1,537, as secretaries. Mr. Briggs, the chief clerk, gets a salary of £1,000 a year, and altogether the salaries of the clerks amount to £21,302. In France the grand marshal of the palace, grand almoner, grand chamberlain, master of the horse, grand master of the hounds, and principal master of the ceremonies, receive 60,000 francs a year each. The Emperor's secretary receives 40,000 francs, the principal secretary 12,000 francs, and the police inspector of the imperial residence 20,000 francs. The Secretaries of State and the President of the Council of State have each 100,000 francs, and the principal secretaries to the ministers from 18,000 to 25,000 francs each. There are seven privy councilors having the rank of ministers, who are each paid 100,000 francs a year.

Holloway's Pills—There is but one disease the source of all others—impure blood; and only one infallible remedy—Holloway's Pills. Firm flesh, a clear complexion, sound digestion, elasticity of spirits, refreshing sleep, health and strength are the advantages of pure blood, all of which these medicines will impart to those who freely use them.

The People have been so much imposed upon by several worthless Sarsaparillas, that we are glad to be able to recommend a preparation which can be depended on as containing the virtues of that invaluable medicine, and is worthy of the public confidence. Dr. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA cures when anything can cure the diseases that require an alterative medicine.

American Art Journal.

THE FIFTH VOLUME, No. 104, WILL COMMENCE ON SATURDAY, APRIL 21ST, 1866.

IT contains Reviews and Criticisms upon Music, Art, Literature and the Drama. Correspondence, Novelettes, Poetry, Valuable Information, and News and Gossip from all parts of the World. The AMERICAN ART JOURNAL is recognized as the standard of judgment and taste in all Art matters, and its circulation is widely extended through intelligent and refined circles.

The first number of the Fifth Volume, will contain a beautiful and original Motette for four voices, for the use of the church—"The Lord is in His Holy Temple"—composed expressly for this work, by George F. Bristow.

This will be followed by original compositions by Gottschalk, Wehli, Goldbeck, Bristow, Fradel, Bassford, Hoffman and others, which will only be published in this work.

PRIZE COMPOSITIONS.

We offer the following prizes for competition, among our subscribers whose names are received and registered upon our books, during our fifth volume, the first number of which will be published on Saturday, April 21st, 1866.

For the best Te Deum and Jubilate, simplicity and excellence desirable, one hundred and fifty dollars.

For the best piano piece in form of Fantasie, Reverie, or Genre composition, one hundred and fifty dollars.

The names of the judges who will make the awards will be shortly announced.

PRIZE POEMS.

(Subject to the same conditions.)

For the two best lyric poems, the one simple narrative, the other dramatic, heroic, or of incident, one hundred dollars each.

PRIZE DESIGNS.

(Subject to the same conditions.)

For the best original designs, illustrating the above subjects, to be engraved or lithographed in connection, one hundred dollars each.

The date at which the compositions should be sent, and the manner, will be shortly announced.

All communications, business or otherwise, should be addressed to

The Great National Fair.

The lady directors of the NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME, will commence to hold a PUBLIC FAIR in the City of Washington, on the 15th of MAY NEXT, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the support and maintenance of the Orphans of National Soldiers and Sailors not otherwise provided for in their respective States and Territories.

The ladies invite all who can to contribute toward representing their State by a table at the Fair.

The charity is a noble and deserving one, and it is hoped that each State and Territory will be liberally represented.

All contributions should be addressed—"NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME, Washington, D. C.," and forwarded, if possible, 10 days before the opening of the Fair.

The Institution will be opened for the reception of children on the 1st of June next, and applications for admission may be forwarded immediately. tf

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 186 · by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

A Specific against Epidemic Fraud.

We have become accustomed to deal with large sums. The enormous appropriations of the war have familiarized us with amounts which before would have appalled us from their magnitude. A special appropriation of a million of dollars six years ago, would have startled the financial public, and given a touch of gravity to the faces of the reckless Congressmen who might have taken the responsibility of voting it. A robbery of ten thousand dollars, or a "breach of trust," or genteel "defalcation" of fifty thousand, would have furnished many columns of detail and comment for the daily press. Now such petty villainies are dismissed with a paragraph. Scoundrelism of the genus financial was never so flourishing as now, and never took such large proportions. The Tribune figures up the total of forgeries, robberies, etc., of amounts over $25,000, and finds that for the year ending May 1st they reach the sum of $12,536,000! This includes, of course the "Ketchum forgeries," amounting to a quarter of the whole, and the Brown & Co. robbery of a million and a half. Our contemporary seems disposed to regard swindling as a moral epidemic, and if such, may we not regard its late extraordinary manifestations as comets and other phenomena were regarded in the olden time—as portents and precursors of other perturbations, visitations or calamities, such, for instance, as the cholera?

We fancy this financial epidemic is amenable to treatment, and have little faith in the regimen that gives the criminal afflicted a large proportion of his gains, and immunity from punishment as a condition precedent of restitution. A few years in the State Prison is not a specific cure, nor a successful preventative. Unfortunately a lucky swindler, even after he is condemned as a felon, is regarded with a certain sort of admiration. If Ross, the latest operator, chances to be caught, there will be hundreds, including probably some of his victims, who will be ready to ejaculate, "clever dog!" Suppose he happens to be "sent up," ten to one if his punishment prove to be much more than nominal. He can probably afford, in a money sense, to serve out a few years in the well-regulated and healthful establishment at Sing-Sing, and regard the restraint cheerfully, as likely to give him a keener zest for the enjoyment of his snug fortune of a quarter of a million in Paris. How many of us spend years on years of toil, exercising all our powers and prudences, under no higher stimulus than the hope of acquiring a quarter of the sum which he may secure through no greater risk than of obtaining free lodgings and thorough sanitary treatment, with benefit of clergy, in the State Hotel?

As President Johnson said of treason in his callow days, and when traitors were not quite so good as loyal men, robbery, forgery, "defalcation" and their affiliated crimes "must be made odious." We propose that their perpetrators be publicly flogged. It was quite a fashion in England for knaves and fools to shoot at the queen, until flogging was substituted for the "drawing and quartering" prescribed by law. The astute Ross, whom we have no doubt is "of pleasing address and gentlemanly exterior," would hardly like to figure in Paris, even with his quarter of a million, when a well-scarred back or the brand of "F" on his shoulder might, at any moment, equally reveal his humiliation and punishment. He would be careful not to commit himself to the arms of Aspasia, or even those of her more debased sisters, with the palpable "odiousness" of his crimes well writ in his flesh.

It is said that the French, Italians, Spaniards, and Irish are given to crimes against the person; the English, to crimes against property, and the Americans, to feats financial —frauds and forgeries. Unfortunately, these do not carry the odium attaching to burglary and assaults "with intent to kill." They seem to be regarded as evidence of that shrewdness or "cuteness" which is a national boast, and is, more or less, venial. They ought to be made "odious," and what is called punishment in the penitentiary (where the culprit is always employed as an assistant or in the dispensary), does not make them so, in a preventative sense. A well-veiled back, however, might be a specific. At any rate, it would make peculation and fraud "odious."

A National Constitutional Convention.

SINCE the first of December upward of one hundred propositions have been offered for amending the Constitution of the United States, in order to meet the altered circumstances of the nation, and to secure, fundamentally, the results determined by the late war. These numerous propositions are only natural expressions of the general and deep-seated conviction that the Constitution, framed under conditions so different from those which now exist, moral, political, mental and physical, does not meet the requirements of the age, and is only imperfectly adapted to our present needs. The tree of Liberty was but a feeble plant when our Constitution was formed; it is now a giant tree, and has sent off its shoots over a continent. The country was then made up of a few feeble colonies, sparse in population, poor in resources, and limited in territory. It now covers ten times its original area, has more than ten times its original population, is powerful on land and sea, and possessed of resources scarcely computable. When the Constitution was framed, steam were unknown; the telegraph was not dreamed of; railways did not exist, and the press was weak and limited equally in scope and influence. The country was then held by the dependencies of powerful, monarchial nations. None of the duties and responsibilities which have devolved on us, as the head of a free Union can nations, existed. Our limited commerce brought us little in contact with other countries, and in the great family of nations our obligations were few and simple. We had the element of slavery within us, incompatible with democracy or republicanism, which ran through and controlled as well constitutional provisions as legislative enactments.

The highest devices of patriotism and intelligence, matured under circumstances so different from ours, could never meet present requirements. The wisdom of other ages of fancy are not fit garments for the man. No one denies in heart that the Constitution requires great, not to say radical changes. The cry of suspiciousness against those who openly propose a change, is the cry of the demagogue. It has been violated to conform to public requirements in more than one instance, and only with tacit consent, and will be violated again, whenever any great necessity arises, with equal consent. Is it not better to change it than firing it into contempt by abuse, or to seek to accomplish the object of required changes by doubtful legislation, incompatible with its provisions?

A decent respect for the patriotism and wisdom of our fathers demands that we should approach their work reverently, and in remodeling the edifice they raised, to preserve every stone and column not incompatible with the grandeur and strength of the new and grander structure which we propose to build. We do not believe that all patriotism, wisdom, foresight or principle died out with the framers of the Constitution. We do not believe that it is a new Constitutional Convention we need, its work would be less perfect than that of the first assemblage, and we are confident it would be acquiesced in with even greater unanimity than that was.

A series of Constitutional Amendments have just passed the House of Representatives by the requisite two-thirds vote. They contain articles guaranteeing personal rights to life, liberty and property to all citizens of the United States; apportioning representation in Congress according to voters, and not according to population; disfranchising a segment of the rebel debt; and depriving all persons who voluntarily took part in the late rebellion of the right to vote for members of the General Government until July 4, 1870.

It is not our purpose to discuss these amendments; but to declare for a Constitutional Convention as preferable to such a miscellany of additions. We go for rebuilding, instead of patching. The Constitution, to be clear, intelligible, and logical, must be recast. Some things which, like slavery, were incorporated in its very texture, cannot otherwise be got rid of. Besides, the constant harrassment, turmoil, and bitter discussion on every proposed change in Congress and in State Legislatures, go far to prevent the restoration of that peace and quiet for which the nation is longing.

Let every State, loyal and rebel, be represented in that Convention. The triumph won through superior numbers and greater resources in the field, will be equally assured in the Constitutional Council. The great moral results of the war would be far better secured under a single act, which should be the new nation's new charter, than by amendments intruded here and there into the existing venerable but battered instrument.

Conflicting Reports.

THE official report of the Spanish Admiral Mendez Nuñez, giving the particulars of the recent bombardment of Valparaiso, has been published. In some points it is in flat contradiction of the report of Commodore Rodgers to the Secretary of the Navy, to which we unwadvertted in our last issue. False and humiliating as was the position in which Commodore Rodgers put himself, according to his own report, it was still much worse by the report of Admiral Nuñez. If the latter be true, Commodore Rodgers has no alternative except to resign a post which he has dishonored, and retire from a profession of which he is unworthy.

Commodore Rodgers told us, in his report, that, although he considered it his interest to prevent the bombardment, and that he had the right to do so, and believed it to be his duty, yet he refrained because, at the last moment, an imbecile and cowardly spirit declined to join him in the work, and because he was determined not to "singe his pans" in "pulling chestnuts out of the fire," at the risk of being laughed at for his pains. The "pulling chestnuts out of the fire" is Capt. Rodgers's mode of designating the noble act of saving an undefended city from bombardment, and of protecting many millions of foreign and neutral property, including much that was American!

Poor and humiliating as is this explanation, or excuse, it is less discreditable than that which Admiral Nuñez avers was given by Commodore Rodgers to him. He tells us that when the latter informed him that he should probably be "compelled to resist the bombardment by force," he (Nuñez), replied that "such considerations should prevent him from executing the orders of the Government,"—thus implying that it was fear of Spanish prowess, and not dread of being laughed at, that led Capt. Rodgers to reconsider his purpose. Of course this is only Spanish self-complacency, for Commodore Rodgers had declared that he "doubted" Admiral Nuñez and his fleet in "from thirty seconds to thirty minutes."

What, however, is most pertinent, and in many respects less discreditable, than the reports of the two commanders, is the statement of Admiral Nuñez that, on the 29th of March, he was called on by Commodore Rodgers, who informed him that he had intended to oppose the bombardment of Valparaiso by force, because he was at the time convinced that the object of the attack was not, as said that Chile was in the right; but that subsequently he had arrived at the conclusion that right, moderation, and dignity, were on the side of Spain; wherefore, he not only should not oppose anything, but that his ships would move out of the way at eight o'clock in the morning of the 31st."

Now, as we have said, Com. Rodgers testifies that he considered the bombardment, when proposed, as contrary to public law, violative of legitimate war, and might be resisted; that he did not resist it because the British Admiral failed to join him; and because he might "singe his pans," and get laughed at. Nuñez tells us, on the other hand, that Com. Rodgers informed him that he had abandoned his intention of interfering, because he had "arrived at the conclusion that right, moderation and dignity were on the side of Spain!" Now, according to Nuñez, was on the 29th of March. On the 31st of the same month Com. Rodgers wrote to the Secretary of the Navy, severely censuring the conduct of Spain, denying her right, which Nuñez says he admitted two days before, expressing the belief that she was acting on a point of etiquette rather than for the accomplishment of any great political end, and that her conduct was in violation of the rules of legitimate war. To leave no room for misapprehension, we quote from Com. Rodgers's report:

> "At last Chile had reached the goal in human progress marked by the establishment of religious toleration, and that Spain, on a point of etiquette rather than from any great political end, as I believe, proposes to burn the defenceless city of Valparaiso, would not be seen so far as she does fit. Is it right that she should thus destroy the lives and properties unconnected with the silence of the Continent?
> "Let the blame be where it may, Spain provokes a retaliation which seems to me such as will provoke universal condemnation before the civilized world; and therefore that it is not directed to its legitimate end, and, consequently, that no future plea might be sustained."

As the matter stands, Com. Rodgers thought Spain so far wrong before the 29th of March, that he was prepared to forcibly interfere against her; that on the 29th of March she was "right, moderate and dignified;" and that on the 31st of March she was wholly wrong again, acting without just motives, cruelly, and in violation of legitimate warfare. The countrymen of Com. Rodgers do not believe the representations of the Spanish Admiral. They regard his report of the interview of March 29th as untrue, and they expect Com. Rodgers to take means for relieving himself from the false position in which this official publication places him. They feel sufficient regret that he did not prevent the bombardment of Valparaiso; but they do not wish him to appear as having finally approved it as a vindication of "the right, moderation and dignity" of Spain.

THE army raised in the Revolution, from 1775 to 1783, amounted to 231,791, the militia adding one half of that force, and the latter consisted of four vessels. In 1812 the regulars numbered 32,360, the volunteers 6,000, the militia 20,000, and the navy consisted of 19 frigates and 12 gun-boat boats. In 1815 we had 276 vessels, with 1,636 guns. In March, 1865, we had 624 ships-of-war, with 5,477 guns; and the aggregate number of men raised for the Union armies to put down the rebellion was 2,688,000. If to the above be added the quite equal number of the Confederate armies, it will be found that the grand aggregate reached 4,000,000 of men at arms, the largest force ever called out on a footing in any one country, in any age of the world.

JOSEPH BARNARD DAVIS, M. MR. BENJO GOULD has lately published "The Book of Were-Wolves," in which he recounts a great number of instances, ancient and modern, of persons consumed with a passion for murder, and whose thirst for blood knew no limit. The latest of these monsters, whose name he had intended to oppose the bombardment of Valparaiso by force, because he was at the time convinced that the object of the attack was not, as said that Chile was in the right; but that subsequently he had arrived at the conclusion that right, moderation, and dignity, were on the side of Spain; wherefore, he not only should not oppose anything, but that his ships would move out of the way at eight o'clock in the morning of the 31st."

Now, according to Nuñez, was on the 29th of March.

OBSERVATIONS from high elevations in southern latitudes has long been a desideratum in astronomical science. Lieut. Ashe, Director of the Quebec Observatory, has suggested to the President of the Astronomical Society of London that a first-class telescope should be placed on one of the higher Llanos of the Andes, where, free from the effects of a moist atmosphere, a series of observations of the sun and planets might be carried out. Being himself acquainted with the country, he recommends that the application should travel by way of Panama to Arica, in Peru, and thence to the gentle town of Tacna, whence the ascent of the mountains to the selected site would begin. In three days the Pass of Tacora at the height of 14,000 feet—could be reached. Lieut. Ashe intimates that he would be willing to conduct such an expedition, and that the Government of Chile stands would gratuitously grant leave of absence and the use of the Quebec telescope of eight inches' aperture.

THE attempt to assassinate the Emperor of Russia failed through the interposition of Ossip Komissaroff, a lately emancipated serf, a tailor. He has been raised to the nobility. The life of the benefactor of the serfs was saved by one of their number.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Tribune, writing of Acapulco, the principal port of Southern Mexico on the Pacific, says:

> "In its best estate Acapulco contains 4,000 people, but the starting slavery consequent upon the entry to the Republican cause to withdraw, and only 400 remain. Before the thousand Imperialists, all, officers and men, native Mexicans, took possession with 150 camp followers, they had to land the rest of the guns, three feet, half a mile from the water; but, though aided by the French more or less, they are not strong enough to dislodge Alvarez, whose flag, in full view, then distant about three miles, only three hills in between. With good artillery he could shell them out of the fort and the harbor in less than an hour."

THE London Athenæum, noticing Goodrich's "Tribute Book," and referring to the enormous contributions made by our people in support of the late war, charitably and otherwise, goes on to say:

> "The great amount of national devotion is now poured into the New World; made out of such a grand full ought to be—not with greedy care for paltry items, but with a generous anxiety to avoid the total to the uttermost farthing, but with the generous moderation of a munificent man, who, having given to the full measure of his greatness, is careful not to over-estimate his liberality. Such was the spirit of the people of Britain that whilst the Americans were paying in taxes $3,000,000 for 1865 as the proportion of the war, they voluntarily contributed $70,000,000 to promote enlistments, to procure hospitals, to succour the sick and wounded, to succour the families of volunteers, to sustain the efforts of the Freedmen's Bureau for the sick and wounded, to send aid to the distressed Unionist within the rebel lines, to feed the famishing Southern people, and to build soldiers' rests, to endow orphan asylums, to give pensions to those disabled, and every other claim to dead ness. Seventy millions of dollars! Let the ladies who have had to do their collecting speak of it. Let the article 'Half-a-million of Money,' think what these words must make the downtown merchant feel, and peer over the account at their clubs, and mutter something about 'Paid in greenbacks, by Jove!' Seventy millions, boys, burn these $70,000,000 into English sovereigns; and what making the shoulders of Britannia bear, they will have a rather heavy load of pestiferous gold on them."

THE Court of Chancery of England has recently reaffirmed its previous holding, that the illustrations of the letter-press of a book form part of such book, and are covered by its copyright.

TOWN COSSIP.

ANOTHER burn of the kaleidoscope, and the brilliant colors of our New York life assume fresh and fashion forms. For once our country cousins, who always come up to their annual inspection, have not brought gloomy skies with them. The lights of the most susquehanna, and the sunlight to the various societies, have found no use for their gingham umbrellas, and as they stalk in groups up and down Broadway with their pantaloons and wide-checked shirts, it is certainly not against our weather that they can be called to shelter their heads from the scorching noon. Will they choose rather to invigh a stunt the crowds which seem every year to grow more and more per? or will they allow their wrath to be kindled against the hats which each year grow more bewitching, or the pretty faces under them which become each year more seductive? What can make our reversed and reversed friends look at Broadway as they look at the animals? Have they no sympathies with the life, health, vigor and beauty they see around them, or do their repulsive visions see but terrible wonderments over us?

But having quitted his wholesale storms-already alluded to in the "Gossip" of last week, according to particulars, attracts attention by the grotesqueness (if we may be allowed the term) of his traffic. Flies have been found in amber, but who would have expected to hear of a man being smothered in sawdust? Not the least from whatever fate like that which overtook by the family of Patrick O'Rourke, thus as surely and as fatally as if their head as if he had helplessly fallen into fire or water.

With death naturally is associated destruction; and among other destructive agencies, this season has had an amount of piles of bricks, torn-up sidewalks, and cloaks of dust from Central Avenue. With extensive repairs in Broadway we can part without regret, for we have assurance that their successors will be more worthy of the capital. But what sacrilegious hand has given a temple consecrated by every pomp of religion to the service of the Most High, round which centuries so many memories of what is at once most tender and most excellent in the lives of thousands of this and past generations, to be the prey of the spoiler? Our affection greatly wounded. What has become, we ask ourselves, of the old Brick Church? Is it to fall into the church of St. Thomas? Wait I carted off with the old stones, or does it lie in the basement of the new street? Is consecration hereditary?

The week winds up by a pleasant dinner on board the magnificent screw steamer Queen, belonging to the National Line of Steamers between Liverpool and this port. A company representing the wealth and importance of commerce, the dignity and decorum of the bench, the eloquence of the bar, the popularity of the press, assembled to do honor to the recently appointed Agent to the Company, Mr. F. W. J. Hurst, and every one must certainly echo the sentiment with which the prosperity of the line was drank, as that of a Company "whose ships united two countries, separated only by the sea!"

Mr. Gough never delivered a more persuasive temperance lecture than one announced for last Sunday by certain benevolent and dignified gentlemen whom the powers at Albany have selected to watch over the morals and manners of our wicked city. Mr. Gough has drawn large crowds, but our lecturers had larger; Mr. Gough has depicted most glowingly the evils of intemperance and urged reform most eloquently, but the speakers on this occasion condensed their discourse into a single utterance, "Touch not, taste not," and a hundred thousand eager listeners gave them their undivided attention.

The bibulous portion of our citizens, from the Battery to King's Bridge, sought their accustomed haunts only to hear the ominous words, like the shrill notes of alarm an old prophet once shouted in the streets of Nineveh, "Touch not, taste not;" for lager had ceased to flow, and the fountains of the more exciting ardent were dry, and every saloon, and bar, and groggery, was locked and sealed, and the irrepressible conflict between law and license, between order and wassail, had come. Treats were at a discount, and many feverish lips were constrained perforce to sing—

"Water, cold water's the drink for me," while others found

"Water, water everywhere,
But not a drop of drink;"

and others, still more fervent than pious, gave expression to their feelings in unrestrained vituperation. A temperance movement is a novelty in this latitude, but the experiment proved more successful than was anticipated, and will be repeated next week.

At Wallack's, on Monday, there was performed a dramatic version of Charles Reade's novel, "It is Never Too Late to Mend." It has been adapted by the author, and very clumsily has he done it. It has been for some time quite the rage in London, and hence its inevitable resurrection on this side of the Atlantic. We do not like these reality plays, which are to us as distasteful in the drama as the pre-Raphaelistic sketches are in art. The novel has been pretty well followed, and some of the scenes are effective. The greatest attraction in the piece is the scenery, which is positively worth a visit on its own account alone. The acting is what might be expected from so admirably trained a company as Wallack's; but, as there is really no great character in the drama, the actors have no opportunity for displaying their individual merits.

At the Academy of Music, Mr. Grau opened a short season on Monday, with "La Traviata," which was quite favorably received, the new artistes introduced making a good impression. On Wednesday "Il Trovatore was produced; followed on Thursday by "Faust." The performances have been excellent, but the audiences were not as large as the character of the operas and the merit of the artistes deserved. What was deficient in numbers, however, was made up in enthusiasm, which certainly was well merited.

Barnum's has been crowded during the week, and no wonder, since it appeals to so many classes.

A lively musical comicality has been produced at the Olympic, and has attracted large audiences.

Mr. Charles Dillon commences on the 16th a short engagement, and will appear in his favorite character of "Belphegor; or, the Mountebank."

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

CONTINUING our exploration of the North Room, we come upon

No. 226, "Saranac Woods," by Mr. J. A. Hows, which is good in color, very fine in drawing, and faithfully renders the characteristics of the Adirondack country, with which his drawings have made us all familiar. This is one of the few good pictures which are very badly hung.

No. 208. "The Frost King," by Mr. C. V. Cranch. This picture is obviously bad, and strongly reminds us of some of Thomas Hood's caricatures. Mr. Cranch is an Academician.

No. 195. "The Story of Mobile Bay," by Mr. A. W Warren. The story is pleasantly told, and the picture is very good in color.

Nos. 216, 217, 218, 219. Landscapes, by the late Mr. J. A. Suydam. Among these are some of the best specimens of Mr. Suydam's pictures, which are always pleasant, and very truthfully painted.

No. 171. "The Gun Foundry." Mr. J. F. Weir. This picture seems, by general consent, to be the leading work of the present exhibition. It attracts more general attention, and has excited more critical comment, than any other picture on the walls. There is good reason for this, independent of its intrinsic merits as a composition and as a painting. The subject chosen is a bold one, and hard to handle; the danger being that, in giving sufficient strength of contrast, an appearance of exaggeration might prevail. There are elements of power in the subject: the cavernous workshop, with its dim distances; the brawny, spectral figure in the intense light of the molten iron; and the countless details, minute but important, all calculated to add a certain weird grandeur to the scene.

The subject of this picture is the great West Point Gun Foundry, and the time chosen is the casting of one of the huge Parrott guns. In the centre is the vast mould sunk deep into the earth; high above it the ponderous crane, bearing the caldron which the athletic hands, shielded from the intensified heat, are just emptying of its seething contents into the upright flask, which shall give it back cooled, a potent instrument of deadly warfare.

The characteristic of the picture is vivid action. The work itself admits of no delay—the iron must not cool. The figures to the right and left of the caldren, tilting it over by main strength, are drawn with great spirit. Every muscle is at work, and it is evident that the labor is not light. The figure in front of the flask, holding the rope which guides the motion of the crane or derrick, is admirable, from the air of caution, forethought, and control which is stamped on face and form. The group at the windlass is also full of action, and so of the solitary figure at a distant furnace—the departing point which rests the eye and harmonizes the whole. Mr. Weir has seized a moment of action, and every living thing present is emotionally absorbed in that period. The silent group of spectators on the right, by the fixed, wondering interest they exhibit, intensifies the action of the whole. The entire action of this picture is masterly in its conception and execution.

The picture is honestly painted; no trickery is used. The effect is legitimate, and within the bounds of reality. The glare of the molten iron, without the brightness of fire, is faithfully rendered, and the reflection, which, in less careful hands, might have been merely bright light, is only glare, finely graduated and diffused. The individuals in the group of spectators on the right, are, we understand, portraits of distinguished persons invited to witness the casting of a gun.

All the details of the picture are elaborately worked up to a point of finish, but without deteriorating from the broad and grand effect of the whole.

Mr. Weir has made a marked success by the picture, and has won for himself an individuality by his strong and bold treatment of a common-place yet difficult subject.

EAST ROOM.

No. 227. "Tasting the Broth," by Mr. C. F. Blauvelt, is in that gentleman's usual happy manner.

No. 233. "Love Me, Love My Dog," by Mr. Alfred Jones. Evidently a study from nature, spirited and correct. The expression of the child's face is admirable.

No. 238. "Monk in Tuscany," by Mr. Elihu Vedder. The same monk, the same cypress trees, and the same dreary landscape that Mr. Vedder has been painting for years. This gentleman has given us many good pictures; we need only mention his "Lair of the Serpent," a fine conception and very original, and a small picture of the "Genii Escaping from the Bottle," which, although, perhaps, suggested by a little drawing by Mr. Harvey, in a head-piece to the notes on one of the chapters in Lane's "Arabian Nights," was very cleverly painted. But for two years past Mr. Vedder appears to have assumed the privilege of successful painters, and gives us a great many very poor pictures.

No. 245. "Study on Will's Creek," by Mr. A. H. Wynant. Truthful and rich in color.

No. 234. "Lake George," by Mr. J. F. Kensett. One of his gray pictures, and beautifully modulated in tone throughout.

No. 247. "Sunday Morning," by Mr. Eastman Johnson. A very fine picture, and what faults it has are merely technical. In the first place, there is a want of relief in the shelf over the chimney. Mr. Johnson himself evidently felt this, and has attempted to produce the proper effect by placing strongly colored objects on the shelf itself, but without success. There is also a confusion between the light coming from the window and that which comes down the open mouth of the chimney. There also seems to be a fault in drawing, in the left side of the woman nursing the child—an incident not pleasant in a picture.

No. 248. "Autumn Woods," by Mr. W. Whittredge. Although having some fine qualities, it is not as good as Mr. Whittredge's pictures usually are.

No. 250. "October," by Mr. M. Waterman. Original in composition and good in color. The cattle are, by all odds, the most carefully and truthfully drawn in the exhibition. Another example of a most excellent picture badly hung.

No. 251. "Fiddling His Way," by Mr. Eastman Johnson. A most beautiful and glowing piece of color. The incident rendered with great feeling.

No. 256. "Dog and Game," by Mr. E. Terry. As good as it is possible for any still life to be in which such extreme finish is attempted. We notice that Mr. Terry, in his foreshortening, always exaggerates his drawing.

No. 261. "The Studio," by Mr. J. B. Stearns. Bad in color, inexcusable in drawing, and trashy in composition. In fact, any attempt to be specifically critical upon this picture would be simply absurd. A competent and independent tribunal would have excluded it from any exhibition.

No. 265. "The Brunette," by Mr. J. G. Brown. Not so successful as Mr. Brown's pictures usually are. It tells no story, although there is evidently some action intended, which the artist has failed to impart.

No. 267. "The Discarded," by Mr. W. R. Freeman. Full of useful and delicate drawing; the flesh color is particularly good.

No. 285. "Sparking in the Old Times," by Mr. L. E. Wilmarth. The most noticeable thing about this picture is the monumental brass upon the frame, setting forth that Mr. Wilmarth is a pupil of Gerome. Not much the better for Mr. Wilmarth, and much the worse for Mr. Gerome.

No. 287. "A Glimpse of the Caribbean Sea," by Mr. F. E. Church. It is with great regret that we notice that Mr. Church paints many pictures which fall far below the great reputation he has achieved. Here now is a picture which, like many of Mr. Church's recent efforts, has nothing to recommend it but its oddity. Of late, Mr Church, judging by his exhibited pictures, seems to see nothing in Nature but her vagaries—what the public call "striking effects," but what we are inclined to call "clap-trap."

In this picture he has probably attempted to express some peculiar modification of the surface of the sea, caused by a long point of land running out from the shore. After patient study, this is all we can comprehend of the intention of the painter; but whatever Mr. Church's intention, he has failed in attaining any fact which ever did exist in nature. His "Caribbean Sea" seems to be suspended in mid-air, and his point of land suggests the side of a mountain cliff, and nothing else whatever. On the whole, without the assistance of the catalogue, this picture would seem to be intended as a pendant to the gentleman's "Star of Bethlehem," and to represent Mount Ararat after the flood, before the waters were drained off. The foreground is petty, and the color is not good.

No. 299. "In the Woods," by Miss M. S. Barston, contains some very careful detail, patiently studied.

No. 300. "Cherries," by Miss V. Granbery. Well arranged and carefully painted.

No. 305. "In Memoriam," by Mr. W. J. Hennessy, falls far below the gentleman's best picture. We notice in Mr. Hennessy's pictures this year that he is beginning to ignore the existence of eyes in the human head, a practice which has become quite common with some figure-painters of late, and of which we shall have more to say presently.

No. 309. "Portrait," by Mr. F. Angero. A very fine portrait, good both in drawing and color.

No. 312. "The last of the Ice," by Mr. C. G. Griswold. We should not have noticed this picture, had not our attention been particularly called to it by many very favorable comments. We are always sorry to disparage the works of a young artist, but it would, perhaps, be better for Mr. Griswold if some of the faults of this picture were presented to his notice. In the first place, it shows a great want of patient study and labor; it does not represent truthfully either fog, rain, mist, or any other known condition of the atmosphere; it contains no color whatever, and impresses us with no sentiment whatever—it is simply gray paint. Mr. Griswold might study with advantage Mr. Kensett's picture of "Lake George" (234), which has been hung as a pendant to his own, and in which he will see what may be done with gray tones by the hand of a master.

BOOK NOTICES.

THE March number of Chicago Illustrated is a successful continuation of that publication. "Crosby's Opera House" and the "Jesuit Church," the two foremost Illustrations contained in this number, are handsomely executed.

"DOCTOR KEMP," just published by the American News Company, is a very clever novel. It is full of original humor, and tells exceedingly well "The Story of a Life with a Blemish." The Company also publishes Dr. C. C. Schieferdecker's pamphlet on "the Nature, Prevention and Cure of Cholera."

Two new books appear from Carleton's: "Recommended to Mercy," an interesting English novel; and "Adrift in Dixie," by a Yankee officer; a book which will be read with gratification by every man who has aided in effecting the work of Emancipation.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A private letter from Newbern, N. C., says that at the United States District Court, now in session in that city, a white man has just been convicted of passing counterfeit national currency, a black man having been the principal, if not the only witness against him. The writer, speaking of such testimony, says: "This marks a new era in the history of North Carolina, under the Civil Rights principle."

—— A large eagle having for some time annoyed the people of Atlantic county, New Jersey, by killing their lambs, it was shot by Hope W. Gandy, Jr., in the vicinity of Tuckahoe, one day last week. It measured seven feet seven inches between the tips of the wings.

—— The editor of a new paper in Nebraska begins his introductory article with the following sentence: "The object in view in the establishment of this paper, is the procuring of means wherewith to buy bread and butter and good clothes."

—— The Fall River (Mass.) News says: "Mr. Isaac Barker, of Tiverton, R. I., was in town lately, wearing clothing with silver buttons over 200 years old. In company with his brother, Peleg Barker, he owns a house in Pembroke, 12 miles from Plymouth, which is 299 years old. It is still inhabited, has always been in their family, and is believed to be the oldest house in the United States."

—— The oldest church now existing in this country, is situated near Smithfield, Isle of Wight County, Va. It was built in the reign of Charles I., between the years 1630 and 1635. The brick and lime and timber were imported from England. The timber is English oak, and was framed in England. The structure is of brick, erected in the most substantial manner. The mortar has become so hardened that it will strike fire in collision with steel.

—— A widow lady of Danville, Ky., took an orphan boy to raise, quite small, and when he arrived at the age of 18 she married him, she then being in her 50th year. They lived many years together, happy as any couple. Ten years ago they took an orphan girl to raise. Last fall the old lady died, being 96 years of age, and in seven weeks after the old man married the girl they had raised, he being 65 years old, and she 18.

—— The battle-field of Franklin, Tenn., where Hood's men fell by hundreds and were buried, has been rented by the proprietor to freedmen, and is about to be given to the plow. Every Southern State has its representative on this field, and their friends are endeavoring to secure means to remove the bodies before the traces of the graves are trampled out.

—— A correspondent, writing from Ballston, N. Y., thinks that mineral water may be obtained there equal in every respect to the Springs of Sarotoga. He states that the "stratum of lime rock which outcrops at Saratoga, and above which the mineral waters are found, has been discovered to lay embedded at the depth of about 600 feet in Ballston."

—— The Culpepper (Virginia) Observer says: "Mrs James Keith Taylor, the sister of Chief Justice Marshall, at a very advanced age, beloved and venerated by all around, is still living, and resides in Fauquier County."

—— A large cotton factory, called the "Manassas" manufactory, has been built at Carrollton, Miss. It contains 180,000 spindles, 1,300 looms, and will go into operation July 1st. The company owns 1,700 acres of land contiguous to the factory, all well wooded.

—— Governor Orr, of South Carolina, has expressed his opinion regarding the teaching of freed people. He believes it is good for them and good for the State. He says the teachers shall be protected in their duties, and that the prejudice against them and their occupation is disappearing.

—— A plan for the vault of the Washington Cemetery, intended for the reception of the Union dead who fell on the battle-fields of Virginia, has been approved by the Quartermaster-General. It will be circular in shape, with an interior diameter of 20 feet, and covered with a hemispherical arch or dome. In the top of this dome will be an elliptical opening, covered with a stone tablet, on which proper inscriptions may be made. The vault will be divided into four compartments by two cross walls intersecting at right angles. The remains of Union soldiers are generally distinguished from those of the rebels by the buttons on their uniforms, and sometimes by the descriptions of the deceased enclosed in sealed bottles, which, toward the close of the war, were interred with the bodies of our dead heroes for subsequent identification by their friends or relatives.

—— Col. J. W. Burke, of the 10th Ohio, has published a statement of the sufferings of the people for food in North Alabama. He says the destitution extends through all those counties lying south of the Tennessee River, and constituting what is called the mountain region of Alabama. The close of the war found the people destitute even of the necessaries of life, and last year, no rain falling throughout that region, their slender crops were burnt to a crisp by the fierce rays of the sun. Without money, crops, or any resources whatever, the people have been reduced to a state of suffering which equals in ghastliness the horrid scenes of the Irish famine years.

—— There is on exhibition at Baltimore a model, some 12 feet in diameter, of a revolving vessel, the invention of Mr. George T. Snyder, of Lancaster, Penn. The great novelty embraced in the construction of this vessel consists in a very simple application of the motive power, by which the vessel is made to roll over the water instead of running through it, and so completely arranged that passengers and freight remain stationary, while the hull of the vessel is rapidly revolving.

—— The ladies of Columbus, Miss., recently decorated the graves of the Confederate dead in the cemetery of that city. They also paid the same mark of respect to the memory of some 40 Federal soldiers buried near by. This act elicits the approval of the press of that city, which claims that, the war being over, no distinction should be made between the departed heroes of opposite sides.

—— There are 16 iron-clads now in process of construction, three of them in New York, three at Cincinnati, two each at St. Louis and Pittsburgh, and one each at Boston, Portsmouth, Philadelphia, Brownsville, Pa., and Kensington, Pa.

—— In 1860 the commercial railroads within the United States had a total length of 30,793 miles, and cost $1,151,530,820, and the city railroads had a length of 402 miles, and cost $14,862,840. The latter depend no more completely upon the home travel of Americans for their passenger receipts than do the former upon American home labor for their freight receipts. The earnings of both come almost wholly from home support. And the stockholders who have invested $2,000,000,000 in these roads have, for every dollar they have put in, a direct personal interest in building up American manufactures into a permanent and prosperous system.

—— A case involving the legal and constitutional right of polygamy is in process in Salt Lake City. A Gentile married a lady who was claimed as the wife in polygamy of one of the Mormon leaders. The lady, fearing that her children would be claimed by the Mormon, brought the case directly before the United States Court. It was postponed, and in the interim her new husband was shot dead while in the company of the United States Marshal, and in open daylight.

—— A bill has been brought into the Legislature of California to make an annual appropriation of $5,000 to the Bay View Stock Association, in consideration of their having established a race-course near San Francisco, and thus done their utmost toward the improvement of the horses there. The $5,000 in question is to be distributed in racing premiums; and the San Francisco Bulletin thinks that such a disposition of the money will do more good than is effected by $5,000 to the State Fair, at which it says faro, monte, and rouge et noir are as prominent as the mammoth pumpkins and gigantic beets.

—— The Rome (Ala.) Courier says that a meeting of the planters was called at Centre, Cherokee County, a few days since, for the purpose of ascertaining the actual wants of the people. About 100 men were present, five-sixths of whom before the war had been thrifty farmers. Of this number only seven reported that they had corn enough to do them until the wheat harvest; for a bushel of corn they now offer a bushel of wheat after harvest, or 10 pounds of cotton next Christmas. It is the impression of the editor that 50,000 bushels of corn could be disposed of in Rome on these terms in two weeks.

—— The electric telegraph is to be introduced into China, and Dr. MacGowan has been appointed to proceed forth, as its commissioner and engineer, to connect Pekin and Canton. He will be accompanied by a staff of telegraphers, and will employ a system which he long ago devised, by which messages can be transmitted in hieroglyphic characters.

—— A criminal, confined in the jail at Ravenna, Ohio, recently becoming obstreperous and unmanageable, was effectually quieted by the injection into his cell of two pounds of chloroform. He was then pinioned, and within 18 minutes of the time the experiment began, he was fully restored to consciousness.

—— A tragedy, rendered especially shocking by the attendant circumstances, occurred last week in Hawkins county, Tenn. Rev. R. M. Hickey was preaching the funeral sermon of a rebel soldier. While the sermon was progressing, two brothers, named Walters, manifested a disposition to disturb the audience. Eldridge Hand, a citizen of that neighborhood, remonstrated with them, and an angry quarrel ensued. In the midst of it, one of the brothers drew a pistol on Hand, wounding him severely in the thigh. Upon this Sam Smith, a soldier, killed Walters upon the spot. The other brother then opened fire upon Smith, slightly wounding him. Smith returned the fire, and the second brother fell mortally wounded.

Foreign.—The Paris correspondent of the London Telegraph writes: "The one great object of my admiration in Paris is the bonnet—its ever-changing shape, its splendor, its disappearance, and its 'dark days of nothingness.' What do you think bonnets were yesterday? Not crepe, nor tulle, nor silk, nor satin, nor velvet, nor straw. No, nothing but flowers. I saw one lady with a bonnet of daisies, and another who had on her head a handful of lilies of the valley, festooned with green ribbon. If it really is anything, a bonnet can scarcely be less than a few lilies of the valley, which at Florence would cost half a Paul. Another lady had a wreath of wallflowers."

—— During the last six months of 1865, there were killed in the southern provinces of India the following wild animals: tigers, 359; leopards, 516; bears, 293; wolves, 99; hyenas, 286; making in all 1,553, for which 23,551 rupees have been expended. The number of animals killed is larger than the number killed during the preceding year, the rainy season of 1864, but it is somewhat less than the results attained in the corresponding half year of 1864.

—— A curious family has just been established in the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris. In an iron cage have been placed a young lioness, an Algerian wild boar, and a little dog. The last is quite the master, the lioness generally amusing herself with teasing the boar. When, however, the lioness goes too far, the dog interferes and re-establishes order.

—— The Sultan of Turkey has directed the translation of the Koran to be made, so that every educated Turk may read it for himself in his own language. The Koran has never before been put into the hands of its believers in any other form than its native Arabic, and strict Mohammedans regard the translation as impious. When remonstrated with, the Minister of the Sultan replied that Christians are translating their sacred books and placing them in the hands of the Turks, and that he is doing this as a means of self-defense.

—— Money is very scarce in Russia, and 72 per cent. is frequently charged for money loaned. Immense numbers of estates are announced for sale, but no purchasers present themselves. The most important commerce of the Russian empire, that of cereals, is at a complete stand still, there being no demand for exportation.

—— At a recent great steeple-chase, near Liverpool, 30 horses started; all the favorites were beaten, and the winner was a gaunt outsider, whose owner quietly pocketed $135,000 by the race.

—— A well educated man—a student of medicine—died a miserable death in London recently, from habitually eating opium and drinking as a regular beverage a mixture of spirits of wine, 5½ per cent. over proof, and wood naptha.

—— There has just died at Preston, England, a man named George Ward, who was said to be the oldest Oddfellow in the world. He was born in 1789, and for 60 years worked for the principal manufacturing firm in Preston. The period of his initiation as an Oddfellow was September 25th, 1815. He was the first Prov. G.M. of the Preston district, and was one of those who signed the first "dispensation" that went to America. In the early days of the Oddfellowship he was in the habit every quarter of walking from Preston to Manchester and back again—a distance of about 60 miles—for the purpose of obtaining the password, which he delivered to the districts on his route when returning. Since his initiation there have been 5,383 Oddfellows' lodges opened.

—— In Berlin, Prussia, there were in the year 1865 no less than 285,000 executions levied by the constables on the goods of poor debtors, whereby their furniture and other trifles were seized and sold for the benefit of their creditors. Eight hundred of such procedures a day, and that in the capital where the king, the aristocracy and officers are spending their money! Oh, there is something more than rotten in Europe; and who wonders that millions are looking for rescue from their misery, for help, and a brighter future to the blessed shores of our country?

—— Mr. S. Millbank has published some reminiscences of Gibson, the sculptor. He says: "Gibson told me that at the first sitting her Majesty gave him for the great statue in Westminster Hall, she hardly spoke at all, evidently desirous to know what sort of a man he was. Upon all future occasions he said the Queen was extremely affable, and deigned to laugh heartily at some of his stories. One day he said to her, with his peculiar naiveness: 'Madam, I was born a thief.' 'A thief, Mr. Gibson?' 'Yes, madam; for, when a child, I stole an apple from the stall of an old woman with a wooden leg. My mother found me out, took me back to the old woman, and begged her to beat me with her crutch, which she did lustily. I never stole more.' 'Ah!' replied her Majesty, 'a great deal of sorrow was brought into the world by the apple.'"

—— The first meeting of the new society, recently formed in Paris, for the purpose of undertaking a new translation of the Bible, took place in the large hall of the Sorbonne, M. Amedee Thierry, senator and member of the Institute, in the chair. Among the speakers there were, in addition to the chairman, a Catholic curé, a Jewish rabbi, and a Protestant pastor. The utmost harmony prevailed, and everything calculated to lead to differences of opinion was carefully avoided.

—— At Salon, a little town in Provence, France, there is a pneumato-electric organ. The electric fluid has no influence either on the intensity, note or pitch of the sound of the instrument. It only replaces a system of complicated levers by one of insulated wires, instantaneous in their action. The current proceeding from the electric battery is conducted by metallic wires under the keys, by the action of which it is placed in communication with the valves of the organ.

—— The Paris Moniteur contains a list of 300 medals, namely, 18 in gold, 178 in silver, 112 in bronze, given by the Emperor, at the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture, to the physicians who proved during the late visitation of cholera their zeal and devotedness in the care of the sick. The Moniteur points out 122 instances of private heroism on that occasion, which proves that, notwithstanding the silence observed by the official papers during the visitation, it was of a sufficiently serious nature to justify the public alarm.

—— The following anecdote is told in Berlin: At a ball given recently, on the 17th birthday of the daughter of one of the noblest families, a mysterious figure—a monk mask—entered the saloon precisely at midnight, and disappeared after having presented the young lady with a basket of flowers. On examining the contents, an ebony coffin was found, inlaid with silver, containing a bridal wreath, an arrow piercing a lily, and paper on which was written, "A greeting from the world of shadows." It should be added that, though the mother became insensible, the young Countess did not lose her presence of mind, but continued dancing, and betrayed no emotion whatever.

PROF. TYNDALL ON HEAT.—At the London Royal Institution, Prof. Tyndall has been delivering a course of lectures on "Heat," to large audiences. He states that, as heat is simply the vibration of the ultimate particles of all bodies, the less that vibration, the greater the sensation of cold. Ice contains much heat, and will liquify and boil solid carbonic acid. There is no evidence that any substance on this earth has ever been deprived of all its heat, but the point at which that result is obtained is believed to be 273 degrees below the zero of the centigrade scale. The professor charged the lecture-room largely with moisture, and in the course of his experiments formed clouds, snow, ice, and hoar frost. By artificial means he imitated the geysers of Iceland, a great flood of hot water and steam shooting up through a hole in the middle of a large iron basin. Finally, he reproduced, on a large scale, the Strokr, an irritable boiling spring, which exerts its powers whenever lumps of dirt or large stones are dropped into its mouth.

THE CONFEDERATE CEMETERY UNDER CONSTRUCTION AT WINCHESTER, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY JAS. E. TAYLOR.

CONFEDERATE CEMETERY AT WINCHESTER.

Now that the war is ended, and the fierce storms engendered by the conflict have subsided and are forgotten, a common humanity directs universal attention to the remains of those who fell in the struggle, and were, for a time, neglected. Adjoining the people's cemetery at Winchester, a lot of five acres has been secured as a burial place for Southern soldiers who were killed in the various battles near that place. In the centre of the lot is an Oblong, divided into four angles, in which the unknown dead will be deposited. A monument is to be erected at the intersection of these angles. The different States are to be represented by the squares into which the remainder of the lot is divided. Already 750 bodies are interred, and within a year it is expected that 3,000 will here find a resting-place.

The scheme of establishing this Cemetery originated with the ladies of the South, who are making active exertions to complete it and collect and bury within it the bodies of their soldiers, and, they hope within a year, to have their noble work accomplished.

DRAG-HUNT IN IRELAND.

THE practice is adopted in Ireland, and perhaps elsewhere, of dragging a red-herring along a particular line of country, in order to get up a mock chase when reynard or other subjects of sport cannot be got to rise. A hunt of this description, which is portrayed in our engraving, took place recently in the county of Dublin, and excited a very large amount of interest. It was expected to produce considerable sport, and those who drove to Ashbourne on the occasion were by no means disappointed. The day was clear, and the sun shone brightly; but there was a bitter wind from the north, and all the wrappers and overcoats of the sight-seers were called into requisition. There was no lack of excitements, nor were any of the amusing accessories of a great sporting event wanting. There was a large muster of turtles and betting-men; and the race of the day caused considerable speculation although, from the immense number of entries, the issue was more than doubtful.

The arrangements made by the stewards were admirable. A fine course of nearly four miles was chosen, commencing at the eight-mile stone, on the Ashbourne road, and terminating at the Fairy House, which commanded a fine view of the finish of the race. As this was the first drag-hunt held under the auspices of the gentlemen of the Ward Hunt, it would have been rather injudicious that all the fences should have been up to the standard. But there were some very difficult leaps, and not a few of the starters came to grief before they had completed the first mile. The course was nearly straight, and there were some capital adjacent standpoints, from which the spectators saw the running to great advantage.

Half-past two arrived, and every one stood on tiptoe and strained the eyes to ward Ashbourne, but for ten minutes or a quarter o. an hour there was no sign of the red-coats. Then the cry of the hounds was heard at a distance, and presently a man was seen running through the field, trailing something covered up in canvas at the end of a long string. There were the herrings; but where were the hounds? The scarlet coats were seen in less than a minute, and a long string of riders descended a little eminence about half a mile away, led by ten lengths or so by some one on a chestnut horse. The crowd scattered away, and about 40 horses, separated by long intervals, crossed Morrin's field as a pace by no means rapid. The ditch brought one or two to grief; but the chestnut was still leading, and his rider took matters exceedingly cool, as he well might, for his seemed about the freshest and best horse in the field. At length two or three couple of hounds, completely puzzled, showed among the last horses; but by this time the hunt was over and the prizes were won.

A DRAG HUNT IN IRELAND.

CROSSING THE LAVA FIELDS IN ICELAND.

It is only within a few years that Iceland has become a point of interest to travelers, and its wondrous scenery introduced to the lovers of the picturesque. No portion of the world possesses greater attraction to the visitor, while its volcano, its geysers, and the quaint and simple manners of its people, are a constant source of amusement and instruction to the tourist.

Our illustration presents a view of the desolating effects of a volcanic eruption, and shows a party of travelers crossing the lava-fields extending around the base of the mountain. To one who has never traversed such a district, it would be difficult to convey a just idea of the scene presented by the chaos of ridges and pinnacles, and wave-like swells of lava, which, torn and separated by cavernous rents, cover an area of many miles. Perhaps one may liken it to a sea of breakers, that, during the raging of a hurricane, has been suddenly turned to stone, or, as regards outline and form, to a glacier, in a part where it is most crevassed. The lava is of a brownish purple tint, and covered, to a great extent, with a carpeting of hoary moss, thick and soft as a cushion. Nature has left a serpentine track, or route, by which the clever Icelandic ponies cross from side to side of the field, bearing their riders safely over apparently impassable barriers.

MAJ.-GEN. NATHANIEL P. BANKS.

THIS gentleman, who occupies, at this moment the distinguished and responsible position of Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, is no exception to the rule that our most eminent men are the creations of our institutions, and spring from what in other countries are called "the humble classes." The exceptional public character of eminence is he who has sprung from any other sphere; and partial biographers, if they would seek to deduce anything from such ventitious circumstances of birth or fortune, would be obliged to say, "although born of an old and wealthy family, etc., he nevertheless rose to be, etc., etc." There would be something singular and novel in this; but to say of the hero that he carried grain to the mill, like Clay, or mowed grass, like Webster, or split rails, like Lincoln, or wound "bobbins," like Banks, would be only to repeat, with trifling variations, the story of nearly every public man, or, for that matter, of every author, artist, or merchant of distinction in America.

With the remark, then, that Gen. Banks was born in Waltham, Mass., in 1816, and that he became an editor in Lowell, and after six ineffectual efforts was elected a member of the lower branch of the Massachusetts Legislature in 1849, of which he became Speaker in 1850, we come to his real entry into public life in 1853.

In December of that year he took his seat in the national Capitol as a Representative from Massachusetts in the Thirty-third Congress, to which he had been elected on the joint nomination of the Democratic and of the American parties. In the debate on the Kansas-Nebraska Bill he took high rank as a forcible speaker, commanding the attention of the House, and demonstrated that the Federal Government was changed from its original purposes, not merely to a recognition but to a propagandism of slavery. He also advocated in an able speech the abolition of military supervision of the National armories, because hey were not military, but mechanical departments. He did not see any more connection between the manufacture of arms and the military departments of Government, than between the manufactures of cloth for uniforms, or of the paper on which bulletins were printed, and the same departments.

Mr. Banks was re-elected to the Thirty-fourth Congress which commenced its first session amid scenes of unprecedented excitement attending the election of a Speaker. For nine weeks the organization of the House was protracted by the dogged obstinacy of party men, the complications of party views, and the manœuvering of party leaders. At last—on the 133d ballot—Mr. Banks was elected by a plurality of three votes, and was escorted to the chair by his opponent, Mr. Aiken, of South Carolina. After thanking the House for the honor conferred upon him, the newly-elected Speaker said: "I have no personal objects to accomplish. I am animated by the single desire that I may in some degree aid in maintaining the well-established principles of our Government in their original and American signification; in developing the material interests of that portion of the continent we occupy, so far as we may do so within the limited and legitimate powers conferred upon us."

Mr. Banks was re-elected to the Thirty-fifth Congress, but resigned at the first month of the first session, having been chosen Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by a plurality of 34,000 votes. This position he filled with such honor and ability, that he was re-elected in 1858 and again in 1859. While he occupied the gubernatorial chair, he did much to improve the educational and philanthropic institutions of Massachusetts, and—in view of the coming conflict which he saw was impending—he re-organized the volunteer militia of the State. The regiments of Massachusetts volunteers which hastened to the Capital in April, 1861, had been organized, equipped, and drilled under the direction of Nathaniel P. Banks as commander-in-chief. In 1859 he assembled all the volunteer militia of the State at an encampment on the historical fields of Concord, and of the 7,000 or 8,000 men there engaged in mimic warfare for three days, over 5,000 afterward rallied around the flag of our Union, and over 2,000 fell in its defense.

In 1860 Gen. Banks accepted an offer from the Illinois Central Railroad to become its principal executive officer, and he removed to Chicago, but when the war broke out, he was one of the first to take the field. His record as Maj. Gen. of Volunteers has yet to be written, when the obstacles which he had to encounter from subordinates "educated at West Point" can be stated, and when the political jealousies of the times can be made known. President Lincoln always used to call him his "general who made no trouble," so just were his actions, and so impartial was he in his treatment of civilians. At Baltimore in the Shenandoah Valley—or while in command of Louisiana—Gen. Banks displayed the same ability which had marked the previous stages of his career. Fortune did not always favor him, but he won the affection of the troops who served under him, and commanded the respect of his enemies.

Returning to Massachusetts from Louisiana in the fall of 1862, Gen. Banks was unexpectedly and immediately re-nominated for the House of Representatives, to the disgust of several politicians who were scrambling for the place. The people elected him as they had before, by a triumphant majority, and on taking his seat in the House he was placed at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. His first speech, on his return to the congressional arena, was in favor of having the United States properly represented at the International Exposition in 1867 and thus enabled to honor ably compete for the palm of invention in all those industrial arts which contribute most essentially to the glory of our race. They confer more substantial glory on individuals and on nations than the trophies of unnecessary warfare, which are always bedewed with tears and stained with blood.

Gen. Banks is a grave and earnest speaker, who never fails to command attention, and to interest while he instructs. He is of middle-size, rather spare in form, with features which indicate power of will. When he speaks, there is no attempt at display, no apparent labor, but as he progresses, the ignorant are astonished that what seemed unintelligible has become suddenly self-evident, and the stupid are charmed with the consciousness of their awakened powers of perception.

CROSSING THE LAVA FIELD OF THE RAPELLA RAVEN, ICELAND

THE HANGBIRD'S NEST.

BY ALFRED B. SWEET.

Oh! the hangbird hangs his hammock high
On the top of the sapple dome!
The nearer the hangbird climbs the sky
The better he is at home.
He whistles and whistles as he works,
And his hammock is presently hung;
And then how he flutters and blinks and jerks!
For his thoughts are full of his young.
Oh! the hangbird, the hangbird!
When his hammock well is hung,
How he prides his feathers and winds his head!
For his thoughts are full of his young!

Oh! the hangbird comes with the summer bine,
For his is a tender frame!
And his plumage is steeped in the glowing hue,
Where the sun gleams ever in flame.
He comes when only the dogwood flowers,
In the beautiful month of June,
Then, then, in the depth of the wild-wood bowers
You list his melodious tune!
Oh! the hangbird, the hangbird!
He comes with the soft warm moon
With the rose of the garden and sunlight shower,
To sing his melodious tune.

All through the summer the hangbird stays,
In his yellow and satin dress;
And by-and-by, faint, through the lovely days
Chirpings are heard in the nest.
Oh! then how the hangbird flutters and sings,
And launches abroad for food!
Oh! then how the hangbird quivers his wings
For joy in the loneliest wood.
Oh! the hangbird, the hangbird!
When chirps his little brood,
How proudly he flutters and merrily sings,
And away to the loneliest wood.

Oh! the hangbird, he waits not for winter to frown,
Nor the hasty little flurry of snow;
When the feddlings are reared, then away, away down
The warm South his wings blithesomely go.
Away, away down, where the summer's bright crown
Is never displaced by the cold;
Where the blossoms bloom ever and winter comes never,
And all smiles in green and in gold.
Oh! the hangbird, the hangbird!
When the clouds from the North are rolled,
Then comes he with strain, hangs his hammock again,
As June smiles in green and in gold.

ROSENTHAL.

BY M. ELIZABETH PERRY.

SALOME BROCKE stood on the steps of the orphan asylum which had sheltered her young head since her father died, looking at the long rows of windows, the slope of lawn straying above the white palings, and then with a dry sob turned to the matron.

"Good-by, ma'am," she said; "you've been very kind to me, and I thank you!"

"Good-by, my poor child! Be a good girl and God will take care of you."

"Indeed, Mrs. Mason, I'll try to be good," sobbed the orphan, and went her way, leaving behind her the only friend, almost the only acquaintance she had in the world.

It was a sweet, bright, windy, shrill-sighing day in late-June, and looked out of the deep-set, solemn eyes. Her mother had only kissed her baby, and then died; her father had been a talented pianist, with all the deep pathos, the dreamy passion, of Germany, and all its inclination to skeptical mysticism and reckless dissipation. He loved his daughter, and left her as an inheritance a musical genius equal to his, and a knowledge of the piano, to a total exclusion of every other branch of education. By dint of studying the titles of books and street placards, between her music lessons, Salome had first learned to read. A lodger in the opposite garret had taught her to write and spell; then her father suddenly died, and the thirteen years' old waif, quick refuge in the asylum, till a home could be found for her. She was just going to the place procured.

Gravely she traversed the pavements where the autumn sunlight lay in mottled shine and shadow, till she reached a handsome part of the city; tall houses, with hanging cornices and rich carving, and a quaint air of old-fashioned aristocracy, rose a little back from the street, and shielded their windows and piazzas with clusters of late flowering cereals, Cherokee roses and the stately splendor of blossoming oleanders.

Before one of them, the oldest and handsomest of all, Salome paused an instant before ringing the bell. Then with nervous fingers she seized the silver knob, and trembled when the great door opened in answer to her summons.

A dark-faced man, followed by three others, came into the hall.

"Well, child, what do you want?" he asked, almost gruffly.

"I am come to live with Mrs. Liscombe, sir. Will you tell me where to find her?" Salome's full, rich voice and earnest eyes demanded a considerate answer.

"You rang the wrong bell!" then turning to the others, "excuse me, gentlemen, while I show this young lady to the housekeeper's room."

They went through the hall in silence. Stopping at a closed door—

"What is your name?" the gentleman asked, abruptly.

"Salome Brocke, sir."

"And what, pray, is Mrs. Liscombe going to do with you?"

"I am to help her, and look after Miss Elise."

"And who is going to look after you?"

"I always take care of myself, sir."

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said he, bowing with mock deference. "Lot me advise you, however, to let Miss Elise learn to do the same. Mary"—he added, opening the door—"this Liscombe, allow me to present Miss Brocke."

With a quizzical laugh, he gently pushed the girl into a large, and comfortable room, where a matron of forty-five years, with an ample, comely person, came forward to greet the stranger.

"Come in, my dear; I've been expecting you," she said, "but where did Mr. Rosenthal pick you up?"

"I met him and others in the hall, ma'am."

"Ah! you should have rung the servants' bell." Then the lady went on, in a pleasant, gossipy way.

"Well, child, I hope you will be very happy and comfortable with us; there are two servants, but you may, if you like, assist Hannah with Miss Elise. Miss dines here, except when she can coax her uncle to let her sit at table with his friends. She generally breakfast with him; you must not mind eating one meal alone. Here comes Elise. This is Salome, my dear," she said to a girl who came into the room, a song trilling from her red lips, the long feathery curls of her golden hair making an aureole of radiance round her head which sprang and clipped to the tune she sang; and then, seeing Salome stand waiting before her, she sprang forward, and slipping her little hand in hers, said:

"How do you do, Salome? Mrs. Liscombe says you are an orphan, and I am one, too; so I mean to love you dearly. Come, kiss me, will you?"

Salome wrapped her arms around the slender child, and as she kissed the laid on those upturned lips, she sealed a love pact of unlooked-for kindness, and tender as her own sensitive heart.

Of nearly the same age, the contrast between them could hardly have been greater. Elise small and delicately formed, but all aglow with vivid, living color and motion unrestrained, Salome was tall, bending a little for shame, as though her young shoulders felt their burden; her hair black as ink, without ripple or gloss, folded smoothly back from a forehead massive in its proportions, and almost too broad and high for the temples; across it the black brows almost met in a straight line above the deep-set eyes, dark, thoughtful, almost to sombreness. Her dress was as different as their persons; the one robed in floating muslins looped with delicate ribbons, her white throat and shoulders partially bare and dimpled; the other clad in dull black; not an atom of complexion visible, save her colorless face and large, dark hands.

Mrs. Liscombe's heart went out in motherly sympathy to the quiet girl who had come among them to be a servant, but whose beauty was likely to be a favorite; and she resolved to speak to Mr. Rosenthal concerning her; indifferent and haughty as he was, he might object to this new inmate of his house.

While she was thinking, Elise was talking to and addressing Salome.

"Come with me and I will show you the rooms and the garden," she said; "that is, if you would like it—shall you?"

"Perhaps I ought not," Salome answered, looking toward the housekeeper.

"Yes, go! do what I tell you. Miss Elise like to-day," was the reply; and the two went hand in hand through a glass door into a long terrace, where the scent of heliotrope and dying roses breathed the faint odor of bloom and decay; down below the broad steps were bordered by clear waters into a marble basin, and kept up a perpetual music of gush and ripple.

Salome sat down on the steps, and taking a cluster of flowers which Elise gave her, pressed them to her lips to hide their quivering; the sense of pleasure she felt in this beautiful spot was so exquisite, it was almost pain.

She questioned Elise about the books she studied, and decided to her how intense was her own wish to be educated.

"Yes, it is nice to go to school," Elise assented, "if I do get awful tired sometimes; and when Uncle Maurice doesn't pity me a bit; and when I tell him I hate music-lessons, his eyes blaze like fire, and I run to Mrs. Liscombe."

"But you can't dislike music!" cried Salome.

"Oh! how I love it! The beautiful melodious tunes! Poor papa, if I could only hear you sing and play for me again!"

All her delicate orphanhood came over her, and her whole figure bent and swayed under the storm of sobs her recollections excited. Salome, pale and wondering, tried to soothe her; she headed nothing until a strong hand raised her to her feet, and a voice, gentle but authoritative, commanded:

"Hush! Salome, hush! You must not cry that way, let what will be the matter."

It was Rosenthal who struggled with her wild emotion a moment; then, shutting her white lips together, stood before him.

"Come with me, child," he said, and taking a hand of each, led them into a room, whose book-shelves, paper-strewn tables, and antique chairs betokened a place devoted to study and ease.

Mrs. Liscombe so used to come wine, filled," said Rosenthal, putting Salome in a great, gulf of a chair which swallowed the dark little figure, all save the pallid face, with its sombre eyes.

When she was comfortable he left her, and pressing the room, opened a sudden, stirring first a firm chord here and there; then his fingers moved gently, along the key-board, as though they were touching some living, sentient thing, which pulsed and quivered like a heart in pain; then, when Salome's tirst lips relaxed and her sombre eyes grew soft, the full swell of harmony swept up from the instrument, caressing and enfolding the desolate soul of the orphan. Rosenthal played upon that melodious just as he did everything else—to perfection; just as he had always played on women's hearts and men's passions, making their chords and strings answer at his will.

Every nerve in Salome Brocke's body was alive to her touch; it clutched and embraced her in a dream of wondrous peace.

Elise came in with the wine, and Rosenthal went to her, with a tenderness and solicitude in the stress dropped from her fingers, while she scrambled herself to the instrument, and then the delicious accompaniment of voice mounted aloft in that sweetest, saddest chant that ever was uttered in words—"By the Rivers of Babylon."

All the longing, the heart-sickness, the tenderness of memory, and hopelessness of despair, which throughout the entire glance of the eternal love of the Father prophesied a long delayed peace—all this sobbed, and panted, and prayed in that utterance of a burdened soul.

Wonder and admiration kept her auditors silent, till the last notes pulsed through the room, and then Rosenthal, with his rare sweet smile on the cold mouth, looked at Salome without a word for many minutes. Elise threw her arms round the child's neck and caressed and cried out with a flood of childlike praises; but the man, with a wondrous light in his dusky eyes, led Salome from the instrument to a sofa, and standing near her, asked gently:

"Who taught you to play like that, child?"

"My father, sir."

"And who was he—a musician?"

"Yes; he played the piano for concerts."

"And who was your father intended to do—play for concerts, too, perhaps?"

"I am to be Mrs. Liscombe's servant, I suppose, sir."

"Rather a doubtful supposition that, Miss Salome," said Rosenthal. "Have you ever been to school?"

"No; I used to go to Miss Richard's room and hear her read poetry, though. I like that," she said, decidedly.

"Oh, you do! Will you tell me which of the poets you like best—your favorite preference?"

Salome noted the irony in his voice, and a look in her sombre eyes warned him not to go too far.

"I like all the poetry I understand, for that is nothing that he or Elise could say overcame the cold reticence with which she surrounded herself.

Long after the two children had gone to the housekeeper's room, Rosenthal sat there, all the while pondering over the dark, clear-cut face; a shadow of grave thoughtfulness brought out the latent tenderness of a countenance which expression, in its usual nature, half concealed. Beyond most men, Rosenthal's stern forehead and cynical mouth told of a thousand battles in which honor and manhood had been set against lust and passion. Looking at him, you knew he had been no near the fires of hell that its flames scorched and blistered whatever they touched. Even the remembrances of places that had sullied his life like plague-spots; days and nights at the fevered gaming-table, where the cold brain grew haggard, and hot with wine and excitement; hours in drinking-saloons, where the fetid breath of iniquity mingled with the sickening perfume of crushed flowers, where the chandeliers glanced with the diamonds and the eyes of bold-browed women, and beauty, wine, and music were poured out as incense unto strange gods.

All these memories had stamped his face with the thoughts in his heart—that made him doubt and smile with sardonic grimness as the chivalry of youth and the romance of manhood sprang up in young women. He looked at human nature through the lens of his own passions and the work the they had wrought, the estimate of mankind brought its own punishment; for what other thing can so set into and canker the soul as that eternal doubt of humanity which fosters envy and evil, turning over, with infidel and sacrilegious fingers, all that is lovely and holy, to find, if possible, the worm that is in the bud of every life? Heaven keep me from looking on the world through such spectacles!

Rosenthal's memory went out to Salome as he thought of her in lone orphanage—friendless, homeless, but for him. Under it all he saw the warm, passionate woman nature, strong and capable, he knew; but he asked himself, again and again, if the incongruities would not develop with all the rest? Should he take her into his care, shew her the fresh, sweet side of life, nature in its beauty and truth, and then know, as he must, it gave her the power, if she chose to use it, of singing him with ingratitude, and make of him a twofold traitor? Under it all he cursed as he thought. At last he strode across the room, and looking at his face in the mirror—

"Confound it, will you be a cursed fool once more?" he asked himself fiercely; then, with a pleasant laugh—

"Thank I will, your excellency," he answered.

In a moment his clanging bell brought Mrs. Liscombe to the library.

"Is there a spare room in order, madam?" he asked.

Questingly."

"Be kind enough to conduct Miss Salome Brocke to it; give her possession, and order the servants to serve her as they do Miss Elise!"

"S—i—r?" stammered the astonished housekeeper.

"You will not question, but attend to my request," he went on, coldly. "In the meantime, send the girl to me."

"What does the man mean?" she muttered; but knowing from experience it was useless to ask an explanation until her master chose to give it, she had nothing to do but obey.

Almost before she knew it, Salome's grave face looked up into his; he held a hand toward her, which her shrinking palm touched like a bird, a sweet look stole into his eyes and was reflected in her upturned countenance.

"Do you think you can believe in and trust me, child?" he asked.

It was a long, searching gaze which dived down to the very depths of his thoughts.

"I am sure I can, sir," she answered, gravely.

"Then listen to me. From this time you will share with Elise the privilege that I promised you long for an education, it shall be yours. Whatever you want that is unprovided you will ask for without hesitation. In return, I shall require your confidence, and submission to the control I may choose to exercise over you. What have you to say, Salome?"

"Oh, sir, I am grateful—I can never tell how much I am!" she cried, with a sob of joy, and, like a father, in all possible thankfulness, cried the orphan, laying her cheek on the hand she held.

"I am glad you are tremulously child," said Rosenthal, smiling at her earnestness. "But come! We have had events enough for one day. My first command is that you go to the room Mrs. Liscombe will shew you, and rest two hours at least; then you may come to this room for the evening, if you like. I shall not be here; but remember, you are to use everything in it, at all times that it may please you to do so. And now, good-by, until tea-time!"

So saying he led her to the door, where she raised her eyes, thick with tears, to his, and the words of thanks that she tried to utter hung into gasping sobs. Poor Salome! It was so new a thing to be cared for like this!

CHAPTER II.

ONE—two—three—four—five! How the years drop away! Glad and sad—sorrow and mirth! Eternity gathers them all in her lap, and the evolutions of the universe mark the record of human destinies. Memorable years over their lessons, and forever go on their way, forgetting what they have taught. But, for a little time, would span the years, and a compassionate hand should grasp their secrets! That is what Maurice Rosenthal thought, as he stood gazing out at the moonless midnight, the same handsome gentleman he was five years agone—the same, save that his face was more set, more crossed in lines, and the cynical sneer of his lip seemed carving into sadness. His life, gay to the outside world, had been one succession of gentlemen and wine since Salome Brocke found her way to his heart—a tender heart, by the way, when once its crust of carelessness and suspicion was broken through. Salome repaid his affection with a reverential love and a respect that was almost fear. Rosenthal set his white teeth together, and with a definite purpose in his eyes, strode into the house, up stairs to the door of Salome's chamber; it was partially unclosed, and he paused to note the occupant. Absorbed in her reading, his light step had not disturbed her, and the intense, bewildered excitement she was undergoing, showed itself in the tightly clenched hand and painfully drawn lips. Suddenly dropping her face on the book with a low cry, she sobbed rather than spoke the words:

"Oh, Jean Paul! was your vision real—did you dream a truth? Is there, indeed, no law, no father, no God, but only chance? Who can tell—who can help me?"

There was a panting despair in voice and words, which smote Rosenthal like a dagger-thrust of accusation; the stern rebuke he had meditated melted into sympathy. Going forward and laying his hand on her shoulder:

"Salome!" he said; "Salome, my poor child! what is it?"

At the soft tones, she raised her eyes to his a moment, then:

"Oh, sir!" she began, "I am blinded and lost in interminable shadows! Mr. Rosenthal, you are years and years older than I—a thousand-fold wiser! I know you cast the Bible aside as unworthy belief. The system taught by the fishermen of Galilee is to you an absurdity. In God's name, tell me what you do believe! Where have your feet found a resting-place?"

"Hush! child, calm yourself!" said Rosenthal, in awful doubt how to answer this outburst. "Not by such visionary guides as this have I found safety. Salome, in Nature, in her sublime, unchanging laws and the never-failing accomplishment of their purposes, do I place my faith, such as it is. That there is something Infinite beyond her finite, I believe. But what it is, Infinity alone can comprehend; nor is it necessary. We suffer, we enjoy; we live and die; every son and daughter of earth shares the universal destiny. Why trouble ourselves to find the hand which impels it? The blows will be just as hard; the caresses just as sweet, if they come to us in ignorance, as though our aspirations were answered and the statue of truth stood unvailed before us!"

The girl looked at his troubled face, long and wistfully. He had evaded her appeal, and felt that she knew it, but what could he do?

"Sir," she said, "you yourself are not satisfied with this limited knowledge. You speak of visionary guides; true, they may be; the blind doubt and ignorance of human nature makes them so. But where shall I find anything more reliable? If revealed religion contradicts and condemns itself, how equally so do the systems of philosophy taught by the wisest, the noblest of men and sages, who have lived in all times since those primeval ages when men 'walked with God!'"

"Salome, I will tell you the truth. I am not satisfied; I do not know what I believe—I'm afraid not much of anything." He went on, with a regretful smile; "Your feet are as firm as mine; it took years of an experience, such as you can never have, to bring mine to these slippery places. In the study of my demi-goddess, Nature, I have sounded inexhaustible treasures of delight: they are alike open to you. Come, look at one of them."

Gently he led her to the window. Silently both gazed into the blue-black depths of the summer night. The stars, a million deep, seemed gathering their hosts and making ready to "sing together" in the morning. The breath of the south wind awoke, rustling the dark fringes of acacia trees, and wafting a subtle perfume of indescribable sweetness, fanned the hot cheek of the girl, and lifted the locks from the grave brow of the man. Suddenly a lurid, baleful light hovered over them, as though shaken from the wings of a spirit of evil. Bewildered, they stood a moment; then Salome, pointing upward, uttered a wild cry of terror—the building was on fire!

"Come!" Rosenthal cried; and winding his arms round Salome, he bore her swiftly down the broad stairs; in the hall he released her, but drawing her to him again, a strange light flooded his passionate eyes, and with a faint smile:

"My darling!" he whispered, and pressed his lips just once to her smooth white forehead.

In a moment the alarm spread through the house; servants, half-clothed, rushed shrieking and terror-stricken to the spot where Salome still stood. At last:

"Elisé! Elisé!" she cried, and sprang toward the stairs. A strong arm thrust her back.

"I will save her!"

And Rosenthal bounded up the stairway, into a corridor, where even then the hungry flames roared and lapped their hissing tongues around him.

Salome, white as the dead, kneeled on the wet grass where they had carried her, and the first prayer she had uttered for years parted her dry lips:

"Save him! save him, Almighty God!"

She moaned again and again. The crash of falling walls, the fierce rush and roar of smoke and flames answered her. She knew no more.

CHAPTER III.

TICK! tick! tick! With slow steps Time dragged into Eternity. Ever and anon hoarse mutterings came from the curtained bed, and a pair of swathed hands were tossed wildly upward in the mad pain of delirium.

Blanched and quivering, Salome Brocke's face bent over the restless, fever-streaked one on the pillow, and her hand wandered softly through the damp hair tossed above it. Days and nights of fearful waiting had passed since Rosenthal, scathed and shriveled by the flames, had lain there, shorn of his strength, the pride of intellect conquered by the fetid hand of fever.

Then his soul bared many things to the knowledge of others, which had sat behind his closed lips for years; the names of persons and places, unknown to those about him, mingled with wild expressions of love an hate, of memory and repentance; then songs, sweet and deadly as those of the serpent charmer, plunged the hearer in a sea of sensuous delight, calling back dreams of the passion-plumed East, such as Heine's, when he wrote his sweet fanciful poem of the date-palm sighing and wasting for its hotter climed love.

This night Rosenthal's ravings were interrupted by long periods of almost breathless repose. Then the solitary watcher would hold her own breath, and count the weakening pulse-beats, a terrible fear contracting her heart-strings.

"Must he die thus?"

Unconsciously, in her agony, she spoke the words aloud.

"God forbid!" said a calm, strong voice beside her.

Startled, she turned toward it; then, with a sigh of relief:

"Thank God! you are come, Dr. King!" she exclaimed, giving him her place by the bedside.

He bent over Rosenthal. Never was a stronger contrast between two faces than those thus nearing each other. Rosenthal's pallid, sunken, half-opened, black-rimmed eyes, full of smoldering fire; his dark hair tossed in plumes of sable over the pillow, and the purple mouth muttering vaguely. Dr. King's, red and white, with his Saxon blood in his blue eye, tender as a woman's now, had yet a glint through which looked a healthy, steadfast soul; his yellow hair waved and drooped at will over a noble head; even his voice had in it the strength and repose which spoke from every joint and curve of his giant figure; limbed like a new Hercules, a manly grace, the outward symbol of the inner man, covered the whole with a mantle of gentle dignity.

"He is worse, is he not?" asked Salome.

"He will soon be better than we are, Miss Brocke. Nothing can save him," he added.

Shivering, Salome sank down on her knees.

"Must he die, like that?" she moaned. "Oh! God! Must he die?"

Dr. King looked at her with pitiful eyes; then, as though she were a child, he lifted her into the deep chair, and resting his hand on her bowed head:

"Salome—Miss Brocke!" he said, "listen to me. It is true, Rosenthal, your friend and guardian, will die—but rouse yourself! Where is the fortitude, the Christian faith, that looks beyond a gap of earth and sees the lost, immortal? You believe this; surely you believe this, Miss Brocke."

"No!" she cried, "I do not believe it! I believe nothing—know nothing—save that his body will go down into the grave and the clods of the valley will cover it! desolation will be written above it!"

Softly the voice from the bed repeated the words.

"For here we have no continuous city, but seek one to come," and then died out in a low whisper of death and weakness.

"And they that seek, shall surely find it!" said King, solemnly.

"Yes!" answered Salome, her tones full of bitterness. "Yes! and when they have found it, they shall read the name engraved over the gates, and it will be—Necropolis—the House of Silence—the City of the Dead!"

"Not so, Salome! Rather, Jerusalem—the Place of Safety—the City of the Great King!"

While he yet spoke, the chamber door opened, and a small figure glided in; it was Elisé, pale, fragile, her blue eyes wide and heavy with anxious grief. Instantly Salome was on her feet, all the weakness gone from her face, as she met the girl and said:

"Elisé! you should not be here, dear. I thought you asleep, long ago."

No, I wanted to come; I want to see Uncle Maurice," she said, going to the bed and gazing into his face with a strange, weird look in her own.

"I think he will die," she spoke at last, looking at the others with cold, unmeaning eyes. "Yes," she went on, "I think he will die soon. I am not sorry, because I shall go with him. I've a great pain here, Salome"—laying her hand on her heart—"a great pain, but it will not last long. I am so young, am I not? But, Uncle Maurice will be young there; so beautiful he is, too. Well, I'll just kiss him, and say, 'Good night!' I'm very tired. Good-by, uncle! Good night, Salome!" she said, slipping past them like a spirit.

"Let her go," whispered King, preventing Salome from touching her. "She is asleep."

"But I must send Mrs. Liscombe to her."

She did so, and that lady found Elisé lying in a deep slumber, pale as a snow-wreath—her hand still pressing her heart. Dr. King prepared a potion.

"Give her this when she wakes," he said; adding, under his breath, "If she ever does wake!"

Silently they watched out the heavy hours of the night. Salome sat with her face buried in her hands, listening to the short, fitful breathing of the dying man, while Dr. King noted every shade that crossed his features, and counted the failing pulse-beats; hours passed in monotonous stillness, broken only by the doctor, when he moistened the shrinking lips of his patient; then his eyes unclosed; at last the gleam of intelligence lighted them; but it was also the gleam of death.

Feebly motioning for King to draw nearer, he whispered words, of which Salome only heard the last; they were:

"Elisé—my daughter—tell her after it is over! I can trust you, King?"—he rested an instant. "Salome!" he called, softly.

Springing toward him, she covered his hand with kisses: and hard, dry sobs, shook her like a tempest.

"Salome—my darling!" he whispered. "Hush, child! You love me, Salome—you love me! And I—oh! God! Do I lose you thus, for ever? Oh! Eternity! I would give ages of thee for years of Time!"

Again he panted for breath—it was minutes before his whitening lips moved again.

"How is it with you, my friend?" asked King, wetting his mouth with a cordial. A wan, sweet smile, crossed Rosenthal's face.

"Once more I'll quote the books I have loved," he answered, and in a whisper, he continued:

"I am at the goal, at the goal! and feel, where I am,
In my whole soul a trembling! so will it be (I speak Humanly of heavenly thing) with us, in presence of Him,
Who died! and arose! at the coming in heaven!

"You believe in Him, King?" he asked; then, without waiting for answer, went on:

"Who dares express Him?
And who confess Him, Saying, I do believe?"

He ceased, and King, taking up the quotation, said:

"A man's heart bearing,
What man has the daring
To say: I acknowledge Him not?"

Again Rosenthal's eyes and words wandered; suddenly he drew Salome's face to his. "Acknowledge Him, Salome; try to believe!" he said. "Now, one kiss, one more, my darling—the last—the last! Oh! Death! thou art close!"—he panted fearfully for breath.

"Courage, dear Rosenthal! the worst is past," as King's tears dripped on his friend's forehead.

"Yes—yes! I know"—his breathing grew soft again; lying thus, death chisled his face into godlike beauty; once more his eyelids fluttered open—

"God!" he gasped. "Darkness—everlasting silence—they are come!"

And Maurice Rosenthal's soul was—where? Let chaos, and the "everlasting midnight," answer!

Another soul went forth with his. Elisé, his unowned daughter, never woke from the trance into which a heart disease had plunged her.

Above the two graves snows had drifted, and the spring sun had again melted them; all the glory, the hush, the softness of the young season, lay about them like a mantle of peace.

Salome Brocke stood beside the tall marble shaft that marked Rosenthal's sleep, and her tears dripped thick and fast as she read its one single word of inscription—"Silentio." How significant of the man, and of his end!

She was not alone. Philip King's face, grave and handsome, was full of sympathy, and the pitying tenderness such loyal-hearted ones know. After the fever of passion and a mad battle with dispair, on the rock of this steadfast soul Saloma found rest—as yet weak in faith, blind and stumbling, the billows of doubt and bitterness still swept over her. But, the storm past, she even nestled closer to that haven of woman's rest, the heart of an upright man.

RECEPTION OF HEAD CENTRE STEPHENS.

THE distinguished Fenian leader arrived in our city last Thursday, and was received by the Brotherhood in the most enthusiastic manner. An immense crowd assembled at the wharf to welcome, or at least get a glimpse of him, and it was with difficulty he could reach his hotel, on account of the throng surrounding the carriage and blockading the streets. He stated that he visited this country by invitation, for the purpose of reconciling the difficulties that have arisen among the order here, and inducing harmony of counsel and unity of action. Late in the evening he was serenaded by the band of the 99th regiment, and made a short address from the balcony of the hotel, amid the most enthusiastic cheers from the crowd below. Our illustration represents this exciting scene. Other demonstrations of respect are to be made at a future day. In the meantime Mr. Stephens will devote himself earnestly to settling the differences that now exist among the Fenian Brotherhood.

OLD STOVE IN THE CAPITOL AT RICHMOND, VA.

THOSE who recall the insane effort of Pollard, last winter, to convert the Rotunda of the Richmond capitol into a shooting-gallery, will remember that he was cautious enough to enterpose the stove between himself and his living target, and that his gyrations around that convenient barricade, were chivalric in the extreme.

We give a correct illustration of that stove on the 148th page, and there is a historic interest connected with it worthy of note. It was designed and cast in London, in 1770, by order of George III., and by him presented to the House of Burgesses of Williamsburg, Va. In 1787 it was conveyed to the State Capitol, at Richmond, and has been in service there ever since. It is eight and a half feet high, and covered with ingenious carvings and Latin inscriptions, some of which are obliterated by the rust of a century. Virginia claimed of old to be a kingdom, and was recognized as such by Charles II. To some Virginians, at least, the title Old Dominion was no mere fancy. This was one great source of the pride of the First Families.

This old stove was cast at a time when these pretensions were rife. English monarchs then styled themselves Kings of England, Ireland, Scotland and France. On this stove, besides these four quarterings, the royal arms of Virginia were added, with this motto, "En dat Virginia quintam." The old stove has, consequently, the force of a title-deed, which is frequently invoked by Virginia to sustain her royal claims.

WASHINGTON MARKET, NEW YORK.

THE question, What shall we eat? suggests another equally important, viz.: Where shall we obtain a supply for our larder? A savage would answer this inquiry—by taking his weapons and scouring the forest for what he could convert into a savory stew or an inviting roast. But the denizens of a large city cannot resort to so primitive a mode of catering, and must have regular sources of supply, whither they may repair at all times, to obtain what is necessary for their wants, or craved by their tastes. Hence the origin of markets, with which every city is now provided, and which contribute so largely to the convenience, and we might almost add existence, of townspeople.

The Washington Market dates back to the days of our grandfathers, and was then called the Old Bear Market. The original building can be seen in the centre of our view of the Washington street front, with a cupola surmounting it, and all the surrounding buildings have since been added—squatter fashion—piece by piece. Within the past five years this squatterism has spread until all the docks and piers of the neighborhood are covered with these traders, who style themselves commission dealers, and who stand between the farmer and the public consumers.

These men have gradually established themselves as a strong community; they have had laws passed to protect them in their traffic, and the result is that a farmer, after having grown his fruit, or vegetables, is not allowed to come into the market and sell them, but must turn them over to these commission dealers, or hucksters, at such price as they see fit to give. The end of this is, that the public pay just about double for everything in that line that they consume, to what they would if the farmer could come into open market and compete.

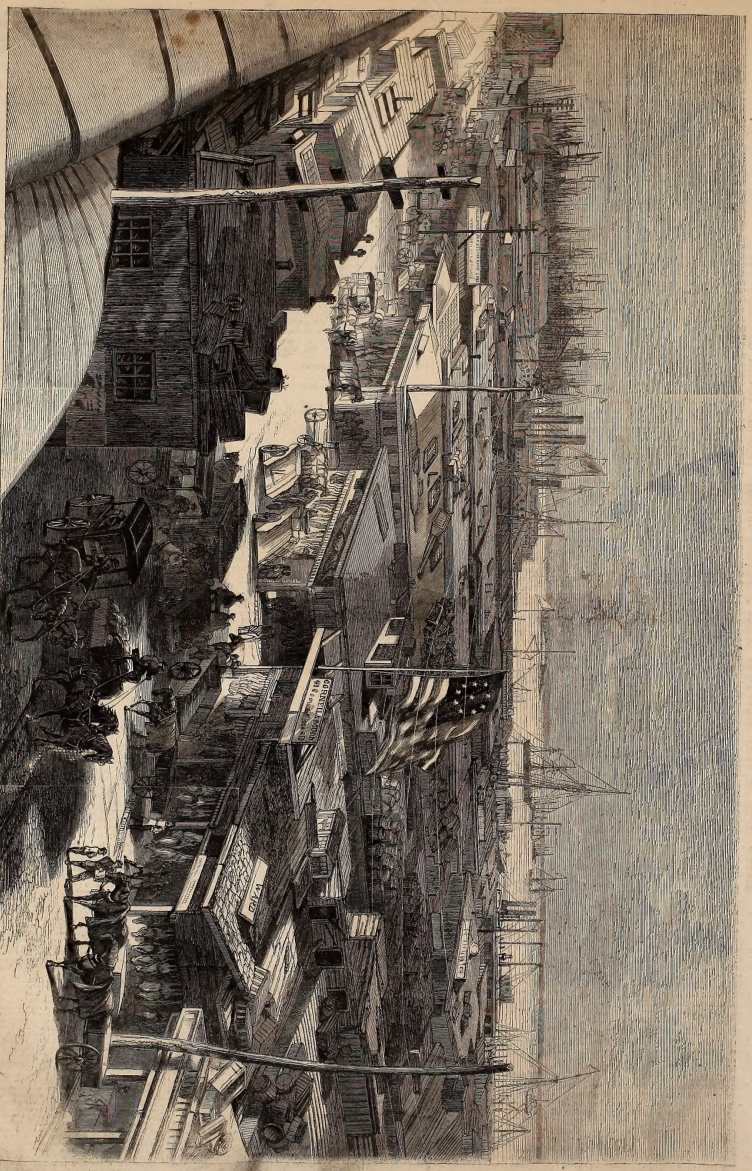
These sheds cover some acres of ground, and harbor filth to a degree that is beyond description. In summer, fruit and vegetables lie in decaying heaps, enough to knock a strong man down with their stench, and the police have favorite hunting-ground there for stale meats and ancient fish. The scavenger rats run foot-races in the light of the day over every inch of the foulness, and hold high jubilee at night, making the air resonant with their squeaking jollities and battles.

All this the Board of Health has ordered down, and if it never does aught else during its existence, that act alone should endear it to the public heart. This place has been an eye-sore for years, and though a well-supplied market, it has been almost as much as a decent person's health or clothes were worth to venture within its precincts.

But while thus externally repulsive, this market has much to recommend it to the purveyor, and in its ample store of good things, will compensate him for any personal inconvenience he may endure.

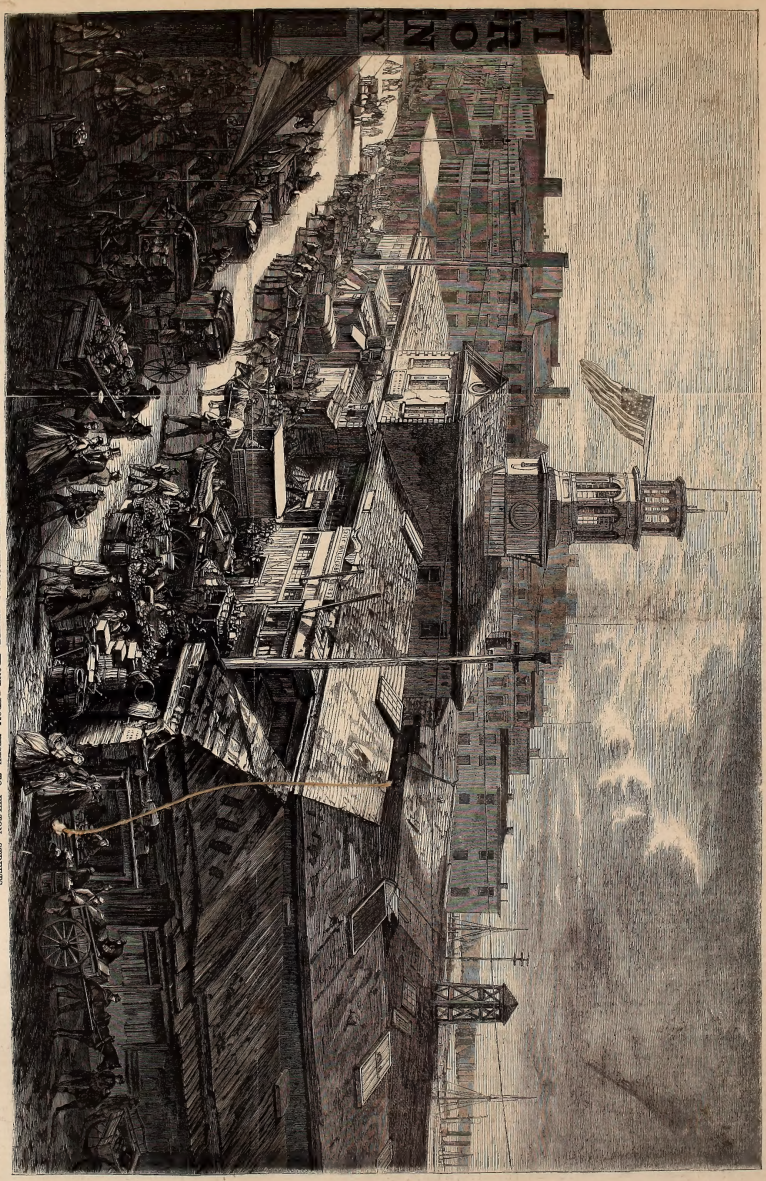
On any morning of our weekly calendar, Washington Market represents a lap of luxury, the gleaning of a bountifully supplied and plenteous land. Here are gorgeous avenues of flesh, all garnished with quarters, and ribs and loins, of the finest beef; in steaks of tender meat, imbedded in layers of golden fat. Interspersed are columns of tempting mutton, in just such proportions of fat and lean as please the epicure. Carcasses of veal and the porcine tribe fill up the intervals, with flowers and greens of the forest and garden, all so pure and inviting, that the poor man sighs as he wonders why so much plenty persistently hangs beyond his reach, and the rich man's eyes feed with delight on these inviting vistas of animal food as he contemplates them in connection with the culinary department of his own household. Other avenues are graced with pendent lines of well-dressed turkeys, inviting ducks, plump and succulent chickens, and fowls of every form, and size, and name, with quarters of game, all gracefully arranged and temptingly presented.

Again are offered to the view rich displays of the finny tribe, the contribution of the waters—fish with scales and without scales, large and small, shell-fish, and the traditional turtle that Aldermen are said to affect. Here, too, are the products of the dairy—rich golden butter, diffusing the very odor of the meadows, and cheese so yellow, and tempting, and delicious, that an ascetic could not refuse it, with fresh, dainty eggs and their concomitants, luscious hams, the very savor of which incites the appetite. The earth, the air, and the waters under the earth, all pour their contributions into this great receptacle of metropolitan comfort, and he must be a monster misanthrope who can resist the appeal here made to his senses by this cornucopia of the meats, the fruits, and the granaries of a teeming land.



The Board of Health has ordered the rickety sheds that have gradually sprung up around the original building to be removed, and we hope the good work thus begun will continue, until the whole unsightly pile gives place to a structure that will really be an honor to the city.

RELIGIOUS ORGIES IN ROME.



IT is said that the Jesuits are obtaining a great ascendancy in Rome, and a strong influence over the Pope. During the latter part of Lent he was induced to allow them to preach in the open streets, on the ground that the evil infection of the times made it incumbent to stir up the people, to implore that the intervention of Heaven might avert the scourge impending. The sight to be beheld, day after day, as the shades of night began to fall on public localities, was truly painful, from its grotesque caricature. Long files of cowled and fantastically-dressed devotees, in gloomy robes, their heads and faces covered with sacks, slits which let the gleam of two eyes flash through, preceded by monster crucifixes, borne aloft, and chanting, at tip-top voices, lugubrious hymns, were to be seen marching along the streets in every direction, escorting preachers to the temporary stages, from which they delivered frantic harangues to the mob by the light of torches, flickering upon the convulsive gesticulations of the ranting friars, who were flanked by a spectral array of mutes, glaring without emotion, like spell-bound figures, through the holes of their horridly shapeless masks.

Of the preachers who thus performed in the streets and squares religious burlesques of the most spasmodic convulsiveness, all, with hardly an exception, were members of the Society of Jesus, or of some body directly affiliated, such as Passionists and Lazarists. But the crowning spectacle of the last night of these missions threw all the former exhibitions into the shade. Then the flames of twelve burning heaps cast their lurid light over Rome, at dusk, on the twelve different sites of missionary preaching, and, to the amazement of the bystanders, the preachers, with the wild action of men possessed by raving spirits, pitched vehemently on these heaps the incarnations of wickedness, the books condemned by the Index.

On the steps of San Carlo, in the Corso, the fashionable church of Rome, the Bishop of Aquile, in the spasmodic attitude of a frantic St. Michael combating the Devil, before the eyes of the astounded élite, thronging home at twilight on that spring Sunday afternoon, from the Pincian, flung into the fire the literary productions of impiety, to the grotesque accompaniment of furiously gesticulated anathemas. But even this strange scene was outdone by the performance got up at two of the preaching sites, at St. Maria Maggiore, and at the Church of the Consolazione, on the Forum. Here, as a Passionist—one of those weird-like figures, clothed in black, with a wounded heart in glaring white worked on the breast—after working himself into a semblance of delirious paroxysm, was devoting the Scriptures of wickedness to destruction by fire, there appeared of a sudden person who professed to have been moved to remorse by his appeals, and who bore aloft daggers and other weapons, which they declared to have been given them by Free Masons and other secret sectarians, wherewith to work out their impious ends. And then the Passionist man of God felt transported with heavenly joy at the blessing so visibly attending his spasmodic eloquence; and calling upon a smith, who happily found himself amongst the loiterers, and was recognized as such, and who as happily had both hammers and anvil ready with him, caused at once these weapons of the devil to be broken to pieces, to the edification of the staring mob.

FACES IN THE GLOOM.

BY THOMAS FOWELL.

I OFTEN in the twilight sit
Beside my silent fire,
And muse upon the sacred dead—
On sister, son and sire.
Until methinks I see them peer
From out the dusky gloom,
Although I know their bodies rest
Far off within the tomb.

And slowly rising from the past
Scenes of a by-gone day,
Fast mastly before my soul,
And gently fade away.
Then coming from my grief reverie,
Tears full of anguish start,
As the hoarded weight of memory,
Falls down upon my heart.

The Spectre of Cliffe;

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c. &c.

CHAPTER VI.—MR. CLEMENT CARR HAS A BAD NIGHT.

THE chamber in which Clement had been placed was large and warm, but he shivered like an aspen.

It was not the daytime now, nor was 11 P.M. an hour for resting. At 11 o'clock A.M. he had replied, as we know, to Catot, speaking about the very apartment he was now occupying: "Who hairsh for the ghost? I shall sholeep in the best room." To what a different frame of mind had twelve hours brought him!

Besides the triple door by which he had entered, there were two other doors, and when he opened these, he exchanged one of the candles for a poker: the first led into an antechamber as large as any ordinary bedroom, but totally unfurnished, save for some things which looked uncommonly like coffin trestles, but which were only made of the material of trestle-beds, to be used by the attendants of the great man who reposed in the Blue Chamber; quite door lodged from that room, he knew not whither, but he did not at all concentrate his wits by kick and bolt. The second door opened upon a very small room, almost a recess, the purpose of which he could not guess; if it was for the accommodation of a page, it must have been a very dandiacine one that ever slept there. It would have served rather as a wardrobe for cloaks and such, only there were no pegs; the shining floor was uncarpeted, and in the corner was a square, looking suspiciously like a trapdoor. Guessing the purpose which we had guessed, Sir Thomas had come up that way, while his servants guarded the ante-room in vain. Again Mr. Clement Carr piled look and key, and leaving in the same manner made his triple door secure. Felt even then no safer than Robinson Crusoe with his ladder on up, upon the day when he first saw the footprint on the sand.

How was it possible he should be comfortable with that terrible hole staring at him through the ceiling? Moreover, the fire was dying out, and there was no fresh fuel. Mr. Clement looked at the four candles, wishing them four-and-twenty, and proceeded to put two of them out, for it was necessary to husband his resources, lest the night should be rendered still more hideous by darkness. Mr. Clement Carr then pursued his nightly toilet with not a few uncomfortable looks-back over over his shoulder; and after having wrapped his dressing-gown around him, took a chair by the enormous fireplace, and proceeded to warm his stockinged feet at the dying wood-embers, before he got into bed.

This is a moment in which nobody has ever yet indulged without falling into what is called a "brown study." As the wood-fire glows and pales, as the sparks come forth and vanish, as the memories of the Past, now distinct, now dim, follow one another without our guidance, or schemes the like Future shape themselves as the clouds before the wind. There are none of us but have a history, more deeply interesting to ourselves than all the scrolls of Fame, and we love to linger over the pictures it presents, "roling the sweet morsel under the tongue"—even when we are well aware that it would have been better for us had some of them remained unpainted. It would have been well for Clement Carr had the long canvas of his past been white and colourless as the minds of those poor wretches whom it was his calling to tend, so ugly were the scenes displayed vividly from first to last on its surface, and yet it gave him pleasure to review them—although not all. He remembered with gloomy satisfaction the circumstances under which their first patient had been confided to their care, how the six-and-a-half-hundred grew larger every year—only a little at a time—with money, and almost as ill-earned; and how, having thus discovered a short way to wealth, they had stuck to it, Gideon and he, though the road was dark and foul, and in places perilous: very dangerous, indeed, when Gilbert Lee, their mad idea that he was sane had been so shared in by Mildred's mother, that she plotted his escape from the Dene, and afterward married him. Perhaps, after all, that marriage saved the Carr system from unpleasant publicity; but how he hated his dead sister, and her dead husband, and the living offspring of the two, who had treated him so superciliously that very evening! She should smart for that yet, if opportunity occurred, which it generally does, when we have our revenges to gratify. Then, on the other hand, what a match had Grace made! He loved her, it is true, no better than her elder sister, but he could fully help seeing that she had well contrived must have been all those pretended attentions to mad Cyril, directed in reality at Ralph himself, to have so bewitched the Clifford, even at a spot so hateful to him by association as the Dene. How many women in other days, as beautiful as she and better born, had ruled at Cliffe by a far different title.

There was the "fair lady," for instance, for whose sake Bertram slew his brother. Cater had pointed out to him that the very oak that had been laid on the great staircase to hide the bloodstained spot was modern. Grace could fall: and yet, enchantress as she was, she had been the wife of neither. It was she who was said to "walk," combing her long tresses as she went, upon any great calamity threatened the family; and it had been even whispered that the master of Cliffe had himself seen the night-hag, forewarned by her appearance of his brother Cyril's death.

Here an incident occurred which put a stop to Mr. Clement Carr's sad thoughts, and made him very wide awake indeed to the fact that he was in the Blue Chamber at Cliffe Hall. It was simply a sigh, it was true, but a sigh of the profoundest sort, such as is produced only by the most heartfelt sorrow, or the most complicated troubles of the digestion—a sigh that filled the room with its melancholy monotone, and was uttered, as it seemed, by some invisible being close beside him, who might have been warning Ralph by the self-same decaying fire, preparatory to retiring to the self-same bed. So certain was Mr. Clement Carr of the proximity of this mysterious one did not even cast a glance up at the hole in the ceiling, from whence it might probably have been expected to proceed, but sat glued to his chair, with his hair on end, carrying, nem. con., in his mouth, all scent of the perfumed soap, and all spotless life for the remainder of his days. He had no more reason to doubt of this thing having occurred than he had of his existence; and that he was sitting by the mere remnants of a wood-fire, and that the oak floor had no carpet, and would presently grow cold, and that Cliffe Hall is the marvelous elasticity of the human mind, that when the sound was not repeated, the idea began to grow upon him that it had not been almost as near. After an hour or so of a frightful series of anticipations, he ventured to put his stiffened limbs by lying down; then, still listening, and with the engine still beating within, but with his nerves more steadily under him, he rose, and presently blessed sleep, that falls, like the rain of heaven, even upon the most unjust, and holds a mirror up to nature to the most false of all.

When he awoke, which he did suddenly, and to the consciousness of all the horrors of his situation, the room was no longer illumined by artificial light, but dimly by the cold, pale day-light, of course, gone out, but the two candles which had been left to burn themselves down, although no longer lit, had certainly not burned out, for there they stood as high, it seemed, as when he had gone to bed, and he wondered very much at this phenomenon. Mr. Clement's attention was called to the dressing-table by a third sigh, quite equal to the melancholy breath of Feeling. Before the glass sat a female form, in a loose black robe, engaged upon some article of needle-work. Her features were concealed from his view, but her figure was youthful, and her auburn hair flowed over her shoulders like a river of gold. Was Ralph also sighing, and was she the woman engaged upon. An enormous piece of linen lay upon her lap, its whiteness contrasting forcibly with her black dress: he could not see what it was, but a few moments ere thick darkness closed the scene yet even in that scanty time Clement Carr knew that he had seen the Shroud of the Fair Lady sewing a shroud. To be alone with this spectre, without light, without knowing how near it might be to him, and to know that also this was there, he felt to be absolutely intolerable, and the wretched man gathered himself up with the courage of despair for a leap to the floor and to put just as he was in the act to spring, the whole drive of the room seemed to be in one weighty crash, to give way together, and, shrinking from what he known alyss, Clement Carr fell back upon his pillow, and found himself in possession only of horror.

When Mr. Clement Carr "came to himself," he came to himself alone; it was broad daylight, too, and cheerful enough to hear the distant champing of horses and the cleaking of milk-pails, came up from some region beneath. But the shock had been too severe for his nerves to be at once restored, to give way together, and, shrinking from what he known alyss, Clement Carr fell back upon his pillow, and found himself in possession only of horror.

When Mr. Clement Carr "came to himself," he came to himself alone; it was broad daylight, too, and cheerful enough to hear the distant champing of horses and the cleaking of milk-pails, came up from some region beneath. But the shock had been too severe for his nerves to be at once restored from Clement's system by any ordinary means. All he saw only reminded him of what he had witnessed. There were the candles as he had left them, the fire was dead, the trapdoor was open, and the spectre was gone. Then he had shuddered at the mysterious sigh; the empty chair on which the Fair Lady had sat made the blood curdle, engaged in her ghastly occupation; the polished floor, apparently as safe and solid as ice after three weeks' frost, seemed to threaten the same fate to him, upon, after the proof he had so lately experienced of its instability. All the doors were locked just as he had left them, with their keys inside, and yet he had seen what he had seen.

Shaving was a terrible matter with Mr. Carr that morning, and a very woe-begone countenance he presented to the looking-glass. I do not say that his appearance was at all the worse for wear—although I have known such an occurrence to happen in the case of a gentleman who unexpectedly left off wearing a wig—but he unquestionably looked like one who had passed a very bad night indeed. Mr. Carr concealed his features from the servant who called him that morning by means of a pocket-handkerchief, but he could not be making a profusion of blowing his nose the whole day long. That happening, soon after the arrival of Catot, with orders to prepare for their immediate departure from that accursed roof, to meet Mr. Raymond Clifford at the library door, that gentleman, after a stiff greeting, could not but remark—

"I fear, sir, you have slept but ill."

"Ill is no word for it, Mr. Raymond; I've—But, perhaps, it is not agreeable to the family to talk about such things."

"Come, come, Mr. Carr," said the young man, tashering him into the common home of arms and hospitality, "pray, sit you there, and tell me what has disturbed you."

He pointed to a high-backed chair, carved thick with the heraldic bunters, in which poor Clement looked like the sham Governor of Barataria; while he himself, toying with an antique goblet of very curious workmanship, looked like a personage of mighty tome of black-letter—such as Don Quixote would have loved—and listened.

"Mr. Raymond Clifford," returned Clement, with that unmistakably earnest air with which a man tells a story, a cultural truth-teller narrates a genuine fact, "I saw the Fair Lady of your house of Cliffe last night, and no sooner was that in a drinking-cup which you are holding in your hand, and nothing else."

"Truly," replied Raymond, smiling, "but not more so. Mark, now, how the eye may be deceived. I, too, saw the goblet, in a word, but see, I tilt it ever so little, and the trigger lets loose a pistol-ball, which you see the darker dead. This is the stirrup-cup of the good old times, in which no host would think of parting with you to offend him grievously. And yet, it is a mere toy of wickedness. There is no more sin in a thing like this than in the bullet aped at all, I wager it would fly asbut. But the common mind delights to think of the worst; and because we have possession of such weapons, and because the house is old, and has many dark and unused their parts in it, as needs must be in any house of any size, horror-stricken by the force of apparitions, noises—things you think you see or hear."

"I do not think I heard them," answered Clement, obstinately; "there was no think about it."

"Then let there be no talking about it, either, sir," said Raymond, sternly. "We have had too much of such folly. It is to your pleasure to leave Cliffe Hall so soon—"

"Immediately, immediately," quoth Clement, resolutely "Then let me beg of you, in courtesy, not to mention the matter within these walls—what you have just told to me. I will do what I can to fathom the mystery, and be sure, if I discover anything, I will not smile the darker dead.

Clement gave the required promise with some little reluctance, left the room, observing that he had business with his servant, and must therefore request to be left alone for a few when his horse fared, which had shown signs of suffering from his master.

"A liar to the backbone," muttered Raymond Clifford, "and I, a fool, to appeal to the honor of a scoundrel! And yet he seemed to speak the truth a while ago—ah, Mildred, dearest!"

They were the words of a young girl as youthful and girl could be! The one swarthy as Night, and these contrasted, they, the other as fair as the mellow eve, what time the nightingale begins his melody, and the glow-worm trims her lamp to light her love.

"Hush!" she said, closing the door behind her softly, and laying her finger on her lips; "in this room, Raymond, never speak so loud. Nay, no more of that kiss—another time."

"Let us go to Ribble, then."

"Ah, I wish I could," she said. "I sought you here to warn you—I wish I could say aid you—my own Raymond."

She lingered on her words as the lark lingers over her own sweet song, and gazed upon him, and then cast down her eyes, like one who, looking at the sun, is blinded with excessive light, yet loves to look upon it.

"What is it, Mildred, dear? More schemes, more conspiracies? Why, this good woman, your aunt, is busier than a spider."

"Ay, and as busy," she said. "When she works me harm, I fear her—ah, how I fear her—but when she is plotting against you, Raymond, I seem to fear her no more; hate her. She has poisoned your poor father's mind against you, she and that Mr. Carr, Mildred," replied the young man.

"I do not to the bitter end, as now. She aims at nothing less than to get you expelled from this place by force, and then, here she more supreme. She sewing her first mesh across but yesterday—and by the way, Raymond, I will tell her not will grow, I know; and Raymond—I also—"

Mildred paused, and as the glory of the fruit of Tangiers shows through its scented rind, so did her blushes.

"She is not going to send you away, Mildred?" exclaimed Raymond, starting up. "I shall not believe, indeed, that the Fair Lady prognosticates misfortune?"

"What mean you? Have you seen her?"

"Nay, not I, I faith; but this man Cary, your uncle—Carr, I mean—has seen her, or so he says, the Warning but last night in the Blue Chamber. He says there were candles, and a lady with long auburn hair, and in a black dress. Long gown, perhaps, and she was sewing plain needle-work. This he will carry to his sister, she my father, and—and—Mildred, dearest, you will deem it bodes another death—"

"Oh, Raymond!" exclaimed the missed Mildred, "Light!" with auburn hair; and in the state-room, too. Did Mr. Carr say anything had happened to the floor?"

"Ay, the fool swore that all the floor fell in. Mildred, dearest, you grow pale, you tremble, you—"

"I see some sunlight where I looked not for it; and I must not stay longer with you now, Raymond. I am not mistaken, Aunt Grace is playing a very dangerous game, and I will not be her victim, even if she has no mercy for thee, so help me heaven, I will show none to her. She gave me this; it is true, a priceless gift, but never meant to give it and now—"

"Now what, dear Mildred? What is it that threatens you, and therefore me? And how can anything that happened in the Blue Chamber help us?"

"It is a long story, Ray, and this is neither the time nor the place to tell it. There is darkest plotting, and—and—Raymond, at seven o'clock, meet me at the mouth of Bibble Cave—then—"

"I hear the cat," exclaimed Raymond, softly, "Fuse, puss, puss!"

The door opened Mrs. Clifford entered, and darting a suspicious glance from one to the other, inquired, coldly: "Mildred, the breakfast waits: go make the tea, child." The young girl left the room.

"Mr. Raymond Clifford, I am directed by your father—"

"Nay, madam," interrupted he, with mock politeness: "my father has been directed by you. I have been directed by no one. I will have it so," continued his step-mother, carelessly waving her hand, as her superior ingenuity will permit of it, that you will partake his evening-meal with him."

"My father is very kind," said Raymond, frankly; he had not had such an invitation for many years, and he was highly pleased at it.

"Very kind," repeated Mrs. Clifford, icily, "and how do you find yourself after your ill-luck?"

"We shall be alone, I conclude, Mrs. Clifford?" inquired Raymond, his suspicions roused by the mysterious hint of his step-mother.

"Oh, quite alone, sir; and I thank you for the implied compliment. No curious eye will disease my interesting interview; no alien ear will overhear your generous confidence."

"Then we shall meet in some room which has no key-hole," remarked Raymond, scornfully, and with the hand upon the door. "If you have any other commands, madam, will rid you of my unwelcome?"

In silence they interchanged one look of mutual hatred, then the man's eye flashed upon the woman's, hatred, and then the coal closed between them.

"Listen, do I?" muttered the woman to herself. "You have found out so much, have you? Ay, he can be artful, and that by nature, when were they here together at all? She dare not love him—that, for the sake of her child, I know that I would kill her if she did. And yet they were together at the Fair, and Mildred and Mrs. Cave, at three." The cat caught that at last."

CHAPTER VII.—SUTZEN'S WOOING.

WERE Mildred reached the chamber where Mrs. Clifford and herself were accustomed to take their meals, she found Sutzen, the Swiss, patiently awaiting her. It was strange enough to see him there, for the last time that he had set foot within that room three times since she had been at Cliffe; but it was worse than strange, since her aunt must hardly have left her father's chamber. How different he looked from his brother, whom she had left but a few hours before! Sutzen had grown, the other skrieked over with the pale cast of thought, and he was full of the strength that wealth of light-brown hair crowned a noble forehead, and his features, though full, had the stamp birth; while the deep-sunk eyes he fixed upon her with melancholy longing eyes were very soft and kind.

"Mildred," said he, frankly, "your aunt has bid me take my meal with you, and it will be hard for you to guess, remembering what has passed between us in this room, how I would fain have deferred to press a suit which has so lately met with your refusal, if I could not say it is not know the way to a maiden's heart. My wooing, mayhap, has been unpolished and rude, but I am sincere; you have been courteous and gentle in your love, as in all else. Never was there a better heart than yours, my well-beloved. No girl could hope to have a wooer more—"

"Stop, Sutzen, stop!" exclaimed Mildred, wearily, "all ending in a 'but,' as at the bottom of the confectioner's bill. Spare me, I pray you, that 'but,' it was she who bade me think—that this time something else than pity, Mildred—"

"Pity, Rupert?"

"Ay, for you must pity me, since I think you do not love me, and that you do not give back love for love. You see me—what I am: a youth, not very old, and yet not old enough to boast, perhaps, of a handsome face, since you refuse to share it with me. And yet you are not half my equal, and know not half what it is in your power to confer upon me. I am rich, and I am the highest rank that is marriage, and you loved him not, yet if, besides he lay in peril of his life, and could only by your wedding him be saved, would you wed him, with, for pity's sake, it not for love's, hoping that love would follow?"

"Such a thing could not be, Rupert. It is idle to speak of it."

"But if it were, I say. What then?"

"Then I would do it, and pray for love."

"You would!" cried Rupert, joyfully. "God bless you for those words! One kind word like that does a say, pardon me, I had forgotten: my soul is drunk with love. How my heart beats—how my head throbs! Let me drink my wine while I suffocate. How cool and calm you must look upon me! Mildred, I speak with my feet but now round the castle-walls, as I have often done before, and I thought of you, and I listened to so many tales of mine, but none so pitiful as this, the telling of love to say!"

Never was man so changed in such brief space as Rupert while he spoke these words: his pale cheeks glowed with pleasure; his deep eyes beamed with hope; his head, which thought and spoke so well, was full of love and joy.

It pained Mildred to the core to say: "You are changing to a stranger, Rupert. Your kind rule is unutterably to me, I feel you are encouraging a baseless fabric of hope. Yet she did not say it.

"But you will come?" cried he, no whit disheartened by her silence. "You will, I am quite ready to bear what you have to say, although I am sure it will be all in vain."

They wound down a private stair to a low arched door below ground, and the cadet ushered her betwixt the grey wall, to among with fruit, and the flowers—orange-trees, oleanders, and the princess strutted and fluted her feathers in the sun, they looked side by side: the one broad shouldered, bordered with scarlet flowers in mossy urns, on to the shaven lawn, and so to the brink of the black mouth of the cave, and the other to the foot-bath, and Rupert cared them to the middle of the fragrant shade, and there they sat down, and broke the autumn silence.

"Dear Mildred," he began: looked forward to this hour for many and many a day. Here, I have often thought, and now, I have said, I shall see her, but as boy and girl, brother and sister, not as now—I will one day tell her all; here, where we have passed whole summer days, and she has seen me at my best and merriest (I, indeed, I have been ever merry), seems the fittest place. Nor are nor stream can ever be dear to me as this same brook; since I have learned love for hours to the crash of the slow-lapping rook, and the crow, and melancholy, had clear, from the shadows, and never wished for better music. But that was before I heard your voice, sweet Mildred!" Here he paused a moment, then resumed, reflectively: "How slowly the waters creep, as though they loved to linger about this ancient place, and were loth to leave it for the hurrying river; and yet, see, they are as dark as death, and the bottom is choked with trailing weed. So has it been with the Cliffords themselves, Mildred. We have kept ourselves so long from the great tide of life, that we have grown stagnant, and—and—what is stagnant is unhealthy. Where there is nothing to hasten the pulse, to stir the blood, the mind itself will sooner or later grow"—he was looking at her, she felt, so fixedly, that she dared not raise her eyes to meet his gaze—"will grow—lethargic."

"You are not lethargic, Rupert."

"Not yet," said he; "I trust not yet."

There was a pathos in his low, earnest tone that might have almost moved a slighted woman; no wonder, then, that it pierced Mildred's heart.

"Dear Rue," she murmured, "it is not well to speak of such things as these."

"But how much worse," sighed he, "to think of them and not to speak. Oh, do not think that I am hoodwinked, Mildred, by aught that men can say or leave unsaid about poor me. I know the falseness of their assuring speech, as I know the reason of their silence—their 'Hush! Rupert is coming; not one word about the curse.'"

"Rue, Rue, dear Rue," sobbed Mildred tenderly, "this is the very thing you should not do, the very talk——"

"Nay, Mildred, hear me out. Oh, do not—do not join them in that cuckoo-note. Oh, do not thou turn against me, my own hope."

"Against you, Rupert? I—I? When there is not a groom in Cliffe that does not love you."

"Ay, but not as I would have thee love. And if thou turnst not to me, Mildred, thou wilt work more against me than if all the world besides had sworn my ruin. Oh, how to tell thee—how to let thee know what hangs upon thy answer, and yet not fright thee, Mildred! Nay, tremble not, sweetest; thou hast naught to fear, whether thy 'yes' shall bathe my life in sunshine, or thy 'no' provoke the threatening moon to swift eclipse!"

His tones were earnest, but not wild; and though far from mechanically, he spoke as one who has well conned beforehand the substance of what he has to say.

"You are very young," said Mildred, after a little, "and yet have lived your life here amid the moldering past, afar from all things that befit the young. Your childhood, soon deprived of a mother's care—like mine, Rupert—has been passed among menials, who, flattering themselves they were pleasing you, pleased their own vulgar natures by feeding an imagination, hungry as flame, with stories of your ancient house—exaggerated, false and monstrous histories, but which, since they were about the Cliffords, seemed in some sort real. They sowed an evil seed in a soil fertile enough in fancies of its own, but rich and ready to the hand of the true husbandman, had such there been. How soon would yonder well-trimmed garden, left to itself, become mere wilderness, and how much sooner if you planted it with docks and darnels?"

"Go on, sweet Mildred; these are Raymond's words, but in thy mouth how welcome—welcome as the dawn—welcome as the soft-falling summer rain upon the aching head and stretched-out hands."

"Raymond is wise, Rupert, although he has little book-learning."

"I know it, girl, yet he cannot comfort me as thou canst. The uneasy pillow of the sick man cannot be smoothed save by one loving hand; and royal Edward's wound, be sure, would not have healed so swiftly had any lips sucked forth the poison save those of his true wife." Then pausing for a moment, he added, in an earnest whisper: "There is poison in my blood, Mildred, and you must be my Eleanor."

"Nay, Rupert, there is no poison in your blood, but as you said yourself, it flows too sluggishly; you need employment, action—you should leave home a while."

"What!" he broke forth, "without thee? Never—no, never, Mildred! Be mine, and I will go with thee whither thou wilt, and do thy bidding, whatsoever it be. But I will never leave thee, be sure of that, my girl; thou shalt escape me never, no, not in death itself; for if thou diest, then will I die too, and climb up after thee to highest heaven, though it were from the abyss of hell. Then surely, being a blessed spirit crowned and palmed, thou wouldst reach out a saintly hand to lift me into bliss, and save my soul; and therefore, now, being an earthly angel, wilt thou not give me that same hand, and save—oh, save my Reason?"

The dews of terror stood upon Mildred's brow, for wild and vehement as was Rupert's speech, his eyes spoke things more terrible. All of a sudden she knew that that which she had been combating for his sake as a mere shadow, was a substantial evil which had already fallen upon him. Poor Rupert had all along been right—she was talking to a madman! And yet she pitied him far more than feared him even now. The passionate yearning of his last appeal melted her heart within her.

"The case I put in yonder room," he continued, "was my own—for is not madness Death?—and hence my soul was glad as yonder bird's what time thou saidst: 'I would do my very best to save him.' Come, Mildred, say thou wilt once more."

The feathered thief, in view of the fruit upon the terrace-wall, was caroling his blithest; note on note he poured forth his melodious joy a while, then bringing his last harmonies together, like a hasty grace, he flew down to the ripening pears. Then, in the songless silence, Mildred answered Rupert:

"So help me Heaven, I will do my very best to save thee."

She spoke not without thought—for while a blackbird sings is time enough to serve a nimble brain—and while she spoke she watched him narrowly.

"My life, my love, my all!" murmured he, in a hushed rapture.

"But, Rupert——"

"Nay," he interrupted; "mar not the music of your last rich words. I guess what you would say, and therefore there is no need to speak. You do not love me yet—I know it, but in time 'tis possible—— There, there, I give you time—I can keep my soul in patience, being sure of you; hopeful that the bud of Pity may flower into something sweeter, and being sure that when it does so bloom, it blows for me—for me."

Across his voice, faint and aswoon with love, came Mrs. Clifford's clear and peremptory tones from the balcony outside her breakfast-room:

"Mildred, the breakfast waits, dear child. Good Rupert, put her ashore."

The young man obeyed at once, and as he took Mildred's fingers in his own to hand her to the bank, gave them a significant squeeze. Far from returning this, she bowed to him haughtily, and walked hastily away.

"Ungenerous," murmured she to herself, almost in tears, "and unlike a gentleman! I could not have believed it of a Clifford. Not mad, indeed—but cunning as the maddest. Had love been mine to give, I verily believe he would have won it. False and unfair! Does he suppose I took his dropped kerchief for a water-lily, or that I was blind to her answering signal. And did she ever speak to us like that before—'dear Mildred,' and 'good Rupert'? My loving aunt must take me for a fool indeed."

A Bad Case of Buttons—and its Cure.

"ANOTHER button off, Carrie! This is a little too much; yesterday morning the same thing happened; and now I am all dressed, ready for my collar; it's outrageous!"

Mrs. Appleton sat dressing her baby, a little, puny, fretful girl of about six months, and looked up at her husband despairingly, as she realized the awful state of the case; for a missing button, or a soiled napkin, were much more flagrant offenses in James Appleton's eyes than any amount of wifely dereliction in other respects.

"You have other shirts in your drawer!" Mrs. Appleton ventured to remark, meekly.

"What if I have? Isn't this one in? and I'm in a hurry; and you know that deuced well."

"Stoop down, James, and I will sew it on. It won't take but a moment."

"No, I suppose not. If that's the case, why hadn't you spent a moment securing it, before you put it away?" and he seized a darning-needle, and made frantic pushes at the little pearl button, which, after one or two attacks, was split quite in two.

Mrs. Appleton laid the screaming infant on the bed, and without a word fastened on another tiny mischief-maker. She was a pretty woman, and a glance at her face would satisfy a physiognomist that she was not deficient in spirit, albeit she detested quarrels and fault-findings. They had been married only two years, and Carrie was not quite twenty-one. Her husband was thirty, considered fine-looking, an excellent business-man, and a perfect terror to delinquent clerks and careless book-keepers. He exercised the same espionage at home, and criticised Carrie's domestic arrangements unsparingly. To tell the truth, she did not understand very much about the details of housekeeping; her mother had never learned her; but she loved her husband deeply, and for love's sake tried in every possible way to please him. Since the birth of the baby, she had rarely succeeded, for the cares of maternity occupied the greater part of her time, and the child was so feeble that it was but seldom she dared trust it to the nurse.

Mr. Appleton finished his toilet in silence; and as he was leaving the room, remarked:

"What shall I send home for dinner?"

"We have sufficient, I think, for to-day. There is plenty of cold turkey—and oysters."

"Yes, but I intend bringing Mr. Lee home to dine with me, and I should like to have something half-way decent."

"Anything you please, then," replied his wife; "but, I wish you would invite company any day but Monday. Cook is always so cross; and neither nurse nor I can get near the range on Mondays."

"Well, then, get another cook, if she's got to be mistress," and off he went, never stopping to kiss or caress his wife, who looked up at him beseechingly, as he slammed the door.

Generally, if everything had pleased him at breakfast, and there had been no sins of omission or commission, on those occasions he would appear very loving, and gladden his wife's heart by a few words of commendation and a parting kiss; but this morning there had been a button off, and Carrie knew too well that her punishment would be heart-starvation, until she had redeemed herself by some extraordinary culinary preparation, which would tickle her master's palate and cause him to forget, for a brief period, past offenses. Don't any one dare look at the above picture and say it is overdrawn. I could point you to hundreds of such cases, where women, for the sake of a morsel of love and sympathy, will transform themselves into slaves, and in some cases never recognize the bondage, to minister to a husband's physical wants—while he, with niggardly hand, pushes her a few soul-crumbs when he feels disposed.

Carrie had a trying time that day. Baby never was so fretful; and cook never so ugly. Mr. Appleton sent home chickens—and beef to roast—and salad—and celery—and a little note asking that Carrie would please have a plum pudding made, and pies—and not furnish dessert from the baker's or restaurant. Carrie sent for a woman to come in and wash, so that cook could give her attention to the dinner. She stoned raisins—picked over currants—made blancmange, and so forth—and it was after five o'clock before she dared leave the kitchen and dress for dinner. She was quite sure her husband would find no fault with anything, and, fatigued as she was, she nevertheless made a very elaborate toilet, and descended to the parlor to wait for Mr. Appleton and his friend. She wore her husband's favorite dress—a rich garnet silk; her luxuriant light-brown hair was brushed plainly back from the ears, and wound in a natural coil at the back of her finely-shaped head. Her complexion was delicate; her eyes, a fine expressive gray; form rather petite, but in symmetrical proportion faultless.

She heard her husband's step, and fancied he was alone, but was not quite sure, until he entered the parlor.

"But, James, where is Mr. Lee?"

"I don't know; I waited for him until an hour past the time, then came without him: detained by business, I suppose. How finely you are looking, Carrie, my darling. Now, why can't you fix yourself up every night like this? It is so refreshing, after a poor man has worked like a dog all day, to come home and find his wife so radiantly beautiful. Come here, pet."

But just then the dinner-bell rang, and Mr. Appleton's heart leaped into his stomach, and the caress was forgotten. He enjoyed his dinner as only an epicure can. Carrie was too fatigued and disappointed to eat, for she well knew that the whole tedious performance would perhaps have to be gone over again in a day or two. Every article was pronounced excellent.

"You are improving very fast, Carrie. I shall not be afraid to invite company home with me often after this. Mother couldn't have had things more to my taste—though I think, Carrie, she does put a trifle more seasoning in the salad."

"Mother" had always been held up to her as a paragon of everything excellent in disposition, housekeeping, management of servants, and so forth—in fact, according to her son's account, she had not one vulnerable point; and it was with a sinking heart she listened to a letter announcing her arrival the next morning. Carrie knew that her husband had invited his mother to spend the winter with them, but very much hoped she would decline.

"You don't appear pleased, Carrie?"

"Do I not?" said she, trying to force a smile. "I never have seen your mother, James; and it is but natural that I should feel a little timidity in regard to her first visit. You consider me such a poor housekeeper, in comparison with her, that I scarcely know whether she will make all necessary allowances for my youth and inexperience."

"Oh, pshaw! If you always do as well as this, you needn't be afraid of any one's criticisms."

"But I cannot always, James. This whole day have I given up, body and soul, to the preparation of this elaborate dinner; and it would be an utter impossibility to do so, only semi-occasionally. The baby takes up most of my time night and day, and the poor little thing has been sadly neglected to-day."

"What in the world did our grandmothers do with a dozen children, and no servants?"

"Then, style was nothing, James; and children wore stuff dresses and calico aprons. Husbands, then, didn't bring home company to dinner, and expect a hotel bill of fare."

Carrie was tired out; and the total absence of the right kind of sympathy made her feel like indulging in a good hearty cry; but she restrained herself, and after another sleepless night with baby, arose to superintend breakfast, that all might be unexceptionable when her husband returned from the steamer with his mother.

Carrie looked very lovely that beautiful winter morning, but she was pale and sad, and there was a strange quiver of the lip as she watched the carriage stop, and her husband tenderly assist a fine matronly-looking woman to alight.

"Oh, if she would only love me!" moaned Carrie. "If we could only take some comfort together! I begin to think my life is a mistake."

She forced a pleasant smile, and advanced to meet her mother-in-law; but was in no way prepared for the tender, motherly greeting she received.

"Why, James, you did not tell me your wife was sick?"

"She's not sick," laughed James. "You are not accustomed to delicate complexions like Carrie's."

"I am only a little tired, mother," replied Carrie, feeling quite sure she might use that sweetest word in the language with perfect propriety.

"Do you nurse your baby, dear?"

"Oh, yes; it is a little, feeble thing, and is dreadfully troublesome—especially nights."

"I suppose, James, you take your turn cheerfully in getting up and waiting upon her?"

"Why, no; I never wake up nights at all. Carrie has never called me but once since baby was born, and then it had a convulsion, and she was frightened most into spasms herself."

"I should not suppose a true husband and father would wait to be called," said his mother, almost sternly. "It is just as much your business, James, to relieve your wife in her exhausting duties, as it is hers to see that your wardrobe is in order and your meals well prepared."

Carrie's spirits rose at once; and when at breakfast Mrs. Appleton praised the coffee, and the rolls, and the broiled steak, the tears filled her eyes, for she saw that this woman of long married experience would show her where her duty commenced and where it ended, for she had got sadly befogged.

James went to business, and Carrie took her mother-in-law on an exploring expedition all over the house; and as they seated themselves in Carrie's room—baby asleep in Mrs. Appleton, senior's arms—the latter remarked:

"Now, Carrie, I know when I was your age the idea of my mother-in-law visiting me was perfectly killing, and I was quite sure that you felt the same in regard to me. But you need not. While I remain here, I desire to be of all the service to you I can. You are sadly in need of rest; and if you continue in this style, your health will be permanently injured. You must be governed by me a little, and I will relieve you in your household superintendence and mending, so that you may give yourself a few necessary hours for sleep, out-door exercise and reading—neither of which a woman should wholly neglect—if she desires to retain her health and beauty."

Carrie improved under the sunny influence; and grandma understood so well what babies needed, that the delicate little plant began to thrive and grow, very much to Carrie's delight. James seemed to be on his good behavior, too, until one unlucky morning he pulled a button the least bit too hard, and off it rolled on to the floor, taking a piece of the band with it.

Mrs. Appleton, senior, was in the room adjoining her son's, and when he commenced to storm so violently, she stepped to the door to see what was the cause of such an outburst. She heard him say:

"You are lazier, lazier now since mother came, than you were before, and that is entirely unnecessary. You had better spend a little more time attending to your husband's shirts, and less in the street!"

In his fury and haste to remove the offending article, he tore it about half off him, and surveyed the ruin with evident satisfaction.

"I never tried that before, but I give you fair warning, that, if I ever find another button off, I'll tear the shirt into pieces—that's the way Skinner says he always does."

"Is it possible that my son has such an ungovernable temper and is so unjust to his wife? I can account now for her pale face and sad expression."

"You need not wait dinner for me, as I dine with Fred Cary and his wife, and go to Wallack's with them this evening," said her amiable spouse as he left the room. Several times recently had he done the same thing, leaving Carrie at home, never seeming to think that her pleasures were few, and that she might enjoy mingling with the outside world a little. His mother was deeply incensed, and now, said she:

"Carrie, if you don't cure him of this fault-finding and roving, you are not the woman I take you for. Can't you get some friend, or relative, to take you to the theatre this evening?"

"Oh, no!" said Carrie. "I never would lower myself so in my own estimation, to say nothing of my husband's."

"Don't be foolish, Carrie. Desperate diseases require desperate remedies."

In the course of the day Carrie's uncle called, a returned Californian, one whom her husband had never seen. He was a man about forty years of age; extremely handsome, and unexceptionable in dress and manners. To him Carrie confided her little plot. He entered into it with a good deal of feeling—for his niece had always been very dear to him.

Carrie arrayed herself in her most elegant style, and it was with no little pride that Uncle Frank escorted her to a conspicious seat in the dress circle. Carrie looked around, and lo! directly opposite sat Fred Cary, his wife and sister, and her recreant lord, playing the agreeable to the young lady after the most approved style, and no one would ever have supposed, from his present cavalier manner, that he ever swore about his shirt buttons.

"How much that lady, just over there, in the first tier, resembles your wife, Mr. Appleton?" said Mrs. Cary, passing him her opera-glass.

"She does indeed!" and he secretly believed it was Carrie, but could hardly credit the evidence of his own senses. He was acquainted with all his wife's friends, and who could her escort be? Surely he must be mistaken; and yet that was her hat, with its delicate face trimmings, and velvet cloak, and the new set of ermine he gave her at Christmas. She did not seem to notice him, yet I doubt if look or gesture escaped her. Carrie managed adroitly so they should not meet in the lobby; and she and Uncle Frank were home, and the latter had just time to exchange a few words with the elder Mrs. Appleton and reach his chamber, when James came rushing in, a perfect picture of vexation and bewilderment.

Carrie had only removed her hat, and that lay on the table beside her, while she leaned back in the comfortable Turkish chair, describing the play to her mother-in-law with an independent, nonchalant manner which her husband had never before dreamed her capable of.

"Well, then," said he, slowly, "I was not mistaken. It really was my wife that I saw at Wallack's, enjoying herself with another man than her husband. I could not believe the evidence of my senses"—and James actually looked distressed.

"It strikes me that I saw another woman's husband paying quite devoted attention to a very sweet young lady," said Carrie, with a curious air. "Won't you please unbutton my gaiter?" lifting her little foot to his knee. "I fear these boots are a trifle too small. But, nonsense, James; we won't have any difficulty in regard to little things like these. Save all your tragical airs for shirt-buttons, dear. I find that it is entirely unfashionable for husbands and wives to be devoted to each other in these days; so, hereafter, let's both feel a perfect freedom to do exactly as we please. You devote one evening each week to lodge; one to club; one or two more to dining out with a friend and attending places of amusement; and the time you spend at home, we all know, is anything but pleasant! so, as we haven't but one life to live, let us extract as much comfort as we can from it. I intend that shall be my course in future. The play was excellent; don't you think so, James?" but James only groaned.

Carrie didn't notice him, but kept right on with her description of the performance to her mother-in-law, as if she had not been interrupted.

"Mother, is it possible that you uphold my wife in this behavior?"

"Your wife, my dear son, is under no more obligations to you, than you are to her. Your right is hers, if she feels disposed to use it; and my only wonder is, that she has not taken advantage of her privileges before this."

"Oh! dear, I am so sleepy! How has baby been, mother?"

"Slept all the evening, my dear!" and Carrie bade her mother-in-law "good-night," and went to her room. James soon followed. Carrie chatted away pleasantly about this new style and that, and the appointments and scenery, but her irate lord never vouchsafed a word.

Carrie's breathing soon became very profound; and her husband, satisfied that she was asleep, dressed himself, and went to his mother's room.

Carrie knew right well what that movement was for, and laughed in her sleeve as she quietly waited for him to return.

Mrs. Appleton could not remember the gentleman's name, and so the poor fellow laid himself down again, but not to sleep. In the morning, buttons were all right; eggs boiled just three minutes; muffins, as light as a feather; the coffee, clear and yellow as gold. His wife, in her most bewitching morning-dress, as chatty and attentive as little wife could be. After vainly trying to find something to scold about, he kicked the cat across the room, and started to business. The ladies had a good laugh. Everything had acted to a charm.

Carrie, with the sanction of her mother-in-law, had attempted a lesson which, without it, she never would have dared thought of, much less inculcate. James was home in good season. Mrs. Appleton was seated at the parlor window, amusing baby.

"Where's Carrie, mother?"

"She went to ride. I am expecting her home every moment."

He did not hear the carriage-wheels, but seeing baby clap her little hands in delight, he sprang to the window, just in time to see Mr. Stylish Whiskerands drive off with his magnificent team.

"Why, James, are you home before me? I hope you didn't wait for me? Frank and I stopped at the Fifth Avenue, on our way back, to see Katie Beers and her husband, and they insisted upon our dining with them."

"For God's sake, you haven't disgraced both yourself and husband by showing yourself at the Fifth Avenue Hotel with that scoundrel, have you? Oh, Carrie, we shall have to come to some terms and separate. It seems to me I must be dreaming."

"Well, I declare, James," said Carrie, laughing heartily, "you are making quite a time because I—late in the day, it is true—follow your example, and take a little comfort on my own responsibility. I tell you it is the mode, dear!"

"D—— the mode! If I catch the villain that's making himself so fresh round my wife, I'll hang him to the nearest lamp-post."

"Catch him first, and then do whatever you please with him," said Carrie, tantalizingly.

Affairs continued in this state for several days, until James was almost distracted. Carrie played her cards so skillfully that he could do nothing but rave, and that she enjoyed wonderfully.

One afternoon, just after lunch, Carrie was playing and singing some old favorite songs for Uncle Frank, when the parlor door opened softly, and in walked Mr. James Appleton.

"Ah!" said he, sarcastically. "Pardon me for interrupting so confidential a tête-à-tête, but I have private business with you, sir; and you, madam, I will settle with afterward."

"So do, dear," replied his wife, making a mock courtesy. "This, Mr. James Appleton," taking the gentleman by the hand, "is the individual of whom you have daily heard me speak—Mr. Frank Sherwood, from California—my uncle."

It is needless to say that James immediately saw the point; and, though he occasionally forgets himself, and storms a little about things undone and things overdone, yet he learned the valuable lesson that it would be as well for a few other married men to understand—that buttons will, once in a while, drop off, steak be overdone, muffins sometimes heavy, in the best regulated families, and especially when, with a young wife's incompetency, the husband adds (without sharing) the double burden of a large family.

Pity there are not more mothers-in-law of the above stamp!

THE LATE WILLIAM HUTCHINGS, OF PENOBSCOT, MAINE.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY G. E. COLLINS, OF BUCKSPORT, MAINE.

WILLIAM HUTCHINGS.

THE heroes of our Revolutionary struggle, which gave us a country to fight for again, and a Union to preserve, may be overshadowed by the splendid achievements of our late conflict, but they will not be forgotten, though they may have fallen into comparative obscurity.

On the 3d inst., William Hutchings, who was one of the four still on the official pension roll, died in Penobscot, Maine, at the great age of 102 years. He was born in Maine, when it was a colony of Massachusetts, in 1764, and at the age of 12 took part in the battle of Lexington, as drummer boy. He continued in the service of his country during the war, and then retired to his former home. A year or two since he was made the recipient of a bounty of $300, in addition to his pension. His funeral was attended with special honors, on the Monday following his death.

Our engraving is made from a photograph, and is a good likeness.

No token of respect to these veterans can be too marked, and as links uniting us to a past generation, while they live we will delight to honor them, and when they die, we will embalm their memory.

DESCRIPTION OF FASHIONS.

FIG. 1. Promenade Costume. — Single-breasted morning coat of any suitable material, the lapel and collar being covered with rich black ribbed silk. Vest of the double-breasted form, without collar, and opening low.

FIG. 3. Lady's Riding-Dress. — Habit of fine black cloth; the train long, and full at the bottom, but having the breadths gored, so as to sit with less fullness below the waist. Basquine body, without collar, fastening at the neck only, and having the front edge cut away, with the corners rounded off. The skirt of the basquine is rather long, and the back is made with plaits like those of a coat. It is trimmed with fine black silk braid.

FIGS. 2 and 4. Lounging Costume. — Single-breasted jacket of the paletot form, cut to hang perfectly square, with the corner of the skirts rounded off. It fastens at the neck by a single button, and has the collar, of the shawl form, covered with velvet. The back is without seam in the middle, and the openings of the pockets are placed at the tops of large welts, stitched round to imitate flaps. Underneath is worn a vest, without collar, double-breasted, and opening rather low.

FIG. 5. Visiting Costume, for visits of ceremony, weddings, etc.—The dress coat is of superfine black cloth, the collar of the shawl form, and covered with rich silk to match. The fronts are cut so that the coat may be worn buttoned or unbuttoned.

A DARING FEAT.

RAILROAD men are often considered reckless and unfeeling, but instances frequently occur that exhibit, on their part, the noblest feelings, and a willingness to sacrifice themselves for the safety of others.

The incident shown in the illustration recently took place on the Grand Trunk (Canada) Railroad, and is thus described by the Montreal Gazette:

"Mr. T. Laughland, driver of Engine No. 73, was coming down the line on the 28th ult., with No. 7 freight train, when, on passing round the curve, two miles west of Cornwall, he saw a drunken man sleeping on the track. He immediately whistled down the brakes, which the conductor and brakesman applied as quickly as possible; but the distance was so short that it was impossible to pull up in time. Laughland immediately ran out on the cow-catcher, and as the locomotive came up, he stooped forward and seized the man by the neck and endeavored to pull him on to the cow-catcher; but being unable to do so, he jumped off with the man, and succeeded in throwing him clear of the train. The whole train of 17 cars passed the place before it could be stopped. On learning the facts, the authorities ordered that two days' pay should be handed over to Laughland, as a slight reward for his gallant conduct."

The high appreciation of this noble conduct on the part of the authorities is especially worthy of note; and in future, engineers who peril their lives to save a stranger's, may expect a slight increase of pay as the reward for their heroic endeavor.

TRACEDY.

THE illustration with this title proves that the face is a good index to the feelings, and the picture is an excellent study. One can readily imagine how, as the scenes of the drama succeed each other these spectators are swayed with con-

TRAGEDY—HOW A PART OF THE AUDIENCE WAS AFFECTED BY THE PLAY.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A SEA-LION.

On the rocky islands off the coast of California, thousands of sea-lions may often be seen reposing in easy indifference, and forming an immense menagerie. At the approach of a stranger they generally take to the water, unless they are watching over their young, when, with open mouths and protruding tusks, they warn the intruder against too near an approach.

A recent visitor to the haunts of these animals thus relates his experience: "My companion and myself had spent some time watching the young seals at play with each other, and listening to the low moaning of the older ones, that sounded very like the braying of a mule. Occasionally, as we threw a stone among them, the majority hastened off to the water and disappeared beneath the surface. Desirous of bringing away a trophy, my friend caught a young calf, and was carrying it off in triumph, when an old warrior, evidently a patriarch of the tribe, suddenly advanced upon him, seized the skirt of his coat, and with one angry shake and a loud and fearful roar, tore it from his body. This part of the programme had not been anticipated, and we gladly relinquished our booty and made good our escape, not deeming a repetition of the experiment in the least desirable."

flicting emotions of wonder, sorrow, indignation and surprise, unconscious that they themselves are performing a side-play not in the bills. We can conjecture the character of the play from the effect it produces on these personages, and as it is not often that such marked results are manifested, the actors must be highly gratified with the evident appreciation of their impersonations.

THE DOG DIANA NURSING LIONS.

THIS is one of those occasional incidents that show how natural instincts are sometimes extended to embrace objects beyond their ordinary exercise. The dam of these young lions having died, they were adopted and nursed by Diana, a favorite dog in the menagerie, which watched over them as tenderly as if they had been her own litter, until they had grown sufficiently not to need her care. The evident pride the dog takes in her strange family, and the devotion she manifests toward them, are worthy of note, while she seems wholly unconscious of the peculiar relation she is sustaining to her dependents, and the singular attachment she has formed.

MACARONI-MAKING.

IT was toward the afternoon that we got into Amalfi. A host of touters besieged us in vain; and as Domenico, the driver of the coach that brought us, usually gets a fee from the padrone of the inn for every guest he brings, he was eloquent in its praise. An army of loungers surrounded us, shouting for a "bottiglia;" and, thus accompanied, we arrived at the doors of the Locanda del Cappuccini, where the Don Matthieo is something of a magnifico, and seems to think it somewhat of a condescension to play the host. The fare and treatment are very good.

I had a special object in view, which was to describe the great branch of industry by which Amalfi and the neighborhood subsist.

"Where will you take us, Luigi," said I to my cicerone, "to see macaroni made?"

"Well, sir, Gambardella is the largest maker," was the reply.

Off we went to the great flour prince of Amalfi. A stream of water rushing down from the mountains in front of a great factory, marked the place we were in search of; but, before entering, I stopped to purify my shoes from dirt acquired in the way. One rushed to get water, another straw, and another a brush.

"I'll skin this stranger!" said the first of my eager assistants. "If I don't get half a piastre out of him—may I be hanged!"

"You have made a mistake," I replied, in Italian. On which the whole party laughed heartily.

The scene within the fabrica was comical enough. A crowd of men and boys, half blind with flour, and as white as cauliflowers, set on a fever, bumping up and down; and making it describe the arc of a circle. Grinding, sifting, mixing, kneading and pressing, were all going on in the same place; the manufactured article being taken to another place to dry. With pencil in hand and book on a sack, I began to take notes.

"He is going to make a story about us," said some of the men who had mustered around us.

"No, he is not," said others; "he is going to set up a macaroni fabrica in England."

"Signor! will you take me with you?" said a sharp-looking, fair-complexioned young man. "Fifteen hundred ducats only will set it going."

The poor fellow was really in earnest, I believe, and was somewhat disappointed when I assured him of his mistake.

The grain used for making macaroni is of the very hardest quality, is grown principally in Puglia, and is known as Saragalla. It is washed in the mountain stream which flows down from behind the city, and woe to the wearied traveler who is awakened at the dawn of day by the numerous grain-washers. The operation is cleverly and rapidly done, and amusing enough it is to watch it. When ground—which it is by the action of water-mills—the flour is sifted into five different qualities. The first is called Farina, which, being sifted, is divided into Fiore and Brenna. The fiore is used for making the ordinary macaroni, whilst the brenna is used as food for the horses and pigs. The fiore is itself again sifted until a yet finer quality, called azemmattass, is formed. This is used to make a superior kind of macaroni. A last sifting produces semolina, the finest kind which can be formed.

The flour is well mixed in a large tub, in the proportion of 24 carats of water (a carafla being about a pint and a half), to 150 Neapolitan pounds of flour. The quantity thus used, goes by the name of a Pasta, and is put on a large kneading board. At the further end of the board a long lever surmounted by a swivel; and there is no other extremity of it sit three or four half-naked, girdled men, who, for three-quarters of an hour, move backward and forward on a kind of horizontal see-saw, describing diminutive arcs of circles. In this way the lever is brought to bear upon the dough, its mixing and cutting it till all is ready for pressing. The men remind one of figures in Egyptian drawings—stiff and unnatural. The hard work, however, and there is always a relief party to take the place of the exhausted men. The last operation is most important, as it gives its character and form to the macaroni.

There are various kinds of macaroni, or pasta, rejoicing in different names, as vermicelli stellata (starred), acine, depepe, riccioli tali (flowing rocks), mezzani de, mezzani (meon seed), cochi di perroni (partridge eye), capelluti (little hats), strozzapreti tion (small bowels), punti del ago (needle points). The first is that long sort which we English use as a dole or necessity. All the others are used to thicken soup, like barley.

First, let me speak of the vermicelli: When kneaded, the dough is put into a large brass cylindrical vessel, hollow above and below, but at the lower extremity is fixed a movable plate, perforated with holes. When held up to the light it looks like the section of a honeycomb, being circular. On the top of the cylinder is a block, corresponding to its size, and the whole is then exposed to the action of a press. Screw goes the press, and far below, from out of the holes of the cylinder, a series of white worms protruded their heads. Screw, screw again, and out they come—longer and longer; until, having arrived at the legitimate length, they are cut off; and so the operation of screwing and cutting is continued until the whole quantity of dough is exhausted. The vermicelli is then hung upon poles for drying, which requires usually about eight days, under favorable circumstances, a north wind being always preferred, as a sirocco wind is preferred for the kneading.

With regard to the smaller kinds of paste, they are made by a mixture of machinery and handwork. Thus, the cylinder being placed horizontally, is filled with a razor standing by its side, and, as the dough protrudes through the holes, he cuts it off immediately into small bits—a simple and primitive method enough.

The smallest kinds of all are made, however, by hand, and principally at Minori and Majuri, two small villages which we passed en route for Amalfi. In fact, the whole coast lives by making and eating macaroni; and one probable reason of this is, that thing, as the whole of that district, lives under lofty mountains, which are intersected by deep ravines, down which pour mighty torrents, there is an unlimited supply of water power. It was informed that in Amalfi alone about 80,000 tonnoli of flour are consumed annually for all purposes; a very small proportion for bread, for your macaroni-eater is not a great bread-eater. Altogether, there are about 20 fabriche of macaroni in the city, which fabriche employ, in the simple manufacture of the article, about 15 hands. There is a much larger number of persons are employed in the washing, and preparation, and carriage of grain; for everything is done by hand, and great numbers prepare the macaroni on a small scale, without dreaming how their more limited enterprises with the title of fabriche. Gambardella is evidently the great man of the place, for he imports his own grain; has four brigantini of 250 tons each, which bring up grain from Manfredona and Sicily; and what Gambardella does not consume, he sells amongst his neighbors.

Let me now put on a paper cap and a white apron, and describe combining this article, for some experienced hints on the cooking of macaroni: In England, it is boiled to a pulp—ercr be first. Others take your water—At Naples might say—let it boil well, and then put in your macaroni. The finger will soon ascertain whether the macaroni is softening; and before it loses the consistency, you must take it up. Now then for your sauces. You may mix with it either a good tomata sauce, or a rich meat gravy, and a pile of grated cheese must be placed on the table, out of which you must perforce sprinkle your macaroni. There are many other more complicated and more luxurious ways of dressing the article, which are beyond the reach of my science. With the smaller kinds you will stir with your soup, and some of them you may convert into a really delicious dish, called Pricat Strangolapreti, so fond are the reverend gentlemen said to be of it.

When we had finished our survey, we found the horses at the door, and so was Domenico, Il Matthen, from a window at the prime minister was making divers elegant and condescending bows to us. We responded with a host of graceful ones, beset the path, and away we dashed through Atrani, Majuri, and all the other places which we traversed on our before. There was much to admire in the heavens, and the heat was all too powerful; yet it was the middle of November. What a climate! what a country! and yet what a government!

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.

A CALIFORNIA correspondent of the Times gives the following racy illustration of life in Sacramento city, the Capital of California:

"If asked to define Sacramento, I should say it is a place where everybody shoots at everybody and nobody. They call it a dull place. Perhaps it is, but it is quite lively enough for me. Each man that I have visited Sacramento it has been my fortune to have bullets singing about my ears, without anybody having injured in the row, or even knowing what it was all about. The last time it was a genuine case of crowding the mourners.

"In company with three or four friends last Sunday afternoon, I stood in front of the Orioma Hotel. A gentlemen of my acquaintance was coming toward the group, and I halloed to him to know when he had arrived from Collinsville. He saw me, but what people would scarcely understand, even though I explained it to them. He was looking intently down the street, past us, as though he saw a ghost, and made no reply; the movement he declined to make was to shake hands. Thinking that he saw some one he didn't wish to see—a sheriff, perhaps—I turned around, was pointing 'suspects' at him, we all turned round, just in time to see a man run out into the street before me with a revolver in either hand, who, as soon as he saw me, threw up his left hand and fired on the run. At first it was quite amusing to see the crowd of men that looked on to see the fellow fall' but so knew a trick worth two of that, and suddenly the man with the revolver backed in an swing-post, and then he began to shoot up-street at a fellow named Blue at a distance of about fifteen paces. Blue's whistling around my ears yet. Such a rudder as that is not a record you want to make. There probably not less than 150 people on the sidewalk when the shooting began, but that number seconds isn't a sou was to be seen. Lest. Ellis suddenly remembered that his wife was waiting for him across the street, and though he saw a gentleman beckoning to him down in the next block, Assemblyman Billy Stevenson called him in express-office, under the impression that a package had been left for him; and Superintendent Crocker in a painting on the rear of a hack that stood close by, which I occupied myself. A new broadwork could not be wished for nor found, but imagine my disgust when the hackman suddenly whoa'd his box and drove off at a 2:40 gait, leaving me exposed to the fire of the belligerents. Curiously enough, they both carefully emptied their pistols at each other, without any regard to the outsiders that happened to be within pistol-shot range, no one was hurt.

"My very bad shooting for Sunday. The belligerents were two 'short-eared sharps.' A difficulty occurred between them in the Congress, the evening and one of them told the other to be 'fixed' when he should see him next. Then, as now, the street was a favorite phrase with our people. It has many and various meanings. Sometimes it is said to mean if he has a brace of derringers or a six-shooter slung to him he is ready for a fight at $100,000 apiece. If he is on bad relations with any member of the opposite sex are such that he is ready to 'shoot on sight.' But in all these things—in short, to be fixed is to be very comfortably provided for—whatever the occasion may happen to be. The synonymous phrase about being 'heeled,' is of lower origin, evidently derived from the cock fighting pit. As I was saying, the party who was requested to fix himself, came down town a little while after, and the moment he saw the other party he pulled and banged away at him, shooting from the hip, and without taking his head most unconcernedly, a few of those who happened to be standing by him. Then he walked deliberately around, around, but if so, I didn't see them. But I did see three persons leaving hacks and run into the nearest stores, and I will venture to say that upon the cost-and grocery one of them a game of cards could have been played."

THE NEW METHOD OF SHOEING HORSES.

A PARIS blacksmith has claimed, as his own invention, what he terms a new method of preparing the foot of the horse for shoeing. It consists in first upon leaving the frogs and sole uncut to rest upon the ground, cutting only the wall of the hoof half an inch in depth, then placing the shoe in position, and, instead of driving the nails in the usual manner, he makes a Goodenough Horse Shoe proceeds from the manner in which the nail is prepared to receive the shoe, and that the shoe itself receives the nail so perfectly at each, and another of every description, that they are pressed tightly in the Goodenough patent is, that no nail shall be driven in and its point broken off in the interior of the hoof, as it does not require such heavy nails to fasten on, there is, therefore, no danger of injuring the sensitive portion of the hoof—the great cause of lameness in horses. Every nail is driven through the same shoe which makes them as superior to all other horse shoes, as the Standard shoe of Broadway is to the wooden shoes of the French peasant.

CONGRESS WATER AND CHOLERA.

IF credence can be given to a tithe of the experiences that find a place in the papers, none of the risks that there is better to be run with Congress water and need cause so little apprehension as cholera. And such there is great faith in the curative powers of the article, was a sure preventive of the disease. Savings will be made, crowded hotels will be relieved, people can secure exemption from the dreaded pestilence, in addition to all the other benefits of Congress water, while the demand for the water, on the part of those who are compelled to remain at home will, doubtless, be largely increased. The specific is a cheap and agreeable one; let all try it.

PETRIFIED BUFFALO.—A St. Louis paper publishes the following paragraph: This extraordinary petrifying has discovered about two years since by some trappers belonging to Capt. Bent's company, lying on the side of the Rocky Mountains, in the Big Grande of the North is stream emptying itself into the Gulf of Mexico. Whether the water, or the mineral possessing petrifying qualities to an eminent degree, its absorbed. Not in specimens of various kinds in the petrified state, but productions in a petrified state. The petrified buffalo is described by those who have seen it as being perfect in its petrification as when living, with the exception of a small part of the skin on the head, which has fallen away, around which the hair has been worn off, probably by the rubbing against the trees, by which it may have lain for ages past to have produced such a phenomenon. The horns, and the hump and back, from the shoulder to the tail, though converted into almost a smooth surface, are plain to be seen. The horns, eyes, nose, mouth, mouth and legs, are as perfect in their stone as in their natural state. The country in which this curiosity was found is inhabited by the Kutenai, a roving band of Indians, who have never been known to kill bison, deer, or insects, snakes, toads, roots, &c. This tribe are particularly hostile to the whites, and the recent acquisition of this curiosity an undertaking not a little hazardous, notwithstanding this, and many other difficulties to be surmounted, such as distance, expense, &c., our enterprising citizens, Messrs. Charles Bent & Co., completes procuring and bringing it to the United States, with this, on his return from Santa Fe, during the ensuing autumn.

HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.—A treasure of a husband—sometimes the baby. A treasure of a wife—never asks for money. A treasure of a sun—has money in the bank. A treasure of a boarder—always pays his bill. A treasure of a lawyer—has a fine office. A treasure of a doctor—has a fine practice. A treasure of a minister—has a fine salary. A treasure of a cook—is not hysterical whenever company comes. A treasure of a mother-in-law—shuts the door's distant its door pegs to the middle of the night.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHEN are soldiers like blacksmiths? When they are drilling and filing.

WHAT plaything is above every other? The top.

AT what time should an innkeeper visit an insurance? When he wants a bar-gain.

A CROTTY old bachelor says that Adam's wife was called Eve because, when she appeared, man's day of single blessedness was at a close.

"GUILTY or not guilty?" sharply said a judge, the other day, to an inattentive female prisoner in the dock.

"Just to your home pleases: it's not for the likes of me to dictate to your honor's worship," was the reply.

WHY is the letter Y like an extravagant son? It makes a fool of U.

WHEN a bear enters a dry-goods store, what does he want? Muslin (muslin).

WHAT two fish should be tied together on a frosty day? Skates and soles.

WHEN is money damp? When it becomes due in the morning and mist in the afternoon.

WHEN did Moses sleep five in a bed? When he slept with his four fathers (forefathers).

WHAT is that which people wish to have, and when to get rid of? A good appetite.

WHY has a dandy a doleful appearance? Because it keeps its hands before its face.

WHAT do we often drop and never stop to pick up? Stitches.

WHO is the lady whose visits nobody wishes though her mother is welcomed by all parties? Miss(s).

WHY is a forged bank-note like a whisper? Because it is uttered, but not allowed (aloud).

BRILLIANCE says: "I could never find the meaning of the word 'collar' in Webster. But riding one day on the New York railway I saw it all. It was the sitting of a gentleman who was trying to pass each other on a single track. If I remember correctly, it was a shocking failure.

An indignant lady describes metaphysics as "two men talking together; one of them trying to explain something to the other saying about, and the other unable to understand him."

"FATHER, what is meant by reading to-day about illuminated manuscripts; what were they lit with?"

"With the light of the sun, my son."

JONES says a person's character depends a good deal upon his bringing up; for instance (says he), a man who has been brought up by the police seldom turns out respectable.

"I THINK," said a fellow the other day, "I should make a good editor of Congress, for I use their language. I received two bills a short time since, by way of which to remit payment; the one I ordered to be laid on the table—the other to be read the first six months."

THE WAY OF LIFE.—Broadway.

NORTHERN MYTHOLOGY.—"A chieftain to the Highlands bound"—Promethus.

AN ARCHAEOLOGIST.—Solomon speaks of the "angel of the rainbow." That must be an archangel.

A WINE.—Why talk about not sleeping a wink, when people in their sleep never wink.

THE LAZIEST MAN.—Why is Chang the laziest man in the world?

Because, on account of his height, he is the longest to bed.

FELT.—A hatter advertises that his hats fit so easily on the head that the wearers scarcely feel them. Impossible, unless they are felt hats.

PROFESSIONS.—Why are lawyers and doctors safe people by whom to take examples?

Because they are always safe in their professions.

On being told of a surgeon who amputated a lady's arm, and afterward married her, Nix wondered how she could have got around him so.

THE FIRST LOVE KISS.—A young lady's first love kiss has the same effect on her as being electrified. It gives a shock to the system.

THE COWKEEPER'S PARADISE.—The Milky Way.

"YOU cruel man, my tears have no effect on you at all."

"No, I drop them, dear."

POOR consolation for us survivors that "the good die first."

BEN JOHNSON said of a certain lawyer who died, "he was good to stay with but bad client."

THE TWO KINGS.—The two kings that rule in America—Ice-king and smo-king.

WHY are strikes unscriptural?

Because they are not to be found in the kiv law.

"MENTAL ABSTRACTION."—Stealing the ideas of others, and fancying them your own.

A REMARKABLE FACT.

THE COLTON DENTAL ASSOCIATION, 19 Cooper Institute, have used Vitalia for 11,445 patients with laughing gas, all of whom by their signatures certify that it was done without pain, and that the gas was pleasant. Not headache or nausea followed its use. Dr. CARNOCHAN and all our leading surgeons endorse the gas as the best and only really safe anesthetic now in use.

COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE. DINSMOOR & CO., Boston. This is a most comprehensive book on agriculture, horticulture, and landscape gardening, and deserves a place on every table, more especially those belonging to country people. It contains 650 pages and 250 illustrations, all of which are of special interest.

A COUNTER ATTRACTIVE.—Shall I, (writes a fair correspondent), take Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery which we are periodically feed for the amusement of the Patients? The scene is a barber's shop. Enter a lord, carrying a little black bag; he takes out a guinea—where did he find it?—and a pair of pistols. "Barber," says the customer, "my face is very much troubled by the growth of hair; I want it off." "Certainly, my lord, a glance, a glance, and you see those." "Stop!" cries the pistols. "Good," says the barber, and leaves him and his razor, and returns with a bowl. "Now please shoot my pistols, they?" asked my lord. "Not least to be sure," and he pointed the article." "If by accident I had scraped you, I should just have cut your throat with the razor, you know, gentlemen!" My lord retires all the sacoir faire of the Frenchman.

The People have been so much imposed upon by several worthless Sarsaparillas, that we are glad to be able to recommend a preparation which can be confounded on as containing the virtues of that invaluable medicine, and is worthy of the public confidence. Dr. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA cures when anything can cure the diseases that require an alterative medicine.

Spies and Informers.

Every medal has its reverse, and the benefits of civilization are not without this counterpoise. Society insists upon the defense of its rights, and in the instruments which it employs for that purpose we see its darkest side. People submit to a great deal from the police simply in their office of custodians of our lives and property. Occasional acts of tyranny, of overstretch of authority, even of inquisitorial interferences, are leniently regarded, because a few questionable proceedings are vastly overweighed by the general good. But below the police proper, there is a lower power, bearing to it the relation that the jackal does to the lion, or the pilot-fish to the shark. That it is unseen before it strikes, that its chief element is mystery and concealment, make it all the more detested: yet it performs a function, which, though base, is of no small importance, and however much we may shrink from it, we must acknowledge its utility—it is that of the informer.

Perhaps our recent experiences of war and its usages—experiences which crop up constantly in strange and unexpected places in our social system—may have made us less intolerant than formerly of the presence of this excrescence. We have learnt what part spies play in the art of war: how useful—nay, oftimes how absolutely indispensable—they are to the General in command, and we no longer shrink with disgust from intercourse, more or less intimate, with those who have so served their country. Various are the motives that have led men to hazard their lives in such a pursuit. With some it has been the natural development of a love of intrigue and mystification; others have followed it for the gains which it brought, large in proportion to the risk run; while others again, we doubt not, acted from a pure and intense devotion to the cause they thought right, and as they could not serve it in any other way, they did so in this. But even at his best, useful as the spy might be, still he was a spy. Fidelity and integrity could not invest his calling with honor. He might hold his life more cheaply, risk it more freely, and exhibit more heroism than the soldier; but the rewards of a soldier—promotion, medals, the thanks of a grateful country—were denied him in life, as in death was a soldier's grave. And for the reason of this we have not to seek far. Wherever candor, honesty, and fair-dealing are esteemed and held honorable among men, there must treachery, dissimulation, and deceit be the objects of scorn and detestation. Yet the more perfect the spy is in these vices, the more accomplished he is in his profession, still he is only redeemed from our utter abhorrence by the belief that he will practice his gifts only against a common enemy, and that when he retires to private life the arts he has acquired will be laid aside.

What spies are in war, the services they perform, the estimation in which they are held, will apply pretty accurately to informers in civil life. Very odious are they, yet very necessary; and theirs is, we confess, rather a hard lot, when the sense of the utility of their labor does not diminish its infamy. Somebody must do our dirty work, and why should they be degraded by it? There must be night scavengers, some one must clear away the carbureted hydrogen, there must be hangmen; and if these classes must exist, why should they be less honored than others who are not so repulsive to our senses? In like manner, informers being necessary, or thought to be so, a plea is put forward against the disfavor with which the public is naturally inclined to regard them. As prejudices cannot be removed by logic, or social distinction be attained by labored arguments to prove that it is deserved, we are not disposed to take up the cause of these outcasts with an idea of showing they are treated with injustice. We would rather accept the facts as we find them, and content ourselves with pointing out one or two considerations in relation to the system itself, which may place it in a truer position before our readers.

Any infraction of the laws, either Federal, State, or Civic, brought to the knowledge of the authorities within whose jurisdiction it occurs, by any other than their regularly appointed officers, constitutes the person so bringing the offense to their notice an informer. It cannot be said that the officers of Government are not frequently, in the discharge of their duties, informers; but in their case the odium that attaches to the name ceases, and for most obvious reason. It is on private individuals, or amateurs, as it were, that the term, as one of reproach, falls heaviest; but even here, again, there are limitations. When the service is rendered to the authorities disinterestedly and without desire for reward, we hold that, in most instances, the sense of public duty, the public spirit, honorable and praiseworthy, which impelled his action, removes the stigma that attaches to the informer in the case which we now come to consider. And this is the case of the informer by trade—of the man who lies in wait for his neighbor, denounces him for some offense which can only be expiated by a fine, and then, as his own pay, pockets half the penalty. It is not wonderful that such a mode of livelihood possesses irresistible attractions to some minds. It has all the excitement of the chase, without the danger, and the reward for the capture is sure. Neither are we prepared to say that the system which has opened this field of operations is altogether wrong. In our complex fiscal arrangements, where fraud is so easy and so profitable; in our new endeavors after better city government, where evasions are so tempting, it would be difficult to find a more effectual check than that of making it the interest of some persons to point out violations of the laws, by giving them a share of the penalties the delinquents incur. Of course it is a question of taste with any one if he chooses to go into the business. He may be useful, but he is despised; he is rich, but his name is tainted; he has protected the laws of his country, but his assistance was voluntary, and his motives the most base. We are told on the highest authority, that "offenses must needs come," but surely no obligation is thereby imposed on us to extenuate the conduct of those on whom rests the malediction of "woe unto that man by whom the offense cometh."

The Veto and Colorado.

THE interposition of the veto power, or of the judgment of one man against that of many, and those the chosen representatives of the people, should never be lightly made—certainly never in any partisan interest, or to gratify personal pique or pride. It should not be often made, otherwise it will lose the respect with which it has hitherto been regarded as a power exercised only on extraordinary and important occasions. The Constitution and its framers never contemplated that the President should use the veto on all occasions where his individual opinion on public measures does not wholly coincide with that of the Legislative department of Government. The President is not the sole responsible branch of the nation. The responsibility of government does not rest on him alone. If it did, we might as well call him Dictator and abolish Congress. Measures that may appear to be of doubtful character to a man engrossed with Executive duties, and with scarce an hour to give to consecutive thoughts, may not be so in fact. If wrong, the people will not fail to know whom to hold amenable. Acts decisively passed by Congress will be judged of, approved of, or condemned, as Congressional acts, even if the President, doubtful of their utility, should waive his objections and allow them to go into force. It may be said broadly, that the President is never held responsible for legislation, unless it be suggested or advised by himself.

The manner in which the veto power, only to be resorted to, according to the theory and practice of our Government, in extreme cases, is praised by partisans when it happens to accord with party views or purposes, is reprehensible and occasionally disgusting. It is a power, we repeat, which may be dangerously exercised, and of the exercise of which we should be as jealous as the President should be careful. It is not too much to say, that, of all our Presidents, there have been few of much more than the average capacity of native born American citizens or whose opinions, as individuals, would or should command more weight than those of any other individual of the vast body of their peers. Those opinions do not become immaculate through any accident of position, nor are they to be set up, without grave cause, against the matured results of the deliberations of the people's representatives.

President Johnson should remember in time, and before his acts pass into history, that those Presidents who have been most prodigal of vetoes are not those whose memory the people most delight to honor. The one man power may, to use a vulgarism, be very readily "run into the ground," and sink into contempt.

The last veto by President Johnson is of the bill admitting Colorado as a State, and we quite agree with the President that the practice of admitting States inadequately qualified has got to be an abuse. In most cases the movements to advance fledgling Territories are purely those of politicians, spoilsmen and adventurers, who seek to be Senators, or Representatives, or Governors, or in some way to obtain place and patronage. It is rare that they are spontaneous or popular. In the case of Colorado, with all the exertions of the classes of men we have designated, the project of a State organization was carried, on a total vote not larger than that of a single ward of the city of New York, by the insignificant majority of 155 votes! On a previous occasion and on a larger aggregate of votes, a majority of 3,152 was given against the project. As set forth forcibly by the President, in the recent election, on the question of becoming a State, the aggregate vote was only 5,905; while in a legislative election in 1861 there were cast 10,580 votes, whence the President naturally infers that the population of the Territory has decreased, and falls far short of the number entitled by law to qualify the Territory to become a State. The action of the President will commend itself to the good sense of the country, and meet public approval.

Still, we cannot resist the humiliating conviction that, as the bill for the admission of Colorado would not have passed Congress except to accomplish partisan ends, so it would not have met executive disapproval except to defeat and embarrass partisan ends. But for the split between the Executive and Congress, the bill would not have passed on the one hand, nor would it have failed on the other. This is not a lofty view of the course of practical statesmanship in Washington, but it is, we fear, the only one that can be taken.

We sincerely trust that the President may not be betrayed, through any excited spirit of antagonism, to make use of his veto in cases less dubious than this of Colorado, and in which it cannot be so easily justified. The veto may be made an instrument of good; it may be made a nuisance and a curse, subversive of the fundamental principle of republican government.

Reaction of America on Europe.

THE late war has been, in many of its results, the greatest blessing conferred on the country. It has intensified and strengthened American character. It has given consistence, solidity and manhood to the nation. It has effected not alone a political and social regeneration, but given the country a material impulse and status, such as could not have been reached through decades of peace. It has begotten intellectual activity, and an elevation of tone, feeling and spirit, which only comes with a consciousness of wealth and power. If we were all-unconscious of it ourselves; if, as the change from boyhood to adolescence is scarcely comprehended by the individual, we have grown from gristle to bone without ourselves observing the change, yet we could not be long in ascertaining the fact through the altered and more deferential manner toward us of our national compeers.

The tone which is held to us by foreign nations and their rulers is in sharp contrast with that which prevailed five years ago. The Emperor of the French is glad to please and pacify his people by telling them how much his system of government resembles ours—paying unwilling homage to institutions which he detests and a power which he fears. In that stronghold of traditions and mossy prescriptions, the British Parliament, the example, progress, strength and future of the United States come in to lend new interest and illustration to debates hitherto commonplace and drowsy, and our institutions and the capacities developed under them are freely quoted as proofs of the necessity and advantages of changes in a system of government hitherto claimed as perfect, but which it is now considered ought to be assimilated to ours.

A Ministry which once pronounced the United States moribund under the effects of a false and exploded political and social system, now seeks to retain power and influence by adaptations of principles and institutions from our governmental organization. The masters of finance, who predicted the monetary collapse of the United States within the Gothic—we mean the Sewardian—period of "sixty days," now study, respectfully and attentively, the financial machinery which carried us through, and the nature and extent of the resources on which it was founded. The prophets of bankruptcy, repudiation and ruin—the Jeremiahs of European Bourses—now eagerly buy American securities on the slightest decline, and affirm by deeds, as well as asseverations bordering on the profane, that they never doubted the financial strength and solvency of the "Great Republic."

Among the statesmen of England is a man of great erudition, who knew, some years ago, more of ancient than modern republics, and who purchased some crape for his left arm, and some for his hat, and also a pocket-handkerchief, and otherwise prepared to sorrow, in the fashion said to be practiced by crocodiles, over the "late Union." Mr. Gladstone has exchanged these unnecessary articles with his dealer, and has come out with a gay set of ribbons—"red, white, and blue"—as the admirer and always friend, even as the copyist of the United States—that epitome of national wisdom and virtue! See what universal franchise (for all except "niggers") has achieved! Therefore let us extend the franchise! And the Commons says, "Of course!" See how people act who know how to pay their debts, and are willing to do it! And if the Americans can lift the load of debt and taxes from the shoulders of future generations, why may not we? And the Commons look wise and ponder, no doubt thinking it can and should be done. How Mr. Gladstone conjures with the American name and American facts, let his recent speech on the English Budget, extracts from which we publish elsewhere, answer.

If our example or our deeds can in any way react beneficially on the country to whose kindness, favor, and courtesy we owe so much as we owe to Great Britain (including, we believe, Shakspeare, the Alabama, and the English language), we shall be happy indeed! Filial gratitude is strong within us. The child never forgets its beneficent mother.

THE assassination of President Lincoln has been made the subject of a most extraordinary European melo-drama. The piece is entitled "La Vie et la Mort d'Abraham Lincoln," and is divided into seven tableaux. The author, M. Reuben, has sketched the early days of the President's humble life in the first act, and as a lawyer in the second. In the third, he has attained the rank of President, and Booth appears as a suitor for the hand of his niece, which proposal being rejected, rankles in the breast of the lover, who becomes his mortal enemy. In the fourth act, Surrattville is depicted, and Mr. and Mrs. Surratt appear on the scene, as well as Jefferson Davis, who gives it as his opinion that as long as Lincoln is permitted to live the cause of the South is lost, and exclaims: "Who will get rid of this man for us?" "I," replies the future murderer. The fatal 14th of April furnishes the material of the fifth and sixth acts. Abraham Lincoln, aged and worn by the tremendous responsibilities of the war, grants an audience to a mother, who frantically calls on him in the name of her dead sons, killed in the war, to make peace on any terms. Lincoln, exhausted by the scene, has, however, sufficient command of his feelings to promise his wife that he will accompany her to see "King Lear." The whole of the death-scene is then represented. The President, his wife and Miss Harris take their places in a front box in the midst of the theatre. On the stage the actors perform a portion of "King Lear." A pistol-shot, the screams of women and the death-groan of the dying President, are melo-dramatically given; and while the audience are absorbed in the horror of the moment, Wilkes Booth jumps from a box on to the stage, brandishing a poniard, and uttering the well-known words, "Sic semper tyrannis."

AMERICANS have long ceased to feel or evince the slightest sensitiveness under foreign criticism, and chiefly because it has been marked neither by truth nor that brilliancy which disposes us to accept it in place of truth. We can laugh, as well as the best, at the extraordinary, bizarre, and never-to-be-found-in-real-life character, the stage Yankee; and we have equal amusement in reading the portraiture of America and Americans in books written by literary Bohemians, mountebanks, fiddlers, dancing-masters, and barbers, pretending to unvail American society and criticise American manners. A man named Herz, who, we believe, played on the piano, and obtained some "greenbacks" by astounding country villages with his performances, has undertaken to write about America—a task for which he is quite as capable as a pig for polka. He writes himself down fool on every page, and a knave and falsifier in many. It will not be difficult to decide in which category he places himself in the paragraph which follows:

"At Baltimore I had the rare advantage of being introduced into a club certainly more curious than delicate. I speak of the 'Spitting Club.' Spitting is a continual necessity in certain parts of the Union. It is a habit, an amusement, and for some a game of skill. I saw the members of the 'Spitting Club' in all their glory. They were seated around a chimney, the fireplace of which was masked by a sheet of iron pierced with half a dozen holes, about the size of a half-franc piece. It was into these holes that these virtuosos launched their projectiles with a grace and facility which cannot be too much admired."

A WRITER on bees and honey, estimates that for every 1,000 pounds surplus of honey collected by bees, the total collection must be 7,000 pounds, or about three and a half tuns. He concludes that there are few sections of our State, in which the flowers produce more than 2,100 pounds of honey to the square mile, equal to about 75,000 pounds, or 38 tons to a township six miles square. This amount would require about 1,080 colonies or swarms of bees to collect.

TOWN GOSSIP.

IT bodes ominously for England that, even as the stars once fought against Sisera, Nature is now doing the same thing against the arrogant "Mistress of the Seas;" for she has turned Fenian—that is to say, if "Wearing of the Green" be any sign, for during the past week every shrub, flower and plant, has displayed the Emerald flag at its mast-head. And this reminds us of a joke which the Head Dis-Organizer of the Irish Republic made to Mr. Greeley, when the latter was introduced to him last Tuesday: "Although I am green all over, do you see anything green in my eye?" which drew from the philosopher of the Tribune the placid remark: "No; for it seems only to be looking out for gold, for it is all yellow!"

But we will dismiss the heroes of Erin and Slievegammon by observing that the Irish Republic may be considered as established, since the gallant little republic of Chile, so far as it is represented in the person of Mr. McKenna, has recognized her sister of the Atlantic.

Our Artist, on the last page of our paper, has given a faithful sketch of a provident Teuton family on their Sunday ramble: which reminds us that our sister republics of Jersey City and Hoboken are in a state of intense indignation at the hebdomadal invasion perpetrated every Sabbath on their unoffending shores by the famished hordes of thirsty barbarians from New York. It may be sport for the rowdies of Gotham, but it is death to the pacific New Jerseyites. Last Sunday not a native-born Dutchman of Hoboken could get a drop of lager for their supper; every keg had been stormed by the bibulous New Yorkers; and who can relish Leimberger kaese with only aquam Passaicam, the only liquor New Jersey now has after eight o'clock P.M. every Sunday night? The popular proverb is for once reversed: instead of New Jersey living on the stranger, the stranger eats New Jersey out of house and home, the only party benefiting being the keepers of those numerous basements which are the architectural ornaments of Hoboken. The new liquor law sets Hamlet's advice to Polonius at defiance. When a man wishes to make a fool of himself, it will not let him do it in his own house, but sends him abroad to Harlem, Westchester, and New Jersey to do it, to the great scandal of the Empire City.

The recent election for officers of the Mercantile Library, which, of course, resulted in the triumph of the regular ticket, reminds us that Mr. Thomas Hastings Grant, who had been for over 18 years librarian of this admirable institution, resigned about two months ago, and has been succeeded by Mr. A. W. Green, who is eminently qualified for the position. A catalogue of this excellent collection of books has just been published, and it forms a goodly octavo.

One of the topics of the week is the Buisley Pantomimic Troupe, now daily expected in this city from San Francisco. Their agent, Mr. S. Corbyn, arrived by the last steamer, and has engaged the Academy of Music for a series of performances, to continue for about six weeks. They commence on the 11th of June. The California papers pronounce them far superior to either the Ravels or the Hanlons.

In the late robbery of the Adams Express Co. on the New Haven Railroad, one Grady, a brakeman on the line, was, it appears, one of the chief conspirators; but—as the statement goes—"the testimony against him was not deemed sufficient to hold him, until about one week ago, when he was caught in the act of robbing a passenger in his train, and it was then deemed time to arrest him, charged also with participation in the Express robbery." We should like to know what missing link of the first robbery was supplied by the second? If the evidence as to the first was not so complete as to warrant Grady's arrest, how did the second robbery cast any light upon it, except as to the character of the man? Supposing Grady had never committed the second robbery, would he have ever been arrested for the first? And if he might have been, why was he left in a position to commit a second felony? And lastly, for which offense is he now to be tried? Is the first proved by the second, or the second by the first? Is it an injudicious question, whether the second affair was not arranged as a trap to catch a man against whom there was only a suspicion of a prior and greater crime?

If the origin of the use of bells in churches was that of exorcism, if by their din the devil be scared away from the souls of the dying and the habitations of the living—we fear the "spirits of the power of the air" are going to have a good time in our city. The Board of Health ordains "that no large or church bell shall be rung or tolled at any funeral in either of said cities, without a permit therefor from this Board, nor shall any such bell be rung or tolled at any other time, to the prejudice or peril of the life or health of any human being." No doubt it was in the mind of the framer of this ordinance that, in one of the towns of England, during the prevalence of the cholera, the sound of the "passing bell" had a depressing influence on the minds of people, and tended to aggravate the disease. But if all noises are nuisances to the sick, the hammering at a good many boiler works might be suppressed by the Board; and if the knowledge of the progress of an epidemic causes panic and simulates the disease, it might be wise to conceal from the public the daily or weekly lists of deaths.

There has been quite a lull in the theatrical world. Mr. Dillon has been performing at Niblo's to good houses, and Mr. and Mrs. Barney Williams have been starring, in Gaylor's clever "Connie Soogah" at the Winter Garden. But the star system is so deleterious to the real interests of the drama, that it must, with the advancement of art, disappear. That very unpleasant reality-melodrama, "It is Never Too Late to Mend," still maintains its ground at Wallack's. We really pity that most admirable and artistic actor, Mr. Young, for being compelled to enact such a trashy part as the Savage. We hope, if he ever meets Mr. Reade, he will insist upon satisfaction on the spot. Even the charming Miss Henriques loses somewhat of her fascination in this most sad and lugubrious drama.

At Barnum's, the drama now performing is, "Bendito; or, the Children of Zingali." The scenery is excellent; indeed, we must compliment Mr. Barnum upon the success which has lately attended this department of his Lecture-Room. The principal characters are performed by that estimable and clever actress, Mrs. J. J. Prior, and by Miss Jenny Cleaver. Mr. Daly, Mr. Hadaway and Mr. Bridgeman are, as usual, very effective.

As for the Menken, we shall content ourself by observing what the Editor of the Independent says: "That her 'Mazeppa' has not enough dress for a lady, and a trifle too much for a model artist." After all, it requires a theologian to be a good dramatic critic.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

SOUTH ROOM.

No. 329. "The Physician — Hawthorne's Scarlet Letter," by Mr. Oliver J. Lay. A good and characteristic figure, and well painted. Mr. Lay has caught the spirit of the written sketch, and has transferred it to the canvas in faithful reality.

No. 530. "The Mountain Side," by Mr. George H. Smillie. Sky very luminous; the distances good, and the sense of looking off from the mountain finely rendered. The foreground detail is not so successful.

No. 335. "King Lear," by Mr. Ed. H. May. The scene is, we suppose, intended to represent the interview between Lear and his daughter Cordelia. Although a very pretentious, this cannot be said to be a good picture. It is tricky, and not always correct in drawing. The color is hardly worthy of Mr. May. There are, however, some good points in the grouping, and there is fair vitality in the action.

No. 342. "Portrait," by Mr. W. M. Hunt. A well-arranged group, and very pleasant in color.

No. 346. "Love's Melancholy," by Mr. Constant Mayer. Very fine in expression, but perhaps a little forced. In attempting to give a tearful expression to the eyes, the painter has made them too liquid, so that they seem to be dissolving in tears, and actually running out of the young lady's head. The effect is a little overdone, and yet it may be allowed on the plea of a sudden suffusion springing up from a momentary bitter thought. The hands are beautifully painted and very expressive, and Mr. Mayer cannot receive too much praise for his arrangement of the drapery.

The conception of this picture is exquisitely poetic, and the feeling is tender and beautiful. The girl is no idealized beauty, but a lovely specimen of simple womanhood, in the freshness and delicate roundness of youth. The whole figure, in its graceful lassitude, faithfully and charmingly expresses the sentiment of the picture.

No. 354. "November Morning," by Mr. Gilbert Burling. Good in drawing, but a little artificial in color. Mr. Burling has evidently studied the habits of game birds very carefully.

No. 356. "Woods of Asshokan," by Mr. J. E. McEntee. Beautiful in color and exquisite in detail. The white shirt of the figure, however, is out of tone with the rest of the picture. With this exception, it is one of the finest landscapes in the exhibition in point of truthfulness to nature, feeling and general effect.

No. 358. "Fruit," by Mr. Paul Lacroix. An excellent study of fruit, both as to arrangement, form and color.

No. 360. "Hunter Mountain—Twilight," by Mr. S. R. Gifford. Painted in Mr. Gifford's happiest style. The subdued glow of the twilight is remarkably rendered, even for Mr. Gifford.

No. 363. "Portrait," by Mr. George A. Baker. This is, upon the whole, the best portrait on the walls of the Academy. The upper part of the figure is very luminous in color, and the hands are the best specimen of flesh in half light that we have ever seen. Mr. Baker is nearly the only great colorist that we have among our portrait-painters. Such pictures as this are refreshing, after being wearied by the portraits painted year after year by men who hold high positions in the National Academy.

No. 365. "Waiting for a Pilot," by Mr. M. F. N. De Haas. One of Mr. De Haas's best pictures; very fresh and pleasing in color, with spirited action.

No. 371. "Death of Tybalt," by Mr. Alfred Fredericks. By far the best picture that Mr. Fredericks has yet painted. This picture, differently hung, would appear to be, what it really is, a very good piece of color; but, unfortunately, the gray tone throughout the shadows is almost identical in color with the wall which the Academy have so ingeniously painted, to the utter ruin of many excellent pictures.

No. 372. "Shakspeare Arraigned before Sir Thomas Lucy for Deer-Stealing," by Mr. J. W. Ehninger. There is in this picture some very good painting. Mr. Ehninger, perhaps, has not sufficiently considered the perspective of the figures; those in the foreground are somewhat too large to be correct, and the group wants compactness. The costumes are generally well painted.

No. 375. "Drifting," by Mr. W. J. Hennessy. This is a picture strikingly unpleasant in color, and suggests too strongly other compositions of the same subject by eminent foreign artists. The treatment of accessories is in some respects excellent, but the faces are too vague in drawing to be expressive. The eyes, as in the gentleman's picture, "In Memorium," seem to be omitted.

No. 377. "Returning from a Raid," by Mr. J. A. Oertel. It would, perhaps, be better for Mr. Oertel's reputation were he to confine himself to crayon drawings, in which he is remarkably successful; and still more should he abstain from animal subjects, in which his slight knowledge of comparative anatomy often leads him astray. The color of this picture, both in light and shadow, is very injudicious; the chiara-oscura is also incorrect. There is no difference indicated, either in outline or intensity, between the general shadow thrown across the group by some object out of the picture, and the cast shadows directly under the feet of the animals. This is an inexcusable error. Among the errors in drawing, we notice all the legs of the animals, the chest and shoulders of the led horse, the arms and shoulders of the negro on horseback, the neck and head of the horse upon which he is riding, and especially the two oxen chained together, who could not possibly take the relative positions in which they are drawn, on account of the well known law of physics that two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time. These faults stand out glaringly, and are apparent to the least observant eye.

No. 380. "Valley of the Androscoggin," by Mr. James Fairmean. This would have been a fine picture in effect, had not the yellow tints been so injudiciously chosen. In other respects it commands attention.

No. 388. "Compensation," by Mr. George C. Lambdin. The subject is very good, being much pleasanter than Mr. Lambdin's sick people usually are. The treatment is good and effective.

No. 390. "The Last Touch," by Mr. W. D. Washington, is so full of merit, that it deserves a much better space than has been allotted it.

No. 392. "October in the Kaatskills," by Mr. Jervis E. McEntee. Too violent in color, and is much below Mr. McEntee's usual stand. Some of the detail in the foreground is, however, very fine.

No. 397. "First Printing of the Bible, 1450," by Mr. Edwin White. There is room for improvement, in every respect, in this picture. It is indifferent in design and color. It gives evidence of carelessness, which should never appear in the works of an artist of reputation. Had Mr. White been more earnest, he could have done more justice to the subject.

No. 399. "Morning Glories," by Mr. W. T. Matthews. A clever picture. The subject well treated and very carefully painted.

No. 409. "Gettysburg," by Mr. J. F. Cropsey. This is a vast extent of landscape, which from the total absence of feeling and the lack of any one point of interest or visible effect, amounts really to nothing as a work of art. It might be characterized as a portrait of the American flag and the flagstaff on which it is hung; and its value might be appraised by the fact that the subject, being upon a large scale, necessarily required a correspondingly large canvas.

No. 415. "At the Front," by Mr. George C. Lambdin. A pleasing picture, were it not for the painful fact that the principal figure, like some others of which we have already spoken, is eyeless. Whether this is occasioned by some wound which he has received, but of which there is no outward indication, or is owing to some absence of mind on the part of the painter, we do not know. But the fact remains that the unfortunate hero is as utterly and hopelessly blind as the fishes in the Mammoth Cave. At the next Academy Exhibition, we expect to see a number of figures painted without noses, which would make an agreeable variety. Apart from this, there is really striking merit in the picture, both as to color and character.

We must defer our notice of the West Room and the Sculpture Room, and also a retrospect of the other rooms, until our next issue. We have made after-notes of several pictures of merit, which must not be passed over without mention.

MR. GLADSTONE ON NATIONAL DEBTS.

MR. GLADSTONE'S speech on the English Budget, alluded to elsewhere, contained the following interesting passages in relation to the gradual increase of the national debt of Great Britain and the capacity of the United States to carry a heavy financial burden:

How the English Debt Increased.

The total of the national debt, which is commonly supposed at the close of the great war to have been £900,000,000, though not including all these items, had turned £900,000,000 of money, the actual figures being £902,264,000. Of course I do not include in that any allowance for the sinking fund, which I exclude altogether, as I speak only of the real obligations of the country. In 1830 that total had been brought down to £842,405,000. A good deal had been done in that interval, as will be seen, for the reduction of the debt, but little had been done for the liberation of the industry of the country. A beginning might have been made, but if it was commenced, it was a commencement only. In 1840 the debt had fallen to £837,648,000, or by a very small sum—namely, £4,500,000; but it must be recollected that during that interval a loan of £20,000,000 had been contracted for the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indies. Virtually, therefore, the reduction in that period amounted to nearly £25,000,000. The lowest point was reached on the 5th of January, 1854. It then stood at £800,515,000. Then came the Russian war, and Parliament resolved to meet the expenses of that war in great part by taxes immediately imposed on the people; consequently the increase of debt was much less rapid than it would otherwise have been, and much less rapid than it must undoubtedly be if ever unfortunately this country should become involved in a prolonged war.

On the 31st of March, 1857, the debt had risen to £831,722,000; on the 31st of March, 1859, it was £828,934,000; and on the 31st of March, 1866, it was £798,909,000. [Cheers.] That is nominally a point somewhat lower than it has stood at before; but it must be remembered that we have canceled two minor sinking fund stocks, which formerly formed part of the nominal capital, so that, in fact, we may say with substantial accuracy, for it is not necessary to be particular to a million or a million and a half, it has now just reached the point at which we have effaced the results of the Crimean war, and the debt thus stands at the very place which it occupied at the commencement of the year 1854.

Debts of Different Countries.

I have here the national debts of nine countries in Europe, estimated from the most trustworthy data I could obtain. I find that, with the exception of Holland's, there is not one of these that has not been virtually contracted in the last half century, and by far the larger part of them have been contracted during the last twenty years—a time of peace; for if there has been any war expenditure added to them during that time, it is insignificant in amount. Holland, I find, acts prudently, and reduces her debt, while the finances of Prussia are a model of good administration; for Prussia's debt stands at £43,000,000, and Holland's at £85,000,000. Russia's debt is estimated at £279,000,000, and Austria's at £316,000,000. The debt of France is not a capital debt, and it is difficult to estimate it with accuracy. It is made up of rentes of twenty-three years' purchase, and, as nearly as possible, it amounts to nearly £400,000,000. It is the largest of these debts, yet, because of the immense resources of the country, and the energy and wonderful thriftiness of its people, one need, perhaps, feel less anxiety for its future security and strength than for the stability of any other European government.

Italy's debt stands at £152,000,000, and it is increasing with portentous strides. The debt of Spain amounts to £145,000,000; Portugal's is estimated at £83,000,000: and the debt of Turkey, which I believe to be entirely a modern institution, principally created since the Crimean war, amounts to £51,000,000. The great bulk of these debts, amounting altogether to £1,500,000,000, have accumulated in a time of peace, and have not been thrown upon the several countries during a struggle for life. I will not trouble the committee with details of their rate of increase; but, omitting Holland, which has decreased its debt, and omitting Prussia, which does not habitually increase it, and omitting Spain, also, which keeps its debt nearly at an equilibrium [laughter], we have six of the nine countries who have managed to increase their debts during a time of peace at the annual rate of £61,000,000 sterling. And this is growing; for, like other bad habits, debt-making has a tendency to spread. Europe should, therefore, know the increase, and look at it from a right point of view. It is spending in a time of peace the resources of war; it is exactly as if, in a year of good harvest, the country spent the whole of that good harvest, and half another harvest besides; and it should be remembered that if peace be preserved in Europe for the rest of the century, the debts of those nine countries, at the present rates of increase, would amount to nearly £4,000,000,000.

Debt of the United States.

The debt of the United States is in itself something wonderful—wonderful as the creation of four years, strictly of four years, and no more, and yet amounting to nearly $3,000,000,000, or £600,000,000, and the rate of growth of the debt in the last year exceeded, I think, £200,000,000. That is a wonderful debt, and its charge is enormous. It is not possible in the present state of the financial arrangements of that country to ascertain with precision, but I believe I am not wrong in saying that the charge of that debt is considerably heavier than ours, though the capital is less. [Hear, hear.] The smallest sum at which I can estimate the charge, is 31,000,000 to 32,000,000 sterling; and if upon the back of this sum we lay the necessary cost of raising the revenue—which in America is much heavier than it is here—I do not think the effective amount of taxation incumbent upon the nation at this time in consequence of the Northern debt (I do not include one farthing of the Southern debt), cannot be taken at less than nearly 35,000,000 sterling per annum.

Well, now, looking at these figures, a man would be struck with something like despair; but if we look at the position of the country which has to bear the burden, I must confess that I think the future of America, as far as finance is concerned—political problems are not now in question—will not be attended with any embarrassment. I do not believe that that debt will constitute any difficulty for the American people. [Cheers]. I am confident that if they show with respect to finance any portion of that extraordinary resolution which on both sides alike they manifested during the war, and of that equally remarkable resolution with which, on the return of peace, they have brought their monstrous and gigantic establishments within moderate bounds, [Hear, hear], I won't say that this debt, according to an expression which was once fashionable in this country, will be a flea-bite [a laugh], but that in a moderate time it will be brought within very small limits, and may, even within the life-time of persons now living, be effaced altogether. [Hear, hear].

At this moment America is, I believe, paying war taxes, and the amount of the revenue of the United States is not less, I apprehend, than 80,000,000 of money, the largest sum ever raised in any country for the purposes of a central government. The estimated surplus is from 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 sterling a year, and I believe at present only about 10,000,000 of their taxation are menaced by the natural impatience of the people with respect to some of the taxes that have been imposed. Mr. McCulloch, the Finance Minister of that country, strongly urges the policy of reducing the debt, and I am quite certain that from this side of the water we shall send him a hearty expression of good wishes for his success, both on account of our interest in the well-being of a friendly nation, and because it may be hoped that the example of America will react beneficially on this country. [Cheers].

LOWERING BOATS AT SEA.

WE have received, with the subjoined communication a pamphlet, entitled, "Davidson's Boat-Lowering, Detaching and Attaching Apparatus," published by Van Nostrand, which will probably prove useful to those specially interested in the matter to which it refers. It is known that, in nine cases out of ten, boats lowered at sea, on occasions of accidents, are "swamped," occasioning great loss of life. Any contrivance to avoid this risk and danger is a boon to the voyaging public. We are more interested in the efficiency of such contrivances than in the question of priority in invention:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1866.

Editor of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper:

In the number of your valuable paper, dated February 24th, you gave illustrations of Messrs. "Brown & Level's New Life-Saving Tackle," accompanied with a brief and complimentary editorial notice of the same. In this you exhibited a proper appreciation of whatever will tend to secure life or property at sea; but you will please allow me to correct a partial error into which you were led.

You say, in your remarks upon this tackle, that "we are actuated by two motives: one, as a matter of humanity; and the other, a patriotic pride that an American has been the first to promulgate it." Without desiring to disparage the apparatus to which you make reference, and which I have not seen, I beg to call your attention to the fact that Lieut. Hunter Davidson is the inventor and patentee of a "Boat Lowering, Detaching and Attaching Apparatus," a full description of which I herewith enclose you, which was adopted by the U. S. Navy in 1861, under a special act of Congress, after thorough tests made by several different boards of officers. You will perceive that by Davidson's apparatus boats at sea are not only detached from vessels while under full headway, but are lowered by one man with perfect ease, thus avoiding the danger, in moments of excitement, of lowering one end of a boat faster than the other, which would result in the loss of the boat's crew.

By Captain Hazard's experiments on board the U. S. steamer Pocahontas, it was ascertained that a boat could be released from its gripings and placed in the water, ready for use, in thirty-one seconds. He dropped his "gig" in the water frequently with the crew inside and his vessel steaming seven knots through a rough sea.

But, in addition to the fact that the boat is lowered by one man, and detached at any moment and at any distance from the water, the apparatus of Lieut. Davidson includes also a most ingenious attaching apparatus, believed to be the first improvement on the old plan ever invented.

Nor is the apparatus of Lieut. Davidson the first invention for "detaching boats at sea," though it was pronounced the best by a board of officers ordered by the Secretary of the Navy to test it, in competition with the several inventions of Messrs. Blount, Bishop, Brooke, Mealy, Tucker, and Lieut. Kynaston, of the British Navy.

Davidson's Boat Apparatus is now used on board the U. S. Practice-Ship of the Naval Academy. In her cruise during the summer of 1860, while running eight knots through a rough sea, she cut away the life buoy. The boat was manned, cleared away, lowered and detached in twenty-five seconds from the first alarm. In seven minutes and twenty seconds the boat was again in its place, the ship "filled away" and "courses set."

Very truly yours,

A. H. EVANS.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Memphis Post of the 2d inst. says: "An officer of the regular service, coming North from New Orleans, learned, in passing Grenada, that Lieut. J. B. Blanding, of the Veteran Reserve Corps, on duty at Grenada in conection with the Freedmen's Bureau, was shot three times on Monday night, while passing a ten-pin alley in that place. He was not expected to survive. He was a quiet, gentlemanly officer, and was apparently on the best of terms with the citizens. Lieut. Blanding had had one arm disabled at Fort Pulaski. He had also been wounded in the side."

—— The following public journals are edited by colored men: The Colored Tennesseean, Nashville; the Communicator, Baltimore, Maryland; Christian Recorder, Philadelphia; Anglo-African, New York; Pacific Appeal, San Francisco, California; Elevator, San Francisco, California; Colored Citizen, Cincinnati; New Orleans Tribune; Nationalist, Mobile, Alabama; Loyal Georgian, Augusta, Georgia.

—— The Memphis Argus proposes making a new State out of West Tennessee and North Mississippi, to be called the State of Jackson, with Memphis for its capital.

—— Gov. Orr, of South Carolina, has expressed his opinion regarding the teaching of freed people. He believes it is good for them and good for the State. He says the teachers shall be protected in their duties, and that the prejudice against them and their occupation is disappearing.

—— A dispatch from Nashville says that, on the 4th inst., a mob broke into and sacked a building occupied by the Freedmen's Bureau, at Meridian, Miss., and then set fire to and burned the building. It is also stated that on the 30th ult. the General Agent of the Bureau, at Grenada, Miss., was foully murdered. Gen. J. S. Wood, commanding that department, is making vigorous efforts to ferret out the perpetrators.

—— A letter in the Alton Democrat gives the particulars of the hanging of five men by the people of Jersey county, Illinois, for horse-stealing. The slack administration of justice against this class of offenders, and the persistent refusal of grand juries to indict them, appears to have infuriated the people and determined them to take the matter into their own hands.

—— Louisville is suffering from a visitation of rats, and a city ordinance is proposed giving a premium of a cent a head for every Norway rodent that shall be duly produced before the city treasurer. It is said that a man of ordinary industry, working eight hours daily, may earn from $5 to $15 per day by killing rats, even at this low rate.

—— Judge Abell, of the First District Court of Louisiana, has decided the Civil Rights Bill to be unconstitutional, and not binding on the Court. He argues that the present Congress is unconstitutionally constituted.

—— A late dispatch from Arizona conveys the startling intelligence that Fort Goodwin had been taken by the Indians, and the garrison, numbering 124 men, massacred and the fort burned.

—— Three hundred and fifty-five men are still employed at the Watertown, Mass., arsenal, in the manufacture of heavy iron gun-carriages for the forts of our extensive sea-coast, the orders for which still continue unabated.

—— Robert Tyler, son of the late John Tyler, writes to an Alabama paper that Maury's estimate of Southern losses during the war, at $7,000,000,000, is too high; the real loss not exceeding $3,500,000,000. Tyler's estimate is as follows: By emancipation, $1,700,000,000; expenses of the war, $600,000,000; destruction of private property, $700,000,000; additional federal taxation, $500,000,000; total, $3,500,000,000.

—— The Boston Traveler says that, within a circle of 20 miles of Boston, there now live nearly one-third of the population of Massachusetts, or considerably over 400,000 souls.

—— The Attorney-General of Wisconsin recently delivered an opinion in the case of a man who had served in the rebel army, and was afterward elected town-clerk in Red River, in that State, to the effect that his past disloyalty irrevocably unfitted him for office.

—— The President has signed the bill amending the Habeas Corpus act, protecting military officers from prosecutions for acts performed while in the execution of their official duties.

—— A correspondent of the New York Evening Post writes from San Antonio, Texas, as follows: "General James Longstreet, late of the rebel army, has been in San Antonio this week. The most remarkable circumstance connected with his visit was a serenade tendered to him by the band of the Fourth United States cavalry. He is now the president of an insurance company."

—— The Bangor (Me.) Whig says that in a pond near that city there is an island, of about half an acre in extent, which for many years has literally floated upon the water, having no hold upon the ground save what was afforded by the roots of some of the trees upon it, which had grown through the island into the bottom of the pond. The surface of the island is sufficiently strong to sustain the weight of a loaded team. Recently, however, a freshet in the pond raised the water to such a height that these roots were broken, and the island, impelled by the force of the wind, slowly drifted across the pond. It now remains near the shore, which the intervening logs prevented it from entirely reaching.

—— The Lieutenant-Governor of Nevada recently went on a little frolic and came to grief. Being ex-officio Warden of the State Prison, and in that capacity having received a lot of new uniform clothing for the convicts, he put on a suit and went into town. But he was immediately apprehended, taken before a justice of the peace, and sent to the prison as an escaped convict.

—— The Natchitoches (Louisiana) Times, of the 21st of April, says: "Both cotton and corn are growing beautifully, and freedmen working well." The North Louisianian says: "The freedmen are working, in most instances, much better than was anticipated at the beginning of the year, and our planters are as far advanced in their planting operations as is usual for this season."

—— There are in the United States—clergymen, 57,529; teachers, 110,469; professional authors, only 216; editors, 2,934; publishers, 917; printers, 23,106; booksellers, only 1,861; physicians, 54,543; lawyers, 33,193; judges, 787; nuns, 114; and sisters of charity, 1,379. Astronomy only figures with 2 professors, while astrology has 8, geology, 3.

—— The Canton (Miss.) Citizen says: "The freedmen are working up to their contracts, as a general thing. On the whole, the planters seem cheerful and hopeful."

—— By a Dublin letter it appears that the Fenian movement is as much a game of cross-purposes in the old country as in America. Instead of the Irish taking Ireland, as was intended, the Irish are leaving Ireland more eagerly than ever before. Never were they so void of hope as to the future of their country. The writer says: "A single arrest is made in a townland, and straightway a general exodus of the young men of the district takes place; a search for arms is made in a farmer's house, and immediately the able-bodied men living in the neighborhood prepare to fly to America. 'Westward, ho!' is the cry, and from every hillside and valley in Ireland the stream of emigration is pouring forth. Instead of a Fenian invasion, the finest army that the Fenians could by any possibility bring into Ireland would not equal in numbers and physical power the force of emigrants who have quitted the Irish shore since the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act."

Foreign.—In 1864 every inhabitant of the British Isles received 23 letters, while in 1863 the proportion was 22. The total postal delivery in 1864 was upward of 170,000,000 letters.

—— Of 6,336,000 souls, composing the population of Poland, the Jews are above 700,000; 11 per cent. of the whole. In many of the towns the Jewish population preponderates, but few Jews are found in the rural districts.

—— The cholera has again made its appearance in France. Cases have occurred at Guérande, Bourg-le-Ratz and La Croisic.

—— A novel apparatus for propelling balloons through the air has been devised by Mr. Butler, one of the members of the council of the new Aeronautical Society in London. It consists of a pair of wings, operated from the car of the balloon, whose downward blow is calculated to strike with a force exceeding 40 pounds, a power equivalent to an ascensive force of 1,000 cubic feet of carbureted hydrogen. The action required is somewhat similar to that of rowing.

—— It is stated that the defense of the Nottingham election petition, in England, cost Mr. Morley, ex-M.P., a round sum of £13,000, while his share of the election expenses amounted to £3,000. His colleague, Mr. Paget, who was the petitioner against Sir Robert Clifton, paid £3,000 during the election and several thousands in support of the petition.

—— It would appear as if something were to be done at last toward the better preservation of the valuable records and manuscripts contained in the monastic libraries of Spain. In conformity with a report of the minister of the Interior, the Queen has ordered a collection of them to be made, and to be called the "National Historical Archives." They are to be under the care of the royal commissioner.

—— The Spanish authorities have sentenced Gen. Prim, the leader of the late revolt, to be shot. But here they are met by a difficulty, as Prim is in London, and has not signified his intention of returning soon to Spain; and as his presence is indispensable to the carrying out of the sentence, this last is considered, even by the vain-glorious Hidalgos, as a matter of considerable doubt.

—— In Blackwood's Magazine is an article on "Demonology at Home and Abroad," in which the writer states that, as late as August, 1863, a man 80 years of age was flung into a mill-stream in the parish of Sible Hedingham, and "swam for a wizard," and died of his maltreatment, in Christian England.

—— The inhabitants of Taschkent have voluntarily resolved to set free their Persian slaves, as a compliment to the Czar, having learned that the Russians had emancipated their serfs in deference to his wishes. The Russian papers cite this as a proof of the civilizing influence of Russia in the East.

—— The Panama (New Granada) Star laments that that city, with a population supposed to be nearly 10,000 (for there is no census to judge by), possesses neither a public school nor a public hospital.

THE OFFICIAL LADIES AT WASHINGTON.

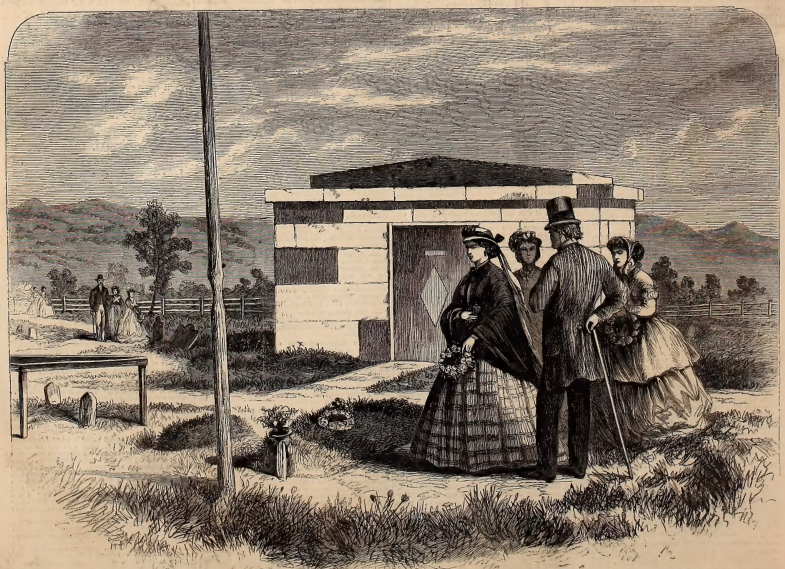
LOOK at the ladies of the White House. They are condemned to four years' imprisonment. During all that time they must not pay a visit or attend an evening entertainment. Miss Lane occasionally went out to a ball or party, but very seldom; Mrs. Lincoln, never; and it has gradually come to be considered undignified for "the first ladies in the land" to mingle freely in the gayeties of the season. Then, as for visiting at home, twice a week they must stand up and receive for many hours the herds that flock to see them, mostly from the merest curiosity, while at all times they are liable to the visits of the importunate or impertinent people, who will intrude upon their privacy. The very house they live in is not their own; it is a "furnished house" of the usual description, without comforts, dreary, dirty, and just now dilapidated. If, perchance, any member of the family appears at a window, there are eager eyes to watch every movement, and perhaps a scribbler to chronicle the operations of the toilet, as Mr. Willis did for Mrs. Lincoln.

The grounds around the house itself are not more sacred. The ladies cannot take a step outside without being watched and every feature noticed by people who expect to see something very extraordinary in the appearance of those temporarily "wearing the purple." "If," one of the ladies said to me the other day, "I could only walk about a little with my children sometimes in the grounds without being stared at, and really enjoy the comfort of an old dress and a little privacy, it would be very pleasant." And if they go out to drive or enter a shop, nods and muttered words indicate that they are the "observed of all observers." Mrs. Patterson has two little ones, and Mrs. Stover three bright-eyed, pretty children, who doubtless make these cheerless walls ring with their gay laughter and merry shouts.

The ladies of the Cabinet suffer in a less degree than those of the White House. They visit and go out as much as they please—indeed, with them an enormous amount of visiting becomes a positive affliction. Daily they are inundated with cards. Every week at their receptions strangers are presented, and all these people must be called upon. I met one of the Cabinet ladies the other day at Willard's Hotel. "I am here," said she, "for the purpose of leaving 60 cards." I was somewhat appalled at the number, and then went on to ask if I might inquire how large was her visiting list? "There are over 1,500 names in it."

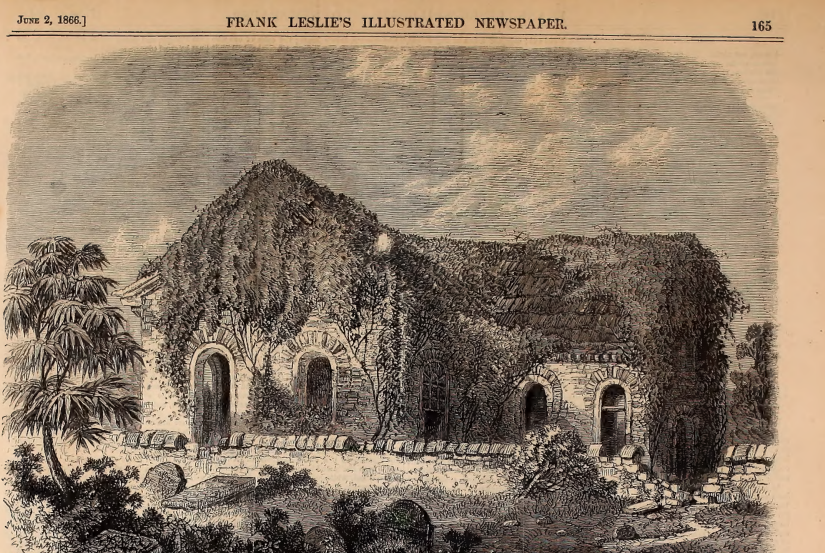
I shrank in some horror from this specimen of the "duties of office." Too much is required of them, too. Not only must these visits be returned, but an enormous amount of entertaining must be done. There must be two receptions a week—one day and one full evening dress affair. Then there must be innumerable dinners, suppers and small companies. Besides all this, they must all go at least once to each of the receptions and balls given by other members of the Cabinet and Senate. You may then form some idea of the onerous character of this "gayety." All day visiting—all evening going from one house to another. No wonder they look jaded and worn.

THE LATE THOMAS J. (STONEWALL) JACKSON.



GENERAL DON ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY COURRET HERMANOS, LIMA.—SEE PAGE 165.

STONEWALL JACKSON.



Few men were brought into greater prominence during the late war than Gen. T. J. Jackson, better known as Stonewall Jackson. He possessed in an eminent degree, those qualities that secure the devotion of friends, and the admiration of foes, and in his brief but brilliant career, proved himself a brave soldier and successful leader. In many respects he was without a peer, and no man could surpass the earnestness and spirit with which he consecrated himself to the cause of the Confederacy.

Firmly convinced, as we are bound to believe, that the cause was right, he brought to its support all the resources of an ardent temperament, an untiring energy, a practiced skill, and an eager, rapid intuition, that instantly took in all possible combinations and proved itself equal to any emergency. He was deeply in earnest, and his earnestness incited to action so prompt, so unexpected, so suited to the occasion, that he accomplished more than any other man in the Southern service. In coolness, dash and celerity of movement, he was unequaled, and almost invariably successful. While we regard his views as mistaken, we cannot withhold from him the tribute due to an accomplished soldier and a dauntless leader.

Gen. Jackson was born in Virginia, and graduated at West Point in 1846. His first military services were in the Mexican war. At the siege of Vera Cruz he commanded a battery, and for the coolness and judgment with which he worked his guns, was promoted to a first lieutenantcy. He was in all Scott's battles to the City of Mexico, and behaved so well that he was breveted major for his services. At the close of the Mexican war, Jackson resigned his position in the army, and obtained a professorship in the Virginia Military Institute, where he remained until the breaking out of the rebellion. He then promptly offered his services, and was soon commissioned colonel by the governor. His first conspicuous services were rendered at Manassas, in 1861, where his bravery and determination contributed largely toward the result of that battle. His subsequent career is well known. His strategy consisted in striking blows rapidly and heavily where they were least expected, while his genius enabled him to determine when his strategy would prove most efficient. He was severely wounded at the battle of Chancellorsville, on the 2d of May, 1863, and died on the 10th.

The simplicity and integrity of Gen. Jackson's character, added to his military achievements, made him the idol of the South, and elicited admiration and respect at the North, and his death occasioned universal sorrow, as the fall of a brave and virtuous man, great though misguided. His remains were taken to Richmond, and lay in state in the capitol, amid every demonstration of public sorrow, and thence were transferred to Lexington, and deposited in the cemetery of that place. Our illustration on page 164, gives a view of his resting-place, a simple unadorned grave. By his side lies one of his children. It is proposed to erect a suitable monument to his memory at some future day. His friends now show their regard by covering his grave with wreaths of rare and beautiful flowers.

THE OLD BLANDFORD CHURCH, PETERSBURG, VA.

In a country like ours, where everything is subject to constant changes, there are few objects that become venerable from their antiquity and cherished as the relics of a past age. Here and there, however, may be found a monument of other days, around which the moss of many years has grown, and which, dilapidated and ruined, is still crowned with picturesque beauty, and boasts an unequaled glory.

Such is "The Old Brick Church," as it is commonly called, or the Blandford Church, of Petersburg, Va., of which we give an illustration in this paper. It dates back to the year 1735, and was contracted for at a cost of £465 current money of Virginia. The edifice was not finished until 1754. The aisles were six feet in width, and laid with white Bristol stone. The pews, of which no trace now remains, were frames, with raised panels in front; the pulpit stood on the left of the southern entrance. The altar-place was between the two windows in the gable end, and the intermediate space on the wall was occupied by two arched tablets in gilt frames, on which the Commandments were painted in golden letters, relieved by a black ground. There was a gallery at the north end of the chancel, and another one opposite the altar-place, but the only trace of either now remaining is the bar across the second window, as shown in the sketch on the right.

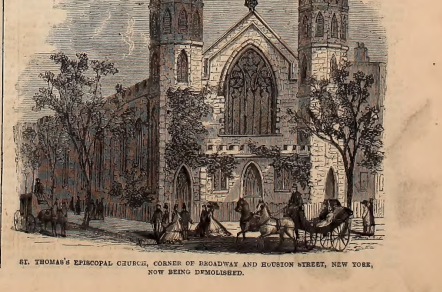
One fond of ruins will find himself irresistibly drawn to this interesting and venerable memorial, and in contemplating its crumbling walls and the neglect and decay that reign around it, may find ample scope for reflection, and an ample reward for any time he may spend at this shrine of the dead.

REV. WILLIAM F. MORGAN, D. D.

REV. DR. MORGAN was born in Hartford, Conn., December 21, 1818. He graduated at Union College, in 1837, and at the Episcopal General Theological Seminary, New York, in 1840. After spending some time with Dr. Berrian, of Trinity Church, he accepted the rectorship of a church in Connecticut, and continued his labors in that State until his call to his present parish of St. Thomas, New York, in 1857. In person, Dr. Morgan is tall, erect and well proportioned; in manner, dignified and graceful; in his intercourse with society, possessed and gentlemanly. As a public speaker, Dr. Morgan has the most acceptable qualifications; his presence is commanding, his voice clear, and mellow; his delivery, composed and earnest, and his words possess the elements of oratorical effectiveness, sincerity of heart and grasp of thought. The present flourishing condition of his parish is the best evidence of his earnest devotion and faithful service.

ST. THOMAS'S CHURCH, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

We give a fine picture of this church, which has long been one of the landmarks of our city, but is now to give way to the demands of business and be converted into a temple of Mammon. Verily our enterprising merchants are the most remorseless Iconoclasts the world ever saw, pulling so venerable, so sacred, or so endeared, that does not, sooner or later, become a prize to their vaulting ambition only to be numbered with the things that have been. We would have spared this appropriate and beautiful temple a little longer; for many long years it has invited the wayfarer on our principal street to turn aside and join in solemn worship; and it is with a feeling of regret and sorrow that we make this record—it is a sanctuary no longer! Services were held in it for the last time on the 6th of May. The congregation have made arrangements for the erection of a new church in a more eligible situation on the Fifth avenue.



St. Thomas's Church was founded and built in 1823, under the rectorship of the Rev. Cornelius R. Duffie, with a vestry comprising some of the most eminent names in the history of the city of New York. Mr. Duffie was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Upfold, now Bishop of Indiana. Dr. Hawley was the next rector, and did much to build up the parish. The present incumbent, Dr. Morgan, has officiated since 1857. The congregation is large and active, maintaining a flourishing Mission Chapel and Sunday School, and contributing liberally for religious and benevolent purposes. The noble Gothic features of this church are familiar to all our old citizens, who will miss its majestic presence from our great thoroughfare.

GEN. ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA,

Ex-President of the Republic of Mexico.

THIS eminent soldier and statesman, now on a visit to this country, was born in Mexico, in the City of Xalapo, February 21, 1798, and commenced his public career in 1821, when he was appointed Governor of Vera Cruz upon the expulsion of the Royalists. Owing to some dispute with the authorities, he declared war against Iturbide, whom he overthrew. In 1833 Santa Anna was chosen President. In 1838, when defending Vera Cruz against the French, he lost his leg. In 1841 he was once more made President; but a revolution hurled him from power in 1845. Regaining his lost power next year, he commanded the Mexican armies at Buena Vista, where he was defeated by Gen. Taylor, the American commander. He was afterward defeated again at Cerro Gordo, his antagonist then being Gen. Winfield Scott. On the 2d of February, 1848, peace was made with us, by which we gained California and other parts. In 1855 he resigned the Government of his country, and retired with an immense fortune to the Island of St. Thomas, where he resided till 1864, when he paid a short visit to Vera Cruz; but the French regarded him with much jealousy, that he returned to St. Thomas. He is now on a visit to the United States.

A SECOND MEZZOFANTI.—The Bohemian papers give an astonishing account of the facility for learning languages possessed by a Herr Szerzeal, a young Bohemian, only 19 years old. He is said to speak 30 languages, and to be not only thoroughly conversant with all the languages of Europe, but also with those of China, Japan, and Malacca. At a meeting lately held of the most celebrated linguists of Prague, Herr Szerzeal proved, to the satisfaction of his hearers, that he possessed a most intimate knowledge of these languages, especially the Asiatic.

ST. THOMAS'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, CORNER OF BROADWAY AND HUDSON STREET, NEW YORK, NOW BEING DEMOLISHED.

RELICS.

A WILD, wet night! The driving sleet
Blurs all the lamps along the quay;
The windows shake; the busy street
Is yet alive with hurrying feet.
The wind raves from the sea!

So let it rave! My lamp burns bright;
My long day's work is almost done;
I curtain out each sound and sight—
Of all the nights in the year, to-night
I choose to be alone.

Alone, with doors and windows fast,
Before my open desk I stand. . . . .
Alas! can twelve long months be past,
My hidden, hidden wealth, since last
I held thee in my hand?

So there it lies! From year to year
I see the ribbon change; the page
Turn yellower; and the very tear
That blots the writing disappear
And fade away with age!

Mine eyes grow dim when they behold
The precious trifles hoarded there—
A ring of battered Indian gold,
A withered harebell, and a fold
Of sunny chestnut hair.

Not all the riches of the earth,
Not all the treasures of the sea,
Could buy these house-gods from my hearth;
And yet the secret of their worth
Must live and die with me.

THE INNOCENT FOR THE GUILTY.

BY FAITH JARVIS.

I THINK the sun looked wistfully through the open chamber window before he dropped into the sea. The young girl sitting in the amber glow was unaware of the charm around her; and so he loitered but a moment, as if to make sure that he could not help her, before he finished his record for the day.

As for her, she seemed to be looking beyond both sun and sea through that long perspective which once in our lives stretches on and on before us. The whole air was sweet with opening apple-blooms, that delicious, wondrous fragrance which makes the soul of the aged homesick for the days so hoary now—the fairy days when the well-sweep by the garden fence, the barns, the sheds, the low-eaved red house in the orchard, were all transfigured in the glorious light that floods us once only, king and beggar alike.

And while the young girl with blue eyes and brown hair watched a lessening sail upon the distant sea as if her heart had gone upon a long, long journey, the light faded, and the room grew dim, and then dark. Still, with tired hands folded in her lap, she sat motionless; and the mother in the twilight shadows, herself unseen, watched and waited for a breath, a sigh even, to break the spell. Very long she waited, but she had much to accomplish; and silence might do more for her than speech.

No sound disturbed the deep quiet of the house. The summer breezes, which all day long feasted on the sweets of the apple-orchard, had sighed themselves to sleep in pleasant places. There was no footfall in garden or street. A very ghostly silence brooded over the old house, broken at last by a low, clear tone:

"My child!"

The young girl started as from sleep, but made no reply. The lone sail had long since faded from sight, but her eyes still rested vacantly on the spot where it disappeared.

"My child"—again the mother's voice, subdued by a mighty effort, broke the stillness, but waited no longer for a reply—"if you knew the depths of a mother's heart," the voice said, "if you knew what I have suffered, and what I still suffer for you, you could not turn from me now, your truest, best friend. For you are all I have—my very life, Alice."

The clasped hands moved nervously, but in he growing darkness the mother could not read her child's face.

"But I would dig your grave to-night, and lay you in it gladly, if I thought your life must be what mine has been. You have the power to make it what you will, Alice, and I must wait and pray."

It was not a voice to pray—not a heart to endure in silence that spoke now. And the young girl felt in her heart what she had never had courage to think.

"This Yorke, who has just gone from here—will he come again?"

"Mother, I do not know."

"Do you care?"

"I do not."

"His face and form are very noble—as noble as his name. His home is by the sea you love so well—a castle, a palace, everything that is grand and beautiful in memory. I have had my shadowy day-dream, Alice; I have seen my child a very princess among his people, with not one unsatisfied desire; with books, and music, and gems; with rare pictures for a perpetual delight to your art-loving eye; with treasures of every age and nation to make your home a palace of art. The years would touch you very lightly there. There is another picture that forces itself upon me. I cannot turn it to the wall. I see that other one working for bread for a starving wife; a poor, pale, sickly creature, with the light faded from her eyes, the hope dead in her heart. I speak of realities, Alice. God knows how hard it is for me to recall the past. I see the discord that must come to that wretched spot—not home; that name was never meant for such a place. I see famishing children crying for bread and dying for want, and the love that was such a passion in youth, burnt out; only the ashes of regret left, and a wild cry for death."

"Oh! mother, mother!"

It was scarcely a breath, but the mother heard.

"If I could tell you of my own life; but you cannot know. No mortal tongue has power to tell you what my life has been—the happy, innocent days at first, in a lowly, happy home, the one joy, like yourself, of faithful hearts. How brightly the pictured days dawn before me now, when I was free as a bird to come and go, loved and loving, never knowing the shadow of a care. This ancestral home of Yorke's was the one great delight of my childhood. Its doors were always open to me; and when I had wandered through its galleries till their wealth of beauty made even my childish heart sad with longing, I climbed to the high tower, and looked out on the sea, as you look now, only with a grand and ever-changing scene before me. Then the garden and woodland tempted me in the summer time; the garden, with its fountain and flowers; the woodland, with its rippling river, turning here and there, falling in silver cascades, gliding under double arches and fairy bridges, around tiny green islands, bright with flowers, and then spreading, fair and broad, a gem-like lake, before it fell into the sea. Oh, grand and beautiful English home! where I dreamed my first dreams of heaven, likening this green woodland to the earthly Eden where Eve walked in her innocence! Oh, the life that I would save you from, my child! I left my home and the faithful hearts that would have shielded me forever, and crossed the sea that I so often longed to venture on when, a child, I watched the white sails outward bound, and dreamed, as we all dream once. With him, your father, I left my home, and a curse followed me. They are dead now, father and mother, and I never saw them again. I have never spoken of your father, because it is better to leave his name unspoken: there is that connected with his life that I cannot tell you now. I loved him then, as I hate his memory now; and I know he loved me at first. But, as I have told you, I never knew the shadow of a care; here they fell darkly around me—not shadows now, but something heavier. It was not home alone that we both left, but all means of living. Poor fools! We thought our love could be food and shelter for us; but both food and shelter failed. The struggle was pitiful for a time, and then the end came.

"The love that grew in the sunshine was beaten down in the storm and trampled under foot. One night, when you, my darling—you, my innocent, blue-eyed baby, cried for food, he left me to my terrible fate. I wish I could forget the agony of that night, but it follows me wherever I go. Through the long, dark hours I walked the hateful room, soothing the tender burden—my rosy child grown white and wan with hunger, while my tormented heart throbbed as if it would wear my life away. Death would have been very sweet but for you. If I had dared to kill you then! but I could not take you with me; and so I clung to life more for your sake than for fear of the awful hereafter. Well, it is a long story, that I cannot tell you to-night. Only to save you would I have told this, which never passed my lips before. Keep it safe in your heart, child, as I have kept it all these years. I command you, and you will obey."

"Yes, mother. But how did you live?"

"I cannot tell you. I only know that help came, and still comes—doubtless from him. I do not care to know. But if it fail us, what then? In the happy home you might be mistress of it would make no difference. In the other place, the care-worn wife of a man struggling with want, and never able to stand against a jealous, crowding world, my poor help might keep you from starvation."

"Oh, mother, mother! He is gone!"

It was a feeble, despairing cry, but the strong heart of the mother took courage. The moon looked in now through the open window, and glancing past the half-hidden, girlish face, shone full on the firm mouth and fiery eyes of the mother. Triumph was written on every feature, the strong will was asserting itself, and the weaker bowed in a mute, stricken way before it.

Then the low, soft voice spoke in tones of long-suffering, unrewarded love.

"Choose your own course, my child—choose your own course; not for my life would I make you unhappy."

And the gentle heart answered:

"Mother, I have chosen."

* * * * * *

Silence brooded over the house among the apple-trees no more. All day long forms and faces flitted to and fro, and far into the night the hurried preparations for a coming bridal granted little time to silence or sleep. It was over at last, and the sweet, sad face was kissed again and again, as the mother held her child for one brief moment at parting.

"If you would only go with me! but next year you will come; remember the promise."

"My child, do I ever forget?"

And then the gentle, girlish face and form were gone, and a ghostly silence settled down in the places her light feet had haunted. The apple-blooms had fallen, and the August sun touched the fruit with crimson and gold, when Alice went down the path to the gate, and saw the old home for the last time. And in that brief period the child had grown a woman in soul. If the gentle face kept a shade of sadness, there was no gloom there; for in that solemn hour, when the vows were uttered at the altar, she buried the old love, and God helping her, she prayed that she might be, in her inmost soul, a faithful wife to him who so lovingly cherished her.

The calm of summer was on the ocean, and Alice hoped it might prove a joyous omen; and as Philip Yorke stood in the sunset glow, clasping her hand in his own, how reverently did he thank his Maker for the great blessing that was his at last, after so much doubt and fear. And calm was in sweet Alice's heart; the calm of one who has faced terrible danger and conquered. For it was right, she thought, to give her poor life for the mother who had suffered so much for her; and so this simple child-heart vowed that its love should be recalled from that other, and given fully and freely to him who claimed it as his right. I think she felt how hard the task was, but in her little innocent heart it never seemed hopeless.

To her it was simply right, and she never wittingly did wrong in all her life. And God blessed the endeavor, and thus calm came instead of the wild tumult she had known, and after calm, peace.

Day by day she looked downward into the infinite depths of the sea, and upward into the infinite depths of heaven, and gathered courage and strength from the power beneath and the glory above, and trusted that out of all that had been dark in her life, God would bring forth light to His praise.

The voyage was ended at last. Miles and miles away they sped, across a country beautiful as strange; and at evening on the second day they longed for the home they neared. A moment of confusion and haste, and they were in their own carriage, quietly cared for by the old servant who had served three generations of Yorkes. Too weary for speech, Alice slept through the ten miles journey, and only woke when Philip whispered "Home!"

The grand old house was all alight and aglow, as if a queen had come to honor it with her presence. Well could Alice understand the charm that years of suffering could not break, for in some few points the child's nature was akin to the mother's.

How she longed to climb to the tower this very night and look out upon the sea! And in the fullness of her heart she told her husband again, as she had told him before, the stories she had heard from her mother's lips, making each room familiar as a remembered picture. This before the grate in the drawing-room, where the fire-light threw its fitful glare and shade across her face—for the summer evening was chill, and the sea moaned as if a storm approached. A little apart from Philip and his wife sat Philip's father, a stern, sad, white-haired man, with furrows of care or sorrow, perhaps something more, marking his handsome face. And as Alice, her hand in her husband's, recounted these old tales, the fitful fire-light threw its glare across the father's face. There was something fearful in its expression, as with straining sight he leaned forward, drinking in every syllable that fell from the unconscious lips. Then, like one upon whom a terrible blow has fallen swift and sudden, he bowed his head, and slid heavily to the floor.

Day after day he lay alone in his room, unattended save by old Austin, his own faithful serving man. Even Philip was forbidden to see his father, and Alice could only tap softly at the door each morning, and beg to know if he had passed a comfortable night, and sent her love to the sufferer. The house was very gloomy now, because it held a mystery which even Philip could not solve. For he had been for years the one idol of his father's life, and in return had reverenced and loved him as few children love and reverence.

Alice sat in the high tower day after day and longed, oh! how ardently, for the sight of her mother's face, as she looked across the tossing waters, and thought how cruelly they divided them. Ah! the year seemed very long then, with this mystery in the house. True, Philip wandered with her through the woodland and beside the river, but lingered longest at the little chapel where they daily knelt and prayed together. At last he was summoned to his father's room, and Alice watched and waited alone for hours—there was something so fearful in this mystery; and as she waited, she prayed that she might know the worst. So, when at last her husband unlocked the heavy door, she put her hand in his and led him to the tower, where they could be quite alone, away from any sound of life and stir below.

If she had been sad before, she was shocked now at the change in Philip's face, but he could not satisfy her.

"Do not ask me, my darling," he cried. "It is something I would keep from you for ever—something that should never touch you!"

Poor, trembling Alice saw, with a woman's intuition, that it was a life-wound, without hope; and the mystery made it terrible.

So the days grew into weeks, and Philip watched, and Alice prayed, and the light was all gone from earth and heaven.

Then Alice, when she could no longer live in this awful way, left her weeping and praying, resolved on action.

On and on through the long hall and up the winding stairways she glided, a pale shadow of her former self, and trusting in her own integrity, knocked firmly at the long-forbidden door.

In a moment old Austin appeared, and raising a warning finger, would have led her away, but she refused to go.

"I have a right to suffer with my husband," she cried; "and no one shall send me from here." So she put the warning hand aside, and entered. By the bedside sat Philip, his face hidden in his hands; and on the pillow, whose whiteness made the pallid face more ghastly, lay the father, asleep from exhaustion following long delirium. Patiently Alice knelt beside her husband, waiting while he watched. It was not wrong, she was sure, to be here, and so he would not send her away. Perhaps she might bring some comfort or peace to these two, as she had all along prayed she might. Why not? But while she knelt, the sick man moaned in his sleep:

"Oh! Alice, Alice! My punishment is greater than I can bear!"

The words awoke him; and starting, he saw the young girl beside him. Silently he laid his hand on her bright head, as if he would bless her.

"Oh! my father!" she cried, "tell me all! I am Philip's, and being Philip's, I am yours; do not be cruel to your child."

For a moment there was deathly silence in the room, and then the father spoke:

"My poor, innocent lamb, you will have me cruel to you. Would to God I had died before I brought such anguish on my children; but my doom is just. On that awful night when you came here a happy bride, you named a name that I never dreamed my Philip's wife could bear. It was your mother, my poor child, who brought this ruin on us all. Your mother aiding the hidden devil in my nature. My Philip's mother was all purity, and gentleness; and I left her to die of shame for the coward who broke her heart; left her with this baby-boy; but I never knew one moment's peace, till, forced by an avenging conscience to leave your mother and her babe, I made what reparation I could by a life of devotion to this poor motherless child. I cursed your mother when I forsook her—cursed her when I knew that mine was the greater sin. She left father and mother—I left wife, and child, and hope of heaven! God may forgive her, but I am accursed for ever!"

The face of the sick man was terrible in its agony. And Alice? She heard without hearing, praying God that she might never comprehend it all. For we know that, like a lightning-flash showing a whole summer's landscape set in the blackness of darkness, she saw the whole of that mother's guilt, even to the last fearful act, when, to shield her child, she bound her to this wretched fate. So, still praying God that she might not hear, might not know, might not understand, she kissed the white hand on the counterpane and passed swiftly out. Down the stairs she went, heavily now, but swiftly, on and on through the long halls, and out at the door; but before she reached the avenue, a heavy hand fell on her shoulder, and turning, she stood face to face with Philip.

There was no uttered word; but, gathering her to his heart in one long embrace, he turned her face homeward, and disappeared among the trees. Too well did Alice know his meaning. For herself, she longed to go anywhere—anywhere from this place; but he—what could she henceforth call him!—he would have her stay while he himself became an outcast from his home; and his wish was law, though her heart must break.

A year went by. Death had been in the grand old house, and a burial in the woodland, and the beauty was marred for ever. And one wild night, when the sea moaned like a human thing, and the storm drove madly in upon the coast, a ship far out of her course went down in sight of land; and one poor body, drawn thither even in death, floated homeward with the rank seaweed, in sight of the watcher in the tower.

Thus came the mother to see the child whose life she would shield from the shadow of a care! And ever after, in the watcher's ears, the sea moaned this solemn prophecy—

"Visiting the iniquity of the father upon the children."

The lady in the grand Yorke house lived many a year to comfort the sick, to cheer the broken-hearted, to lead the wandering to God. And when the angels came for her, the little chapel was draped in purest white, and there was no solemn burial service for the dead, but glad songs and triumphant psalms of praise for her who was ascended, to know death no more.

Then Philip Yorke came to his home again. The simple country-folk passed him by with awe, and said it was his ghost haunting the old place; but it was only because of the uplifted look of one who communes with angels.

AUTO DE FE IN ROME.—The ceremony of burning condemned books and newspapers is kept up with as much form in Rome as the roasting of heretics used to be in the palmy days of the Inquisition. On a late ceremonial of the kind, the Pope did not preach the expected sermon, pleading as excuse his advanced age and the danger of exhausting himself before he officiated in the ceremonies of the Holy Week. But vehement sermons were preached by the missionaries, and their fiery words were emphasized by real flames blazing before a dozen churches, into which they cast the books proscribed by the "Index." The great auto de fe was in Piazza San Carlo in the Corso, and attracted an immense crowd. The folding-doors of the church were thrown open after the sermon and afforded egress to the priest, followed by stalwart men bending under the weight of baskets, crammed with books and journals, which they heaped up at the base of the church steps. The condemned journals included the Opinione, the Nazione, the Siècle, the Presse, the Constitutionnel, and other well-known organs. These were blended with more than 400 volumes, and a profusion of pamphlets, old and new, of all degrees of talent, "The Pope and the Congress," being placed by the side of Voltaire, and exciting the mirth of the profane. When all was arranged, the priest signaled a sacristan in a surplice, who, advancing with a lighted torch, set fire to the heap. Up sprang the flames, and the smoke filled the Corso. Pontifical gens-d'armes were present, to prevent any one snatching a brand from the burning, and the fire was encircled by a legion of devout men, smiting their breasts, and crying, "Miserere." Around stood a gaping crowd, largely composed of foreigners, whose looks betokened mingled disgust and amazement. At the fires in other quarters of Rome women threw into the flames their amorous correspondence, tresses of hair, ribbons, bouquets and photographs. The spectacle was one without parallel, and I was astonished that even the Pontifical Government could sanction such excess, and authorize the burning of a whole library in the most public place of Rome, with accompaniments borrowed from the darkest of the middle ages.

TAKING GEOMETRIC PLANS BY PHOTOGRAPHY.—It is announced in Paris that M. Chevalier, the optician, has succeeded in arranging an apparatus for taking geometric plans by photography. According to the Journal of the Society of Arts the instrument is provided with a meridional telescope and a compass, in order to set it to any given point. A circular collodionized glass is placed at the bottom of a camera-obscura formed of copper, and moved by clockwork, so as to describe within a given time the outer circle, of which the station chosen is the centre, and the various objects as they are received in turn by the lens are photographed on the circular plate through an exceedingly narrow slit in the side of the copper box. The operation is repeated at their stations, in order to avoid error, and the result is said to be highly satisfactory. The thin circular plates are used to lay down on paper all the points of the plan described.

THE PORTRAIT.

BY R. C. SPENCER.

"The poem, you remember,
That his lady's eyes are praised in as the sweetest ever seen."—E. B. Browning.

You may take her features rigidly,
Shade her tresses, tint the skin,
Make the dark eyes glisten brightly,
Yet you lose the light within!

Lose the young, bewitching sweetness,
Miss the girlish air of trust—
Art will live when copied neatness
Long has crumbled into dust.

You should catch her when the modest
Eyes a moment chose to rove
To their neighbor's—to the oddest
Look of hesitating love—

For they have a certain melting
Candor, sweetness, all their own;
E'en the chapel that we knelt in
Darker grew when they were gone!

You, who calm truth, ever shining
Mong'st her actions, and in her eyes—
As the lovely silver lining
Keste majestic in the skies—

Settles where the dark glance, peeping,
Looks for stillest shade,
As a sword, in scabbard sleeping,
Hides the brightness of its blade.

I have gazed upon such features,
Clear their surface as the sea;
But the soul—no, can reach us—
It has sweetly spoke to me!

Would you take her truly? Well, then,
Whisper gentle memories:
You must watch ere eyes have fell—then
Take her as the glances rise!

The Trapper's Adventure.

BY HARRY E. REMICK.

IT was upon the close of a clear March evening, just such as this, fifty-five years ago, that the following scene of remarkable adventure befell me, and one of many which tinge with excitement the otherwise monotonous life of a hunter. My camp, as was usual during eight resemblance to the modern contrivance of the day so much in vogue with amateur sportsmen, was composed simply of a few pliant stakes, driven hastily but securely into the ground, in the form of an ellipsis. This, with plenty of boughs heaped closely up and against the frame, blankets and other paraphernalia of trapper-life, constituted my camp.

But the beauty of situation usually selected amply compensated for the lack of the picturesque so necessarily attendant upon a habitation so constructed. At the time I mention, I had established myself and camp upon one of the many tributaries which run open from the Kennebec, in the then almost unknown wilds which encompassed nearly its entire course. Sometimes, and, stretching for the unknown distances, was the dense, heavily wooded landscape, until it seemed blending in nature's curious scheme, the above, extending above me a few yards, terminated abruptly into a bold rocky eminence, interspersed with lofty pines, rearing their grand branches over the smooth expanse of waters, which, gleaming in the misty moon's light, reflected, in a thousand fantastic forms, their many shadows.

Gazing from my camp, I beheld the glorious Kennebec receding for miles away, like a vista of the sheeny silver in the far distance, ever and anon disappearing behind the luxuriant foliage, only to appear again in splendor as it burst from its variety concealment. Upon a calm evening I could plainly distinguish, above the murmur of the pines, the low, pendulant thunder of some distant cataract. I had many times determined to investigate the nature of the falls, but as often had I been turned from my purpose. My camp was always, heretofore, been westward from the point in question; but now I was situated in proximity, and it was the conviction of duty to me that I should visit them within the allotted interval of my stay in their vicinity.

In my hunting excursions to and from my camp, and which sometimes extended for miles along the banks of the river, I had for convenience a rude canoe, which I had constructed from the butt of a huge monarch of the forest, felled within a stone's throw of my habitations. This was but a primitive affair, but it served me equally well for two purposes: when out for days, roaming the wilderness in search, I had but to draw the canoe from its element, on the approach of evening, and, by simply inverting it, served the place of a camp, and effectually excluded all nocturnal marauders.

I had been off upon one of the above "excursions," and had been absent away for several consecutive weeks, the season being favorable for my game. I was now upon my return, and distant from camp but a few days' drift, when, being unusually fatigued with my arduous day's hunting for my canoe, I made evident use of my skill and perseverance in that line, being heavily laden—I concluded to land, and, after reloading my immediate purpose. Having finished my task, I turned, with the intention of securing my blankets and gun. I had traversed perhaps half the distance, when I was startled by the appearance of a second canoe (as I then supposed) rounding the bend. It being now dusk, I could not readily distinguish objects, but, upon approaching the spot, where an hour before I had landed, what was my horror and dismay on finding my canoe had disappeared! The truth flashed upon me with startling effect. I had landed below the mound of bend to evade the current, which was here quite rapid, not caring to stem it in my exhausted state—for I well knew that with the rising sun the stream would abate in violence—until fully refreshed. I could easily overcome its remaining power. So completely engrossed was I with fatigue, that I had neglected to securely confine the canoe. This, then, was the inevitable consequence.

The rise of tide, combined with the reaction of the current from the point, had, by degrees, drawn my craft so far from the shore, that, feeling its influence, she had rounded the bend, and was now gliding rapidly away in the approaching darkness. How I cursed my folly I shall never forget, nor the consequences entailed upon me by it.

Long did I endeavor to devise means or method by which I could remedy the fault—a fault which in the whole course of my trapper existence I had never before committed. I was in a dilemma, that was palpable, for my canoe contained all my effects, and I had not the wherewithal to construct its successor, or even what was necessary to procure sustenance for my life. True, I was separated from my destination but a short journey over the smooth, rapidly gliding surface of the river. But I could not estimate the distance which would inevitably occur, should I travel overland, without food or shelter, through trackless wilds, and often interrupted by streams which would tend to divert me from my course. It was plainly impracticable. Thus I had no other resource left, at present, than distance other than by water.

With these and I lament my stupidity in allowing my physical wants to overreach all other faculties. Through the remainder of the night I slept but little, the repose I had enjoyed served to refresh me for my labors of the coming day. I was forced to forego from mental anxiety. My situation was peculiar—a lonely one, indeed, with no method of propelling. Then, too, the river was increasing in violence from late freshets, and I should have to trust to the current, which was very rapid.

With the above considerations in mind, I was early astir. The view now set in. With this conclusion I selected some logs, and after placing others of smaller dimensions transversely upon them, to prevent their separation, I bound the whole firmly together with withes, and, having hastily fitted up to displace their burden, with all in readiness and a heavy heart, I committed myself to the waters and the guidance of my frail craft.

With serious misgivings my voyage had commenced. The current, though rapid, was not overfurnished with the remaining power to overcome the velocity of the stream—and on the following morning I found myself in the midst of the full strength. As yet I had suffered little with hunger, the excitement of my situation serving to keep fully exercised my mind, and to prevent any sensation. While drifting, I had been drawn imperceptibly in approximation to the opposite bank of the river. This was my opportunity, as I knew that to pass it was fatal to me. At dusk I again effected a landing, and passed the night as I had the preceding. My anxiety for the following morning's drift no longer induced me to start before the break of morning, and when the rosy god of day again gilded the tops of the mountains, I was upon the full tide of my burnished gold, they beheld me far distant from the place, and many places, similar to that on my way. Indeed it had alarmed me as I felt myself borne irresistibly along with the strong tide, that I should never be able to effect a landing upon the shore. It was now but a few hours before I should be in its vicinity, and unless some friendly object should present itself to my view, I should be across the channel, which here began to narrow, my chances were frail.

It was now but a few hours before I should be in its vicinity, and unless some friendly object should present itself to my view, I should be across the channel, which here began to narrow, my chances were frail.

If I should unfortunately take this stream, and it assumed considerable, I should be carried out to sea; coupled with this circumstance, this branch of the river was totally unknown to me, as always my course had been directly westward, and parallel to course, never diverging. In vain did I struggle to direct the course of my frail support; it soon became apparent that all exertion in that particular was unavailing, and only tended to exhaust my little remaining strength. I was in my increasing discomfort, the pangs of hunger which began to assail me were excruciating, and I suffered the direst misery imaginable. I had now reached the perception that I was drifting more speedily than at any time before, and made renewed efforts to fully propel myself to the shore—but with the conviction forced itself upon me that I should be at the mercy or fury of the waters for the night. I began to converge, with precipitant cliffs upon either shore, sometimes far overhanging their base, which, together with the rapidity of the stream, a heavy growth of stunted oakwood. Occasionally a huge pine would rear its branches over the seething waters, in some places nearly blocking its surface: here, too, the frantic waves, lashing against their cragged rocky limits, were thrown back in crystaline spray, only to rush with increased fury to the assault.

Borne rapidly onward, every passing moment I was encompassed with renewed dangers, which threatened the utter demolition of my frail raft, and in the case of this event, certain destruction. How fervently I prayed for the first ray of sunshine which should herald the coming morn, and mayhaps the harbinger of delivery. Alas! with the rising sun my hopes fell, which had been in the ascendant, were hurled at once into darkness and despair, for above all surrounding chaos I could plainly distinguish the terrible thunder of the "cataract" toward which I was hastening, borne along with a lightning rapidity which no human agency could prevent.

Oh, God! the agony of the moment! I was first made aware of the awful calamity which awaited inevitably the approach. I perceive my course, and then the sudden spasm which enveloped me like a funeral pall, as I drank in the appalling truth. I could see no hope—I now futile any attempt on my part would be to extricate myself from the fearful, appalling fate of being dashed over the rocks or impaled upon their serrated points.

The solemn roar of the waters augmented, and soon their lashing surfaces would expend themselves before my distracted gaze, while I helpless, could only place my reliance in Him, and shudderingly await my fate. It seemed in the few moments of agonized suspense, when almost within the grasp of the relentless, raging vortex, that every portion of my past life, however minute, from childhood to the present, passed with vivid, startling distinctness before my vision, immediately succeeded by a dull stupor. I was quickly aroused from the feeling, which was engendered by my critical situation, combined with the rapid motion of the waters, by the loosed timber and hither by the action of the turbulent waters in their maddening gyre, and it required the most unbounded exertion to prevent myself from being precipitated into the seething element. Repeatedly did I cry out, and vainly, forcetting in the terrible anguish of the moment, was drowned in the surrounding elements, or that I was past human assistance. Again I would I hope. But a few moments—ages they seemed to me—would intervene before I should be hurled into eternity over the black water-rive-rocks whose edges it seemed to me were even now dashed with the crimson current of life which was surging in my veins.

At this moment, when the whole soul was engrossed with the fearful death before me, I was conscious of a sudden change in my raft, it being caught as it were by a steady current of wind, no time with a rough, jarring sensation—a bound—and it was again on its way.

I glanced back, but it is impossible for me to depict the feeling of despair, utter despair, which enthralled me. I had passed directly over the whirlpool, and the frail craft had been torn from its resting-place, the lowermost branches of which had been submerged, and might have aforded an opportunity for escape. I had decided had served to divert my attention from the fate before me, and I now beheld with feelings of intense joy that my course, which was directly, would bring me directly beneath one of the larger limbs. Instantly I seemed to be endowed with new life; my latent energy was fully aroused by this new source of delivery, and I determined to make one last strong effort for life. Ere the time required reached, I had gained the point in question, —one moment, and I was directly under, and passing speedily beyond.

With a last prayer upon my livid lips, I leaped, and grasped wildly, but desperately, the bough as it came within my reach. Involuntarily I closed my eyes to the fearful alternative which would await me should I fail in the attempt; but I was successful, and, with feelings of partial security, I glanced around at my perilous situation. My garments were completely saturated, and, with the exception of my additional weight, were slowly sinking to a level with the boiling rapids. The moment they should feel its influence, I was inevitably lost! Had I been snatched from the jaws of death, to acquire fresh love of life, only to be clasped again in his cold embrace? Such was death within itself, and with hardly power of motion, I began to work my way slowly shoreward.

I have not a distinct recollection of hearing voices above—a realization of human aid in my dire extremity—when a stupor, induced by the re-action of fearful excitement from death, made me insensible, and I was again precipitated into the stream. From this period until weeks after, I was approached only at death's appearance. When I awoke to know life, I found myself surrounded by kindly faces and willing hands.

In a few weeks I was enabled to visit the place of my delivery, having become thoroughly convalescent, and there beheld, with emotions of awe, the Herculean vortex from which I so narrowly escaped. After losing my hold upon the tree, in my downward descent my garments had been caught upon a limb, and relieving me from the opportune arrival of one of the number above, who were camping in the vicinity. But I never could ascertain the mode of repugnance which would ever after occur when near the locality.

PERILS OF THE FERRY CROSSINGS.

WHEN NEW YORK was in its infancy, a mere handful of inhabitants, on the present grants, the good Knickerbockers, when we are proud to claim as our forefathers, were accustomed to vote their wills and settle all their business concerns before making a trip to Albany, or a visit to Philadelphia, lest they might not return in time for the next meeting, or their affairs in confusion. We smile at this over-caution, but it was probably the best precaution to prevent disappointment, and is practiced by many persons even in our day. We are exposed to more danger, and meet with more narrow escapes in crossing the river at almost any of our ferries than ever disturbed the dreams even of our doughty ancestors. The scene depicted on the front page may be witnessed almost any morning, while, with a few variations, it is a constant picture of the rush and confusion, and apparently inextricable dead-lock that reigns along the Hudson River side of the metropolis. Suppose you wish to enter or leave the city by way of the Jersey ferries, a hundred or even a thousand other people are striving to perform the same feat simultaneously with yourself. The crossing drover has a herd of cattle he is hurrying to the shambles; the street cars are anxious to make time by the shortest route of days and other vehicles claim their portion of the common highway, while carts and carts, and cattle, and teams, urged on by reckless and impatient drivers, are all striving to disprove the old axiom, that "two bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time," you will be a lucky night if you extricate yourself from this maelstrom without a broken head or a dismembered costume. Perhaps a kind-hearted policeman will intervene and lay hands and taxi aside for a moment the living threatening mass, but before checking this more imperious brute, and calling forth the anathemas of the driver, he can do little. Meantime the cattle, dazed and infuriated by the screams and shouts and oath, and wild with fright, rush about in all directions. A sensible man would rather be run over by a locomotive than attempt to pass these barriers, for in that case he would stand a chance of being killed decently, while here he gets no credit for his risks. Sometimes the unrecorded heroes of the day should be ranked the multitudes who are compelled daily to cross the New York ferries.

THE BI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT NEWARK, N. J.

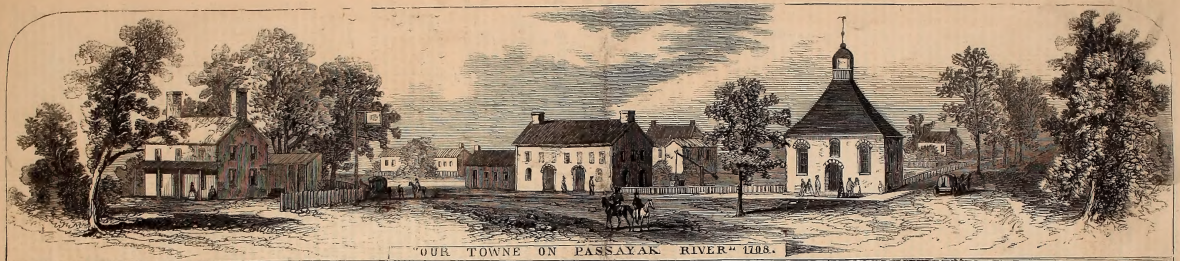
THE bi-centennial anniversary of the settlement of the city of Newark, N. J., was celebrated on the 19th of May, with much public enthusiasm, by the inhabitants of that now important city. The preparations made by the committee of arrangements were completed, and the festival arrangements were of a comprehensive character, and did honor to their liberality.

The city was founded in the year 1666, Capt. Robert Treat, at the head of some 30 families from Milford and New Haven, Conn., settled on the west bank of the Passaic river. In the following year the little colony was incorporated as a town, and became a part of the government of Connecticut, under the guidance of Rev. Abraham Pierson. This clergyman, having in early life preached in the town of Newark, in England, and being a scholarly, pleasant memories of that time, used the influence of his position to induce the colonists to name their new home after that of his early youth. Philip Carteret was their Proprietary Governor; from him a license was obtained to purchase land in quantity from the Indians. Treaties with this object were entered into with the aborigines, and the new town was soon extensively covered by Newark, Clinton, Orange, Bloomfield and Belleville, for 4,110 (New England money), 12 Indian blankets and 12 coats. The town was also provided over 100,000 souls, a population which gives evidences of prosperity and many remarkable in point of character and all-important to the general comfort and well-being.

An historical memoir of considerable interest was read by the Secretary of the Historical Society, in the evening, by Mr. William E. Whitehead, and a poem by Mr. Halsey Wood. An oration was delivered by Mr. William B. Kenny.

RECEPTION OF THE GREAT IRISH ORGANIZER, JAS. STEPHENS,

By the Fenian Brotherhood, at Jones's Wood, May 15, 1866.



THERE heroes have come from beyond the sea, and show themselves to the audience of the New World—the Americans. Now, we have seen that the greater diversity he imagined than between the deeds by which each man won his fame, or than between the characters of the people by whom each is honored? Space into a word to expand upon so inviting a theme: and rhetoric might exhaust itself in full delineation of the contrasts of their careers. Yet, as chroniclers of the times, we must show the arrival, at least, of two of such other, of these personages, so well known: to fame, and so remarkable for the qualities which they possess. As, however, only one has received a public ovation, we confine ourselves to the great demonstration made by the Fenian Brotherhood to the Irish Organizer, which address Mr. Stephens. The gathering was held in Jones's Wood, on Tuesday, the 15th, and was attended by about 10,000 persons—a small concourse compared to the number of Feinians—but their ardor was damped by the heavy rain which fell under the order of the card qualification, which is equivalent to ten drinks. Mr. Stephens was received with cheers, and in a few days a very stirring speech. As Demosthenes defined the three requisites for oratory to be action, action, action, so Stephens defines the three corner-stones of the Irish question to be Organization, organization, organization. A compliment to Mr. Chase's famous invention the Irish people may grow fond of copying.

CURSES TURNED INTO SPERMACETI.—Mr. ATKIN, the Recorder of Ashtabula, Ohio, states that a remarkable fact in natural history was discovered by the cemetery of Hartgrove Centre. On opening a number of graves the bodies were found to be in a soapy, pasty form, but changed in substance to a material in appearance and texture like the finest and purest quality of spermaceti. Mr. Winslow, who was present at the time, says most of the bodies were those of persons who had died of consumption. Some of the graves were only in part. The bodies of old and decrepit persons were found either in the natural state of decay, or mixed with the body, to the substance. Many very interesting facts of this kind have been discovered, to which we hope to obtain. It may be well here to remark that the fact of the change of the substance of the bodies of men and animals to this material, known as spermaceti, has long been known to science, and in the century ago, in some of the cemeteries of Paris, where the bodies were buried in the ordinary manner, after many thousands, the entire mass was found converted to spermaceti. Many recorded discoveries of this kind have been frequently made since, always with water in the soil. The above was told us by Mr. Winslow himself. It may be counted upon with some certainty that this will be the case with all cemeteries where graves fill with fresh water, and remain filled, especially if the ground be of a clayey nature.

THE MOON'S SEAS.—The seas are the only part of the moon which can be seen by the naked eye, and that from very partially. The telescope those come into sight a much more remarkable view of its surface, and amidst the fine objects which unveil the eye are the remarkable mountainous formations. Their similarity to the great volcanoes of the seas, extinct or otherwise, has often been remarked. The maps of the environs of Naples, of Vesuvius, of the volcanoes Auvergne and Teneriffe, present the same features, and those who have studied them will recognize with the vast surface of the lunar volcanoes, and could almost imagine the presence of sacred fire, and the whole of these known on the earth might be placed within one of the lunar mountains.

SWALLOW SONG.

I.

Welcome, wanderer to the valley!
Welcome to my garden's bound!
Gayly sweep adown each alley,
Gayly flit the walks around!
All things brighten as thy wing
Lends its final charm to Spring;
Brooks flow clearer, kinects sing,
May's glad bird has come!

II.

Leavest thou far-stretching sandstrips
Where the Gulf reigns, lord of all?
Or art thou, from fertile landscapes,
Isles of palm and coccas tall?
Little care I, so thou be
Summer guest of mine and me,
Twittering from my old roof-tree,
Cheering, blessing home!

III.

Yester morn the marties glistened
Sun-flecked during dawn in shine;
Yester eve at dusk I listened,
Sudden heard thy gentle scream:
Heard, and fixed a rush: "twas gone!
Then I spake in happy tone,
"Welcome, Spring, now Winter's flown!
Spring comes with the Swallow!"

IV.

Years ago thy first dash fluttered
Two beside their trysting tree;
Thou might'st hear the words one uttered,
Loving words that gladdened me.
So I took thee for a sign,
Bird of Hope, that long sunshine,
Wedded peace, bliss hair divine,
Should our union hallow.

V.

Welcome for thy mad careering
Round the spire when we were wed,
Welcome for thy gay flights, veering
Hither, thither, arrow-speed!
Most I love thee though for days,
Long since dead, when old-world lays Sang we, children, to thy praise,
"Welcome, birdie, dear!"

VI.

Spring by Spring I'll gladly proffer
Welcome to thy dancing flight!
Here no human hands shall offer
To thy "pendent bed" despite!
Softer breathes the air with thee;
Trust, sweet bird, thy life to me,
Trust thy callow cares, and be Doubly dear next year!

CHAPTER VIII.—RIDDLE CAVE.

THE hills about Craven, if they are not mountains in the eyes of members of the Alpine Club, are believed to be such by the inhabitants of the district, who (one would think) ought to know. At all events, they are very high hills indeed for poor England, which has of late years been accustomed to be a flat country. The boastful local proverb—

Pendgrast, Pendle, and Ingleborough,
Are the highest hills the country thorough—is not, indeed, quite correct. Mr. Hurtler's "Craven," the study of Ingleborough, as measured by "a famous pedestrian"—we should imagine Mr. Walker—is given at five thousand two hundred and forty feet, or about two thousand feet higher than Helvellyn; but this is a slight exaggeration. Unless country magnates have given place to the Lord Lieutenant, the Craven Hills are limited by the neighborhood of their High Mightinesses the Lords of Lakeland, by many of which they are overtopped. Still, as I have said, they are very lofty, and command a great range of view. From the crest of Riddle, for instance, three was (and is) a splendid view. To westward lay the unchanged sea, flecked by many a sail as now, although the smack-genius flew from steamship; while over the perilous sand-road athwart Morecambe Bay you might see, when the tide was low, processions of people, bent on going back and in wheeled conveyances, where now there are but a very few.

How picturesque those little caravans must have looked as they crossed the waste of sand, which in a few hours the swirling sea would devour, alive and swift; how lovely that level view, from which every trace of man's travel was swept away every day! Then the crescent bay, broken at the shore, with the boats lying high and dry in them; the belts of woodland descending to the very water's edge; and Kent and Leven swarming with the rich green hills in many a shining curve! The top of Riddle was also a sight in itself, having a shaven crown, where a Druidical circle once had stood—a very priest of hills; and yet were none of those glories to be compared with the wondrous wealth which lay within him. I do not speak of the gold and silver coins—centuries old—which in flood-time one of his streams would cast out (as it does with the same far-hidden treasury, that of the glittering palace, built, doubtless, for the king of the fairies, but which had lapsed for many a year into mortal hands, and was termed by them Bibble Cave.

Surely, of all discoveries which have power to charm the human soul, that of a stalactite cavern must be the chiefest. To be the first to descry a new continent, or even an island unnoticed in any chart, must be a striking sensation; the watcher of the skies, too, when a new planet "swims into his ken," must enjoy a great experience; but neither of these sensations seems so overwhelming as that which I have in my mind. For suppose—and I am only supposing what has happened—that I have lived within the shadow of a great hill all my life, which the learned inform me is of time-honored, and that my forefathers for many generations have lived by the same hill without further information about it, if so much; and suppose there is a cavern in this hill, of no very interesting character, described by the authorities to be mainly "calcareous secretion," which has been used by myself and my forefathers as a stabling for cattle in bad weather—well, during an autumn thunder-storm, I take shelter in this spot since, and with it, which happens to be there, I amuse or warm myself by picking into the hill. What follows? Why, a mighty stream of water, from which I escape with difficulty, and which takes a quarter of an hour to rush away, and renders the neighboring stream too big for its banks. Never since the Rock of Horeb was there surely such a miracle.

Awe-stricken, and yet delighted, I approach the aperture, which is now a yawning gap, and behold—a gloom profound, a depth of darkness, I do not know how deep, but at all events space where heretofore had been thought to be solidity. Columbus, it is true, discovered solidity where there was thought to be space, but the wonder is no less because the conditions happen to be reversed. Thus far, then, Columbus and I are equal, but from this point he ought hold a candle to me. If he could, and brought it to my newly discovered cavern, what a treasure-house of fairyland would he reveal! Its roof, its pillars and stalagmite," observes the geologist, pompously. Preposterous fool! what thy dull science teaches these is but the dust of the mine.

For how many thousand years have these columns of crystal, these sparkling and pendulous transparencies, full of hidden music, had their glorious being? For whom were these stately halls devised in darkness, and for whom furnished with such unutterly gaudy show? Surely fairies or spirits have threaded these winding passages, carpeted with silver sand, upon which no mortal foot since man was made has trodden save mine own? Whence springs, and whither leads this sunless stream, whose murmur, pregnant with mystery almost divine, has never fallen upon human ear before? Why should these wonders have been locked so fast, that no grateful tongue—at least of man—has ever given to God the glory of them? And was it chance that laid the secret bare at last, through me; and but for me, for thousands of years to come, would still these unimaginable splendors have been veiled from human eyes and hills full more than the hills other hills? Somewhat after this fashion, surely, might say man speak who has made a discovery such as that which we are considering.

Now, this very thing had happened in Bibble Fell, and not so very many years before the period of which we write, as to rob it of romance. But people in those days—as we have had occasion to observe before—were not so enamored of natural wonders, and listened to what superficially to say secret she might have to tell them. The glories of earth, and sea, and sky, were for the most part but upon them; with such conventional veneration and superstition, they were terribly at ease in the true Zion, and regarded all natural phenomena with the eye of familiarity. Two or three hundred folks had visited Bibble Cave upon its first discovery; but by this time visitors had become few.

A professed guide to underground Ribble did indeed reside in the hamlet of Cliffe; but if he had not followed some other calling in addition, he would have made but an indifferent livelihood. Not above a dozen times that summer had he been in requisition to conduct parties to the torch upon their way to the cave. The entrance to it was just beyond the farm-house, where the visitor was summoned; a wild and desolate spot, where a stream ran down a deep and woodless ravine, which terminated in a sort of natural amphitheatre palace, and on the other a still loftier hill, whose "pastures," separated by natural walls of limestone, presented the appearance of a gigantic fortification.

Here, at the hour appointed, Mildred and Raymond met the lad of the place, and visited the cave in company with members of the family, while he was familiar with every part of it, with every curiosity in the shape of rock and formations—if such they can be called—were far more extensive than those chambers, lofty and fantastic though at their widest, which visitors could explore. The stream which accompanied their steps wherever they went had its exit at the other extremity of the hill, and there it did not flow; and there he heard, by laying the ear to the ground, flowing in places where it was known that the frequenters of the subterranean hall did not go. Before the pickax had let the light into Ribble, such sounds had, of course, been unheard; but now that he was known, now lost all the credit of them. From the main passage there forked short bays, right and left, which ended in caverns of less absurdity in some hall or grotto, so provided, that if you kept your torch alight, there was little danger of losing your way. The visitor who wished to penetrate to the extremity had only to follow the windings of the stream, between which and the shining wall of rock there was room for him, and he could not fail to reach his goal—a splendid chamber, domed with glittering spars, in one dark corner of which, from a hole, the stream sped away under a low-browed arch, beyond which no man, save one, had ever followed it. Raymond Clifford alone had ventured once, with a lighted candle fastened to his forehead, to trust himself to the mysterious stream. Deep and dark it ran for a short distance, with only a few inches between the rock and it, and then emerged into a still more splendid and beautiful—as the adventurer declared—than any it had yet visited. From hence, as it seemed to him, the stream dipped suddenly, forming a sort of cataract in a tunnel, down which, if a man should go, it was certain he would never return. It was fast enough to have visited Finis Hall, as Raymond had entitled it, and that experiment had never been repeated.

Familiar, however, as both he and Mildred were with the subterranean wonders of Bibble, they could not repress exclamations of delight as each, with torch in hand—the materials for exploration being always in the hall for the external cave of cattle-stable—came suddenly upon some crystal wonder, which flashed into being at their sight as by wizard's touch. By tacit consent to have postponed the talk, which they had come thither to hold without interruption, until they had reached the cave, but, as the domed chamber was not inaptly termed; moreover, sustained conversation was rendered difficult by the nature of the place. The echoes there were so narrow that it necessitated their walking one behind the other, and sometimes was so low that they had to creep with their hands bent. It was from a sort of tunnel of this kind that they emerged at last, after a quarter of a mile of fairyland, into a stately hall, that was fitted for the suit of royal apartments which (I fear without King Oberon's permission) had been thrown open to the public. The two torches were not sufficient to evoke the splendors of the lofty roof: properly illuminated from below, as it should be by a magnificent mass of candelabra, but now it only twinkled here and there, like stars out of the darkness. It enlarged the effect of the huge rent made some two pillars for its support, and the fairy architect, as if in anticipation of such an idea, had mocked the idea of human assistance by making it, as second at first, by violence in the centre, but which had in truth never been joined; the one-half rising from the silver floor, the other pendant from the crystal ceiling. From the ceiling, too, hung mighty icicles, like the pipes of an organ, which, being struck, would have produced melancholy music, that went wailing through chamber after chamber, although in sorrow for their departed tenants. Here and there the stalagmites took forms very similar to the human, though generally with the head or arms missing, like torsos in a sculptor's gallery; but there was in the centre of the place there was a natural statue—for it really might be called so, so perfect were its proportions—of a woman with a child in her arms, a very Lot to look at (of crystal, not of salt), and the child of fretted gold.

"That is certainly very like," observed Mildred with a shudder, as they came upon this wonder of the hall, there really any truth in the story which it is said to tell?"

"A woman and her child were lost here; that was all I ever heard," answered the lad, as he turned Raymond. "How they got here, without light or guide (if they did go), is strange enough, but having once got here, it is no wonder that they were lost here. Although I could find my way hence, blindfold, to the outer air, almost as readily as though I were in such a torch, yet one unaccustomed to the place might easily fail to do so. The very narrowness of the way, and the constant repetition of the same rock, might ought reality to insure escape, would confuse the wits of a poor terrified creature, with a little one in her arms, too."

"Then Guy, you think, was not to blame?"

"I do not know, Mildred. He had enough to answer for in his life, and this tale about him be true—without this double murder. At all events, as the bodies were found and buried, it is impossible that he could have told any that this is the petrifaction of them, even if it were a petrifaction at all, as it manifestly is not."

"It was an unpardonable crime, however, that is said to have brought the curse upon the Cliffords. is it not so?"

"My dearest Mildred, why be so solicitous about those It is saids?"

"Why, I really have a reason for my question, Raymond."

"Well, then, it is true that from the period of the discovery of Bibble Cave, five generations back—for we are but a short-lived amily—the eldest son of our race has never inherited Cliffe Place, in a word, been made Mad. But we came here to talk of a worse thing than madness, Mildred—of the wicked conduct of one that is in her right mind, such as it is."

"I fear so, Raymond. Nay, since I saw you, I—I cannot help it—I have been haunted by him."

"Nay, impossible," exclaimed the young man, vehemently. "A more noble heart than Rupert's never beat in human breast, simple, guileless"—

"And therefore," interrupted Mildred, earnestly, "one only too easily made prey of. Rupert and he have been together between them, ever now—of that I am certain. She will send brother against brother, if she have not done so."

"Never will, Mildred. Let her hoodwink him ever so much, one word from his old playmate, his friend, his brother, and he will be as he has only me to lean on; he comes to me as the very physician of his being; while I live, he shall have his faithful friend, his love for foe, and even if not so required, faithful still."

"I kind, generous Raymond, I am sure of that! Yet, how should you two be linked together but that a false tongue can cut them asunder?"

"Cure, Mildred, cure," he whispered, pressing his lips to her hand, as always now, and now again, with loving gratitude.

"You make me happy, credulously happy, Raymond, but I am not sure. Nothing, indeed, can come between such love as ours; the very hint would make a foe of him that spoke it. But friendship, however close, and though cemented by one blood, is not so firm—even a tale-bearer, a mere malicious fool can loosen it; while little by little the serpent tongue can always sap it with its poisoned lies. A while ago, did not your father love you? Did it then seem possible that a day would come when you would welcome a summons to his private chamber merely to take the evening meal with him with a great leap of joy, as a rare favor, as you did this very morning? And if a father's heart can be so estranged, why not a brother's?"

"Its justly argued, Mildred," answered the young man, coldly; "and what you say is dear to me, being the logic of love; but your sweet solicitude for me makes you blind as Cupid himself. My father is an old man—alas! that I should have to say it—disturbed, by a younger wife. But what hold can Mrs. Clifford have on Rupert, that he should believe her, speaking lies against his own brother?"

"She may make him jealous, Raymond."

"Jealous!" echoed the young man, turning pale as the marble of Cliffe, of whom such terrible things are told, at whose name your father's melancholy deepens and your brother shudders, has only a too real existence."

"What! my Mildred superstitious? This is sad indeed."

"Nay, I do not speak of spirits, Raymond. This 'Fair Lady' is Aunt Grace herself, and bodes more harm to you and yours than ever did Ward or banshee."

"What mean you, Mildred?"

"I mean what my words I say. Mrs. Clifford is trading on the foolish superstitions of your house. She has tricked your father—Heaven grant it may not be so fatally!—and she may be tricking Rupert—not only by fostering within him the credulity that is his base, but by masquerading, acting the very part of her whom he stands in fear of. She appears to him as that very spectre; ay, indeed she does. When she heard from her own people—and of my visit to Bibble Cave that—for I was greatly worse, and like to die, she played the ghost to her own husband. I suspected this before; but until I saw her in the character, could not feel assured in the Blue Chamber, I could not be quite sure."

"And how should that make you sure, Mildred?"

"Because that room is the fittest of all for such a trick. Your father is so ready to believe the thing, and the appearance of the only person who could, or would, so credibly deceive him, that any place or time would serve her turn but that. For, Clement, who believes nothing, but only fears, and who has good cause besides for mistrust of his actions, would be fooled at no time. Now, listen, Ray. When first I came to Cliffe, my aunt, meaning, perhaps, to make me wholly hers, recommended to me many of all her plans and ideas, partly perhaps in boast, to show how she was all in all with your poor father, disclosed to me several things that were perhaps she now wishes had been sealed to her by your father. Let not that fret you, Ray; he doubtless kept them from you, well judging that you too much respect toward that place already. However, so it was that, while the household and yourselves knew where the priests' holes were, and at all times, between the floor and ceiling of the bed-room in the North Tower, and how the panel in the Long Gallery slides aside which gives Sir Bevis Angevyn, it is related, the master and his wife knew of the Priests' Chamber within the chimney of the Blue Room, a way of ingress and egress, and, betwixt all the doors, and think himself secure from interlopers, and yet his enemy may be in hiding within the very room, step by the inhospitable hearth. Sir William, who was wont to lie with pistols beneath his pillow, was found one day slain, she told me, by these means; and thereby, I am right sure, did Aunt Grace gain access to the Blue Room last night, and, with the same means, make her wonder that her brother took for a shroud. As for the falling of the floor, Clement doubtless spoke truth when he said that, seated where he was, with attentive eyes, runs across the polished planks; nay, more, the floors of the two disused rooms beneath are similarly cut, and by now that Guy Clifford would kill his guest, he had only to withdraw a bolt or two, and the victim fell a sheer thirty feet upon the stone flags of the kitchen-hearth. Aunt Grace knew that Clement would never have the courage to leave his bed, or she would assuredly, ere this, have met with a knight with him. She holds my memory as cheaply as my mind, else it is scarce credible that, being my enemy and traducer, she could feel sure of my patroness, and condescended to let me know so much."

"Yet Aunt Grace could have made this girl as her bosom rose and fell with indignant passion, and her form trembled, but not with fear, she would have been capable of, since no longer than she took shield as well as spear. Thalestris herself was defied by the sex obedient Lampeto, when that brave dame's hand was held, nor threatened by the imperious queen.

"Dear Ray, there is no time to lose," continued Mildred; "Aunt Grace designs to strike a blow to-night, which it behooves us to anticipate. She will repeat her stage-play this very night, as I believe; and, if we do, we must take your father behind the scenes. At supper, strive to move him all you can with the story of your adventure in the cave, and how his mind is warped by evil influence from—— Hush! quiet! Heaven help us, some one has entered the cave. I saw a gleam of light yonder."

"Not so, Mildred; you are excited, and imagine things that have no existence. I told old Angus that no visitors were to be shown the place this afternoon, under any circumstances. Well, and when I have warned my father—all in vain, I fear —what then?"

"When you hear the great organ of the gallery play" Achieved is the Glorious Work," but him follow you through the turret-door and out upon the roof. Tell him that if you fail to prove your words by what he shall there behold with his own eyes, that you are content to fall without the pale of his good favor for the future. Trust to me, Ray: he shall see that which will wreck his confidence in this false woman who makes so certain of thy ruin, dear one, at once and for ever. Then tell him— By heaven, there is the light again! I see your brother's shadow. If he finds us here together, all is lost—all, all! She overheard our tryst, and has betrayed us."

"I know not the reason of your sudden terror, Mildred; but I know you are wise and true to me," whispered Raymond, in hurried but earnest accents. "All shall not be lost, love; nor shall I be lost——"

"What! you would not tempt that dreadful passage twice? moreover, he would see the glimmer of thy torch."

"Ay, but not thus;" he cast the flaming pine-branch into the dark stream, which quenched it on the instant, and plunging in himself, followed the blackened wood as it was sucked beneath the frowning arch.

Mildred uttered one sharp scream; for her lover was gone from her, without even a farewell kiss, and now, may be, was battling with black death; but the next instant, with a mighty effort, she decked her ghastly face with a set smile, like a counterfeit wreath upon a tombstone, and turned it to meet Rupert Clifford.

CHAPTER IX.—THE HEIR'S SECRET.

RUPERT entered "The Cathedral" running, although necessarily at a stoop, by reason of the lowness of the adit, and casting one hasty glance at Mildred, began, without speaking, to search the vast apartment, torch in hand. There was the same restless expression in his eyes which had struck a momentary terror in the girl that very morning, combined with a passion such as she had never seen in him before. But she was not frightened now. What fear was in her was for Raymond. Was he safe in the spacious gloom of Finis Hall? or was the relentless stream carrying his beloved form, inanimate, bruised, disfigured, into the recesses of the hill? For the moment she intensely hated his brother, who had thus driven him to take so perilous a step; and perfect hate, like love, casteth out fear. Moreover, fully convinced that, in concert with her wily aunt, Rupert had basely tricked her in their previous conversation, she was inclined to imagine that he was still playing a part. Although, therefore, he ran to and fro about the chamber in a strange, wild way, and muttered to himself in anger, she stood firm, watching him in contemptuous silence, and when he came close to her, having thoroughly explored the place, and menacingly shaking his torch in her very face, exclaimed: "Where is he? Where is he hiding his false face?" she returned his eager look with one of scorn.

"Who is it you seek?" said she. "Whose face is it that Rupert Clifford ventures to call 'false?' He who in league with a heartless woman plotted against an unprotected girl, to steal her heart with lies. Nay, you waste your fierce looks upon me, sir; I am not your vassal—your gentle blood I hold as nothing without gentle deeds. Why do you track me hither, and force your company upon me when I need it not; nay, more, sir, when I loathe it."

He looked at her with suspicious cunning, and uttered but a single word:

"Raymond."

"He is not here," returned she, coldly. "You have seen for yourself, have you not?"

Like one upon whom conviction is forced against his will, Rupert answered, peevishly:

"And yet she told me he was here."

"Have you never known her tell a falsehood?" returned Mildred, disdainfully. "When you dropped your kerchief in the moat to-day——"

"Ay," interrupted Rupert, simply, and passing his hand across his forehead, "I remember that. That was the signal we agreed upon—your aunt and I; so soon as you had given your promise to be mine I was to drop the kerchief. Sweet Mildred—and you gave it."

"I, Rupert? Never! No, and I never will! How dare you tell me to my face I did! I do confess you fooled me with your dishonest, artful talk of 'Save my reason,' so that I threw away some pity; but my love, sir—be sure of this—will never be so wasted!"

"'Dishonest—artful—talk,'" repeated Rupert, slowly. "Do you think I made a mock of being mad?"

"I do; and that Aunt Grace set you on to do it."

"She? Why, Mildred, think a little: would she not lock me up, as she did Uncle Cyril, so that, after murdering Raymond, all would be hers? No; she must never know what you shall know, love, and that now. Nobody must know, Mildred—promise me that much, sweetheart; but Mistress Clifford and that Clement—he with the cruel eyes—those must know least of all. Sit you down here, and listen to me a little."

He pointed to two slabs of glittering spar, like thrones of frosted silver, and she sat down on one and he upon the other, close beside her. She obeyed him involuntarily; but if she had given herself time to think, she would have obeyed him still; the same idea had now seized upon her respecting Rupert's sanity as had taken possession of her before; she acquitted him of having previously deceived her; and once more, though her heart was by no means free from fear, it had room for tenderest pity. But what made her more compliant than all was this, that while he last was speaking, she had heard a certain far-off sound which convinced her of the safety of her lover. The swooning note of an Æolian harp could not have been fainter; but she knew that signal well, and her attentive ear had drunk it in—the sweetest music it had ever listened to—while Rupert, rapt in earnest speech, had not observed it.

"I will listen to you, Rupert," said she, kindly; "but speak like your honest self, and not what another has bidden you to say."

"Mildred," commenced the young man, slowly and sorrowfully, "I had hoped that what passed this morning between us two, would have spared me the confession I have now to make. I think it must have done so, had you loved me. You would then have credited what I said, and have known that there was more—and worse to say. The dark cloud that I told you seemed about to fall upon my being—soul, heart, and brain—has fallen already. It is not even in your power to avert it; but you may lift it up, Mildred. I am prison-bound, but you have the master-key—you have indeed—that can undo my fetters, and set wide the door. Shake not your beauteous head, but look upon me tenderly—ay, so, and listen to my woe, if not my love. Dear Mildred, I am mad. Start not, nor tremble, sweet heart; I am not so mad, nor ever shall be, that I should injure you. Not one shining hair but being yours is sacred to me as sacramental wafer to the priest; and as he worships it, and treats it reverently, so that all men should bow before it likewise, so do I worship you. Nay, you need not grudge me that poor favor, girl; it can harm you not, and I worship nothing else—not I, i' faith. I am like Guy in that—I love not chapel-going. While the priest is droning, droning, my fingers itch to strangle his fair throat; all chanting-time, I sing my maddest songs; and when they kneel, I plant my face in the soft cushions, and make mocking mouths. Do not look so, Mildred; I can bear the pity of your eyes, but not the terror. It was for fear of this that I did not tell you all long, long ago, and only hinted at the horrid thing this morning. You believe me now, girl; that is well. I feared that I should have to laugh out loud; then nobody could doubt.

"I was not born a mad child. There was no band about my forehead, tight and hard as now, when I was very young; but gradually the thing has stolen on me, day by day, or rather night by night, as I should reckon, for it is at night, like a baleful flower, that madness grows. Ah! what nights I passed. Alone in the large bed-chamber above the hall I used to lie—a ghastly nursery, Mildred, for a child like me. The woman that was my nurse, instead of tales of fairies and magicians, told me of Guy and of that dread shape—the statue yonder—which I had seen a thousand times before I beheld it here. Every night she promised to sit beside me to keep off the dreadful things, and every night she would put the candle to my face, and seeing me, as she thought, asleep, would leave me in the dark: then came the whispering voices, the soft rustling sounds, the stealthy footsteps round my little bed. Ah! what misery, Mildred, from the time of closing doors and loud good-nights, when my father and the rest retired, until the blessed morning dawn! Above my room was one which no one occupied, as it was thought; but I knew better. All night, one gibbered and moaned there, warming himself in the moonbeams as best he could, and shaking his chain for company. Once in the daytime I ventured thither, and though he was not there, I saw his chain fastened to the wall by a strong staple, as madmen always are by their sane brethren. This made me very cunning from the first. Only my father knew, and what he knew I think he has now forgotten. On a day when I thought myself unwatched, I had climbed up the winding stair of the West Tower—a weary way for my young limbs to go—and peering above the battlement, was about to execute a plan, long and fondly cherished, of leaping off into the air, when a strong arm was suddenly put around my waist, and I heard my father's voice. He was not angry, as I feared he might be; he spoke me fair and very kindly, and carried me down stairs to save my little limbs; and while he did so, upon my face I felt his burning tears fall fast, which frightened me, not knowing why he wept. But I know now—"

"Alas! poor child," murmured Mildred, tenderly. "My heart bleeds for thee, Rupert."

"She pities me, and does not fear!" he cried. "There is hope yet, then. The red-hot pain already hurts less keenly. I thank thee, blessed balm. Mildred, I have told you that the night is terrible to such as I am; but the morn is very sweet. My comfort comes with the first gray light that steals into my chamber, at which the phantoms vanish, and the mocking faces cease their gibes. A bird that loves the tree beneath my window, presently begins to sing—a rain of melody upon my parched-up soul. Then at the open window do I sit for hours, quite happy. The morning winds are ever blithe and joyous; out from the purple light they come that crowns this very hill. The pine-groves beckon them toward me; the cornfield, with ten thousand tossing ears, motions them on; and on they drive in music, and shed by my hair, and calm my throbbing pulse, and cool my fevered brain. Then mine eyes, looking on the dewy fields, themselves have dew in them—a something loosens at my heart, and then the dew—the sleeping farms, the river's stately flow, the wonder and the glory of the earth, sink deep into my soul."

"It cannot be," said Mildred, scarce knowing that she spoke aloud, "that such a mind as this has suffered total wreck."

"Ay, but it hath, it hath," returned he, earnestly. "I have only told thee what I suffered as a boy—enough, as I see, for conviction, and yet not too much, as I hope, for loving pity. "Let it suffice to say, that with every year the evil spirit has grown within me, and must one day gain the mastery altogether, if thou not cast it out. There is but one physician in all this world with power to heal me, Mildred. Thou art even as the morning dawn to me; and if thou wilt but smile a little on me, the darkness will presently dissolve, and all will yet be day. I feel, I know it. See, I kneel before thee, and entreat thee—brave, kind heart—to give me thy true love! Men often boast such love is life to them; but to me more than life; and if refused, a thing more bitter far than death awaits me."

He knelt before her on the silver sand, his fair face gentle and sad as the dewy eve, his thin white hands clasped close as anchorite's, his eyes fixed hungrily on hers. What could she tell him?—for the truth she dared not tell—what answer could she give that neither would deceive him with false hopes, nor smite him where a blow would worse than slay?

"Rupert," said she, "you say that I am fair, and therein, as I believe, you tell me truth. A woman loves her loveliness very dearly; and yet I swear to you that I would straightway become misshapen and uncomely as yonder seeming statue, if by so doing I could lift the burden which you speak of from your troubled mind, or help the grievous loss which time and loving hearts may still, through God's sweet mercy, remedy. You are yet very young. At present, be content with my best sympathy: having confided to me this great grief, let me bear something of it; make me your priest, and I will do my best to shrive you, keeping your secret safe. Beware of evil counsels, and all evil; the Cliffords are not born mad more than other folks; but unbridled vice and wickedness made them what they were. Be good, be temperate, be honest—for by such means it is that men keep sane."

"And that is all the comfort you can give me now," said Rupert, sighing and rising from his seat. "God bless thee, Mildred, for that much. Let us go home. I am far better for this talk; thy very voice, though speaking not the words which I would hear, is soothing as the harp which David played to pacify mad Saul."

As they moved slowly homeward, and before the glimmer of their torches had quite left the vaulted chamber, Raymond emerged dripping from the subterranean stream.

"What could Rupert have had to tell her," murmured he, "that he should follow her to Ribble Cave, and keep me dripping in the dark so long? A man less accustomed to otter-hunting and fishing in mid-stream would have run the risk of—taking cold."

An Adventure with a Monomaniac.

ABOUT a year ago I had occasion to visit the remote village of R—— on business. While there, I became the recipient of a cordial invitation to attend a reception at the house of Mrs. S——.

My first impulse was to decline; but on mature deliberation, I decided to attend; and I did not regret it, for it was a brilliant affair.

Among the many to whom I had the pleasure of being introduced during the evening, was a certain Mr. Morrill. He was a noble-looking man. Dark complexion, finely-molded features, rather tall, and altogether just such a person as was my beau-ideal of what nature intended man to be. I found him elegant and witty in the extreme, and we had not conversed long ere I mentally pronounced him the most gifted conversationalist I had ever met.

I was strangely interested in Mr. Morrill, and when opportunity offered, I asked Dr. C——, with whom I was on terms of intimacy, who the gentleman was. In answer to my inquiries, he told me that Mr. Morrill was a lawyer, who stood very high in his profession, and had been elected to the Legislature about a month previous.

"You would not think," continued the doctor, "that he had ever been a monomaniac?"

"A monomaniac! No."

"Well, he has been. Come out on the balcony, and I'll tell you all about it. Two years ago," he resumed, when we were out of hearing, "Mr. Morrill was prostrated with brain fever; he was just beginning to recover, when we discovered that his mind was affected. He imagined himself deaf and dumb, but in every other respect he was perfectly sane. When he was sufficiently recovered to admit of his going out, he went to his office, and attended to his business as well as a deaf and dumb man could. He would converse with his partner on paper, but all our plans to induce him to speak proved ineffectual. His wife was in the greatest distress. I called one morning and found her weeping sadly on account of her husband. I resolved once more to try and compel him to speak, and before leaving, had arranged a plan with her which we hoped would prove successful. Although simple, you will see how effectual it proved.

"On the succeeding day I repaired to his house about the time I supposed he would be home to dinner. He was seated at the dinner-table when I arrived. I bowed to him and passed into the adjoining room. His wife soon followed. We had purposely left the door ajar, in order that he might hear us.

"'Mary,' said I, to his wife, 'I wish you would leave Morrill, and marry me. He's a mean, stingy old rascal. If I—'

"'I'm a mean, stingy old rascal, am I?' said he, rushing in with a pair of tongs, which he had picked up.

"Springing through the open window, I rushed up the street, running at the top of my speed. He followed close after me. At first I rather enjoyed the excitement, but it was fast becoming serious. I was getting tired, but dared not stop. He pursued me so closely that I had no opportunity to enter a house; and soon there were no houses to enter, for we had left the village far in the distance.

"On, on we sped, pursuer and pursued. As you may well imagine, by this time I was greatly exhausted, and knowing if I continued my flight much longer I must surely be overtaken, I determined to turn about and face my pursuer. Suiting the action to the thought, I turned, and in a second he was up with me.

"He immediately aimed a blow at me with the tongs, which he had retained during the pursuit.

"I stepped to one side and received the blow on my left arm, unfortunately shattering the bone. We then clutched, and immediately commenced a desperate struggle, lasting several minutes. In the disabled condition in which the blow of the tongs had placed me, I felt I was slowly but surely being overcome, and began to be seriously alarmed for my safety, when suddenly his hold on me relaxed, and he lay motionless before me on the grass. It was too much for human nature, and in the critical moment he had succumbed to exhaustion.

"In my disabled condition, I could do very little for him but sit down and wait for some one to pass that way. Ere long, a farmer with an ox-team came along the road. With the assistance of a laborer, the farmer got us both into the wagon, and bore us back to the house we had left so suddenly.

"Mrs. Morrill was, of course, much alarmed at beholding her husband in an insensible condition; but I quieted her by saying that when he came to, his cure would probably be effected. A brother professional was called, who dressed my arm. Mr. Morrill was immediately put to bed, and before I left I had the pleasure of seeing him in a peaceful sleep.

"The rest is soon told. He slept through all the afternoon and night, and into the next day; and awoke with his mind as clear as it is now. He now stands an honored legislator and an ornament to his profession. I recovered entirely from my injuries in the course of a few weeks, and I often think of, but do not regret, my Adventure with a Monomaniac!"

THE GAINS OF AUTHORS.

THE contrast between the sums paid for Milton's "Paradise Lost," and Byron's "Childe Harold," or any other great modern work, is a standing source of popular astonishment; though, when taken in connection with the other great changes which the world has seen, there is really nothing exceptional about the case. The same has happened in France, which also goes to prove that the change is the result of a general progression, and not of accident. Certain facts of this kind have been published of late, and have attracted attention. For instance, we are told that in the 17th century Chapelain received 3,000 francs ($600) for his first and second editions of "La Pucelle," and that great indignation was then expressed that certain popular authors should receive such large sums, while poor writers were compelled to write verses by the bushel to get a crust. It is said that in Chapelain's time verses were paid for at the rate of four francs (80 cents a hundred for long, and two francs (40 cents) a hundred for shorts—not a grand rate certainly; but then, be it remembered, the poor writer could live for a week on four francs; and his verses were, to tell the truth, frequently quite as poor as himself. Boileau is said to have sold "Le Lutrin" for 600 francs ($120); Racine to have received only 200 for the MS. of "Andromaque;" Diderot, 600 for his "Pensees Philosophiques," while Letourneur got only 400 francs for his translation of Young's "Night Thoughts," which made the publisher's fortune, and Rousseau got 6,000 francs for the manuscript of "Emile," really a large sum for the period; but Delille received only 400 francs for his translation of the "Georgics." Bernardin de Saint-Pierre sold his first work, the "Voyage à l'Ile de France" for 1,000 francs, about the same time that Goldsmith got half as much again for one of the first romances ever penned in any country.

Coming down to more recent days, it appears that the Constitutionnel newspaper paid Eugene Sue 100,000 francs for the "Juif Errant," in 10 volumes, and the Débats 160,000 francs for the "Mystères de Paris;" and it was thought marvelous that Dumas, Sue, and others should obtain 25 cents a line for their contributions to the feuilletons of the journals.

The other day a new system of payment was hit upon, Alexandre Dumas receiving two centimes per letter for his "San Felice," published in La Presse, or about 14 cents a line. Frederic Soulié, for the "Memoires du Diable," which made his reputation, received 50,000 francs. George Sand wrote her first novel, in conjunction with Jules Sandeau, and the two received 400 francs between them for their work; "Indiana," by the lady alone, was sold for 1,000 francs; now, the Revue des Deux Mondes pays her 500 francs a sheet for her contributions.

In 1823 Victor Hugo's romance of "Hans d'Islande" only gained him 300 francs; "Les Misérables" has already produced him more than a thousand times that sum. It is said that the publisher of the "Mémoires de Therese" has made about 20,000 francs by that very popular and refined production! The position of a popular dramatic author in France is regal; his rights, established in 1653, bear magnificent fruit. Scribe left a fortune of 4,000,000 francs, having commenced by making just $25 by his first work. At the Grand Opera a sum of 500 francs is divided nightly between the composer and the librettist; at the Opera Comique, the author receives one-eighth and a half of the gross receipts for a piece of three acts, one-sixth and a half for two, and one-sixth for one act; at the Française he receives 15 per cent. of the proceeds when his piece occupies the whole evening, and so on in proportion; the Odeon allots 12 per cent.. in like manner. The principal minor theatres give 10 per cent., and at the Châtelot, which makes the largest receipts, the author's portion has often amounted to 1,000 francs a night; the little theatres in the outskirts of Paris pay 12, 22, and 30 francs each evening for pieces of one, two, or three acts respectively; lastly, the provincial theatres are divided into five classes, the first paying 40 or 50 francs, and the last 3 or 4 francs per night.

There are in Paris, at the present moment, 4 operas 2 imperial theatres, 7 vaudeville and genre theatres, 12 minor houses of all kinds, 3 equestrian theatres, and 6 or 7 small theatres in the banlieue, making in all 35, so that dramatic authors have a wide field, and they do not neglect its cultivation.

Authors of reputation obtain premiums in addition to the above droits d'auteur; and, moreover, often make a considerable sum by the sale of the manuscript to a publisher. Alexandre Dumas is said to have received 11,000 francs for his "Marriage sous Louis XV." in premiums alone; and each piece of M. Sardon is said to produce him on an average, all included, about 80,000 francs. Some fairy pieces have produced sums almost as fabulous as their plots; "Rothomago" is said to have yielded its author nearly 100,000 francs, and the "Pied de Mouton" more than that amount. Corneille received 4,000 francs for "Attila" and "Berenice," and was thought to have discovered a mine of wealth. It is quite evident that it is not want of patronage that prevents the French dramatists of the present time from rivaling Racine, Corneille, Molière, and Beaumarchais; but they doubtless know the measure of their patrons' tastes, and are too cautious to break the golden thread that binds them, and fly, like Pegasus, to the region of the gods.

LEMON JUICE IN DIPHTHERIA.—Dr. Revillout in a paper presented last summer to the French Academy of Medicine, asserts that lemon-juice is one of the most efficacious medicines which can be applied in diphtheria and he relates that, when a dresser in the hospital, his own life was saved by this timely application. He got three dozen lemons and gargled his throat with the juice, swallowing a little at the same time, in order to ct on the more deep-seated parts. The doctor has noted 1 cases of complete success obtained by this method of treatment.

REGATTA OF THE ATALANTA AND COLUMBIA BOAT CLUBS, WEDNESDAY, MAY 16TH, FROM HOBOKEN TO GUTTENBERG, N. J., ON THE HUDSON.

"SPRING."

Come hither, fair Spring! Hither turn thy steps from the "green islands of eternal youth"—tripping more softly than Aurora from the land of black and grizzly Night. Hither come, gentle and beneficent daughter of a rough and cruel sire! Revisit us once more; for among the waving, tendril play of the virgin-gold light of thy bright young hair, thou wreathest a coronal of fragrance; and 'neath and round thy fairy steps rise, spirit-like, the rose, the lily, and the thousand flowers which, for a little while, make the emerald earth beautiful as the sapphire vault of heaven. Hither come; for before thee "sky, earth, and sea breathe like a bright-eyed face, and laugh out openly." With thee Life again goes a-maying—gathering nosegays from nature of Hope and Poesy. Come! oh, come! for the simplest promise of thy appearing more delights than all the assured riches of summer or the garnered wealth of autumn. Thou fillest the heart with new-born hopes and fond, vague longings—which who would forfeit? for are they not our most precious mortal heritage? do they not, sweet siren, ever prove more delicious than the bliss of fruition or the joy of attainment? But if "'tis distance lends enchantment to the view" of all else, are not Spring and Hope levelled when they steal upon us unobserved? Again, then, welcome, glorious Spring! Lead, oh, lead forth all the loves and graces! Revivify all the latent germs of nature's beauteousness and bounty. Wake, oh, wake our great Mother Earth, that, rejuvenescent, she may vail her naked form, Eve-like but aimlessly, with the purity of lilies and the innocent blush of roses. Bring thy sweet time, O Spring, the "merry Spring time," and with thee the warm, effusive influence that swells the buds and quick evolves the many-twinkling leaves, sparkling in the shower or whispering to the breeze; that warms the life-blood and quickens the pulse; that lightens the step and decks the path; charms the eye and spell-binds the ear; that attunes every sense and every heart to joy and thanksgiving. Let the woods once more resound with the thousand jubilate voices of birds; and let poetry and art lead the universal responsive chorus of praise from men. For is not the lovely path of Spring the flowery part of Virtue's own narrow road leading from Nature up to Nature's God, and terminating at the gate of heaven?

Such, we think, is the train of thought and a few of the images suggested by the beautiful statue we have engraved—its characteristic and lovely form, its appropriate gesture, expression, action, and emblems. We need, perhaps, only add that it is as creditable in execution as conception, and that it received one of the gold medals of the first Great Italian National Exhibition at Florence.

"SPRING," THE CELEBRATED STATUE BY PELA, OF TURIN, ITALY.

WHITE DEER IN LOGAN SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.

IT is an amiable feeling that selects for a favorite an animal so gentle and beautiful as the deer, so graceful in all its movements, and retaining just enough of its natural timidity to link it with its forest life. Such a pet we have shown in the illustration, a beautiful white deer, a most rare acquisition, the envy of thousands, who would fain possess a plaything so attractive and at the same time so intelligent. To the children it was always an object of admiration, and many of larger growth were not ashamed to confess their delight as they watched its gambols.

REGATTA ON THE HUDSON.

THE organized boat clubs of New York celebrated the opening of the boating season, on the 17th of May, with considerable eclat.

The Atalanta and Columbia Clubs met at their boat-house, foot of Christopher street, about nine o'clock in the morning, and manning their boats, pulled over to the Hoboken shore, where they were to have been met by the Atlantic Boat Club, of Hoboken. The latter club was not in readiness, however, at that time, but arranged to meet the other organizations at Guttenburg, in the afternoon. They then proceeded to select a commodore to conduct the movements of the squadron during the day. Mr. Simpson, of the Columbia, and George Roahr, of the Atalanta Club, were nominated, but the former gentleman declining in favor of the latter, Mr. Roahr was selected for that position by acclamation.

The boats were then manned, pushed off and pulled up the river. The weather was all that could be desired by the most sanguine anticipant among the members of these popular health-creating organizations, the light breeze which prevailed being just sufficient to gently ruffle the waters and fan the athletes, who plied well their oars as they joined in many friendly little contests in their allocate endeavors to distance each other. Their appearance was certainly very attractive, both as regards their regalia and their boats, the latter having undergone considerable improvements. Passing the steam-yacht Wave and other vessels, the neat little squadron was the recipient of frequent salutations, which were gracefully acknowledged by the peaking of their oars, the usual salute of the boat clubs.

WHITE DEER IN LOGAN SQUARE, PHILADELPHIA.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY RIDGWAY GLOVER, OF PHILADELPHIA.

On their arrival at Guttenburg they disembarked, and, after partaking of some refreshments, re-embarked. Pleasant Valley, Bull's Ferry and Fort Lee were also visited, and a short stay made at each landing.

In the evening, after their return to the city, they repaired to the Park Hotel, Hoboken, where the various clubs of amateur oarsmen partook of a dinner.

We need hardly add that Mr. Vollman's entertainment was worthy of his reputation of being the Delmonico of the Jerseys.

OUASSENGO, A WEALTHY MERCHANT ON THE RIVER BAMBOE, AFRICA, SURROUNDED BY HIS WIVES.

LIFE IN GABOON.

Ouassengo, a Rich Trader on the River Rambo, Surrounded by his Wives.

THE recent English explorations in Africa have stimulated French investigation, and Du Chaillu is not alone in developing mysteries. Since 1845 France has had a small colony at the mouth of the Gaboon, a river in West Africa, which enters the Atlantic by a wide estuary near the equator. The result of recent publications has been greatly to increase our knowledge of the Pahouins, Fans, and other strangely barbarous tribes on that coast. Most of the kings and some of the wealthier chiefs, not a few of whom are merchants now-a-days, have assumed European costume, but to no great extent. European civilization or Christianity. A Mormon merchant might make before a photographer a display like that of Mr. Ouassengo, but it is not the style of the Eastern coast. Seated in his arm-chair, with his colossal ivory tusks as supporters, he looks like one of our better-to-do colored men, but his harem smacks, in number, dress and mien, of savage life and female degradation.

THE CHETAH AND ANTELOPE.

THE Chetah, or hunting leopard, is frequently tamed in India, and used in the chase of antelopes. It is carried in a small wagon, chained and hooded, lest, on approaching the herd, it should be too precipitate or not make choice of a proper animal. It does not immediately spring toward its prey, but winds with the utmost caution along the ground, stopping at intervals and carefully concealing itself till a favorable opportunity offers; it then darts on the herd with astonishing swiftness, and overtakes them by the rapidity of its bounds. If, however, in its first attempt, which consists of five or six amazing leaps, it does not succeed, it loses breath, and giving up the point at once, returns sullkily to its cart.

The following description of a hunt will explain the mode of procedure:

On this occasion we had three chetahs in the field, and proceeded to the spot where a herd had been seen.

On emerging from a cotton-field, we came in sight of four antelopes, and my driver managed to get within 100 yards of them ere they took the alarm.

The chetah was quickly loosed, and as soon as he viewed the deer, he dropped quietly off the the cart, and approached them at a slow, crouching canter, masking himself by every bush and inequality that lay in his way. He singled out a doe, and ran it close for about 200 yards, when he reached it with a blow of his paw, rolled it over, and in an instant was sucking the life's blood from its throat. As soon as the deer is pulled down, a keeper runs up, hoods the chetah, cuts the victim's throat, after which it is dragged away and placed in the cart, while the chetah is rewarded with a leg for his pains.

THE POWER OF MUSIC.

THE influence of music upon the feelings and passions of both men and brutes is proverbial, and of many illustrations given of its power, the following will not prove destitute of interest. It is related by Haydn: In my early youth, I went with some other young people, one summer day, to seek coolness and fresh air on one of the lofty mountains which surround the Lago Maggiore, in Lombardy. Having reached the middle of the ascent, we were surrounded by a large flock of sheep which were leaving the fold to go to their pasture. One of our party took a flute from his pocket, and said: "I am going to turn Corydon; let us see whether Virgil's sheep will recognize their pastor." He began to play; the sheep, which were following one another toward the mountain, with their heads hanging down, raised them at the first sound of the flute, and with a hasty movement, turned to the side whence the agreeable sound proceeded. Gradually they flocked around the musician, and listened with motionless attention. He ceased playing; still the sheep did not stir. The shepherd with his staff obliged those nearest him to move on, but no sooner did the flute begin to play again, than his auditors again returned to him. The shepherd, out of patience, pelted them with clods, but not one would move; such as were hit by them began to march, but the others refused to stir. At last the shepherd entreated the musician to stop his magic sounds, when the sheep moved off, but continued to stand, at a distance, as often as our friend resumed the agreeable instrument. The tune played was only a favorite air of the opera familiar at that time, but its influence in developing a passion in the flock was most marked, and afforded the subject of repeated reasonings.

THE POWER OF MUSIC OVER ANIMALS.

LIFE IN TEXAS.

A YOUNG lady who is now engaged as a teacher among the freedmen in Texas, gives the following graphic account of her situation:

"I left Galveston Tuesday morning, and reached Houston about noon, where we found that, as the cars did not connect, we must remain until the next morning; so we went to the Old Capitol House for the night. The next morning it was raining, not raining, but pouring down buckets-full—and the roof of the passenger accomodation leaked like a skimmer, so we soaked and rode all day over the 'lovely' prairie, and arrived, just before dark in the midst of an unusually copious deluge, at Beaumont station. There we were carried three miles further in an open lumber wagon, and at last brought up before a low, old, shaggy brown house, which, as best we could, the affectionate (and other wise) caresses of an indefinite number of the canine species, we found ourselves glowing and steaming before a huge fire of logs in an open mud fire-place. I was a little tired, and even hungry, but the simple salt junk and half-cooked corn dodgers were not appetizing, and there was the question of how all of us were to pass the night; for I noted that there were but three rooms, and the family in the residence numbered seven before the accession of sister and myself.

"My conjectures were unnecessary, as I soon discovered; we were allotted an airy corner in an apartment which had the recommendation of thorough ventilation. An opening had been cut in the side of the house for a window, but financial or other embarrassments had delayed the complete realization of the architectural idea, and the opening remained in innocent integrity. The door was swollen with rain, and declined the embrace of its frame; while yawning seams in the floor and walls admitted the 'native air,' with a true Southern hospitality.

"But I slept soundly, soothed by the treble of the wolves and the melodious basso profunde of the nearer dogs.

"Our host is the only Union man in the place. He is a native of the township, and has been content to look no farther than its borders for each of the four wives who have successively ruled his heart and home. His plantation, the title of which is his own, and is unencumbered, covers 5,000 acres of land. Wild cattle and horses roam over his prairies, and the deer bound away unmolested.

"There is not a church of any description in the place. There was formerly a Methodist church, but it was blown down last fall, and the minister said that, after inquiring of the oldest inhabitants, he failed to learn that there had been a single conversion in the place since more than twenty-five years; whence both he and his people deduced the logical inference that the institution didn't pay its way, and had better stay blown down. The members divided the timber, and ecclesiastical discussions were indefinitely postponed.

"We use the court-house for a school-house, having only Hobson's choice. The more chivalrous of our neighbors announce an intention to indefinitely postpone African education by the prompt annihilation of the Yankee school-ma'ams, and descend kindly to ample specifications. I do not learn of entire agreement as to the better method, however. Some think it better to poison us; but to this it is objected that the food might be mishanded by some stupid servant, and more innocent victims suffer in our stead. Others contend that nothing is so neat as a clean bullet-hole in the skull, and to this the majority seem to agree. A respectable minority deprecate personal violence, but think there could be no objection to the deflagration of the court-house, of the value of which, for any ordinary uses, only a moderate estimate is entertained; and it is somewhat cogently argued that as there is no other shelter for the school possible or conceivable, the desideratum can be reached without bloodshed—which, although not seriously objectionable, may as well be avoided, out of æsthetic considerations, when it is entirely convenient.

"The shooting could be very easily done by a practiced hand, as I go more than a mile across the prairie to my daily evening-school, and return at ten o'clock.

"I am growing accustomed to my somewhat novel surroundings, and have already discovered that corn-bread and salt pork constitute excellent diet, despite the flavor of monotony. It is, or was at first, something of a drawback that there was no other light than firelight in the evening; but since the night-school was established, I am not at home until bed-time, and have learned to grope like an adept. If I had not known something of privation before, I should say—as I suppose you would—that we have not one of the common comforts of life."

ROMANTIC INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF GOTFRIED KINKEL.

A Paris correspondent of a daily contemporary takes the occasion of the arrival of the German poet, philosopher and patriot, Gotfried Kinkel, in that city, to indulge in the following reminiscences, apropos of his eventful history, in which are brought out some strange and interesting facts concerning Gen. Carl Schurz. No romance could be more "thrilling" or interesting.

When the Revolution of 1848 broke out, Kinkel was a Professor at the University of Bonn, and his strong democratic opinions induced him to take a prominent part in the struggle. He fought, was made prisoner by the royal authorities, was tried for treason, and was sentenced to many years' imprisonment at hard labor.

Among Kinkel's companions at this time was a young student, not yet 20 years of age, named Carl Schurz, who was also captured, tried by court-martial, and sentenced to be shot. Schurz, however, more fortunate than his Professor, succeeded in escaping across the French frontier, and was safe. Kinkel was sent to a common prison, placed among criminals of the vilest sort, and set to work making shoes. Young Germany, still trembling with the excitements of the recent Revolution, learned with indignation the treatment inflicted upon the eminent poet and scholar, and numerous petitions were sent to the Prussian Government, praying that his situation might be ameliorated. To all this the authorities paid no attention whatever, the protestations ceased, and Kinkel seemed likely to be abandoned by his friends.

There was one, however, who did not desert him. Carl Schurz left Paris, disguised himself in rags, and, defying the scaffold, re-entered Prussia, with an organ on his back. In the day, he begged his bread on the high road; at night, he laid aside his organ, and visited the abodes of his former companions and the friends of German liberty, to endeavor to reawaken their interest in the fate of the imprisoned patriot. In this way he traveled 300 leagues on foot, playing the organ through many towns and villages, carefully maturing his plans, and sleeping in barns or under hedges. On one occasion he was stopped by two Prussian gens-d'armes, who inquired where he was going.

"To the neighboring town," replied Schurz.

"Would you like to earn a handful of pfennings?" asked the others.

"Certainly."

It was impossible to decline the offer of the soldiers without exciting suspicion; so Schurz accepted, with a great show of gratitude, and during the whole night ground out waltzes and quadrilles for a battalion of gens-d'armes. Leaving, undiscovered, the dangerous society of the military police, young Schurz continued his journey, and a short time subsequently information reached him that Kinkel's prison had been changed. He was now incarcerated at Spandau, and placed under the personal supervision of the prison director.

Late one night, when the streets had become deserted, a post-chaise, escorted by a guard of four dragoons, drove rapidly through the town of Spandau, and halted before the prison. An officer in the uniform of a Colonel of the Royal Guard alighted from the vehicle, and was soon in the presence of the director, into whose hands he placed a letter from the Minister of the Interior at Berlin, and bearing the official seal. Receiving the packet with the respect due to a communication from the King's Minister, the director opened the important missive, and read as follows:

"A deep-laid plot has been organized at Berlin, the object of which is to effect the forcible release of the convict Kinkel from the hands of the authorities. We are now watching the movements of the conspirators, and are preparing to arrest them. In order, however, to prevent the possibility of a surprise, the bearer of the present letter, Colonel ——, is commanded to take charge of your prisoner, whom he will immediately conduct to the citadel of Magdebourg, and place him in the hands of the governor of that fortress."

Upon reading this ministerial injunction, the director of the Spandau prison at once had the unfortunate Kinkel awakened, caused him to be securely ironed and placed in the post-chaise, which set off on the road to Magdebourg, accompanied by the Colonel and the four dragoons, who rode with drawn sabres. All night long they traveled at rapid speed; fresh horses were instantly furnished at each relay, the Colonel's demand being accompanied by the magical expression, "the King's service." The unhappy prisoner, crouched in a corner of the vehicle, cared not what might be his fate—Germany had forgotten him, and nothing could be worse than the noisome dungeon at Spandau. Morning came at last, a gray winter's dawn, and the carriage stopped. The Colonel himself opened the door, and bade the prisoner alight. Without a word, poor Kinkel obeyed, and found himself standing on the sea-shore, a boat awaiting a few feet from the spot where he stood, and a ship with the English flag at her mast-head lying-to within sight. The prisoner uttered a cry of mingled hope and despair.

"Do you not know me, my dear old master?" sobbed the pseudo Colonel, tearing off his false mustache, and clasping Kinkel in his arms. "I am your friend and pupil, Carl Schurz. Let us embrace each other once more on German soil, and then away for England!"

Kinkel could not reply, but burst into tears. In a few moments more they were in the boat, and rowing lustily toward the vessel in the offing, which had now hoisted the German Republican flag, in token of recognition and welcome. As they reached the ship's side, Kinkel, pale and trembling, leaned upon Schurz' shoulder, and murmured, "My wife, my children—where are they?"

He had time to say no more, for in another moment, Mme. Kinkel was in her husband's arms, and his children were clinging about his knees.

"My mission is accomplished," said young Schurz. "I had sworn, dear master, to restore you to liberty and to your family. My duty is done."

Upon their arrival in London, the patriots were received with transports of enthusiasm. The rich German residents of the British metropolis took upon themselves to provide for the brave young fellows who, in the disguise of Prussian dragoons, had aided Schurz in successfully carrying out his noble project, and Professor Kinkel himself commenced giving lectures on German literature, which met with immense success. Carl Schurz soon afterward parted from his old preceptor, and set out to seek his fortune in the promised land across the broad Atlantic. His career in the United States is well known. He had left in Germany an aged father, who longed to see again his favorite son; but it is not easy for a man to visit a country where certain death awaits him if detected. Still, fortune smiled on Schurz. Risen high in favor with President Lincoln, the German-American General was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Madrid, and 15 years after his flight with Kinkel, he quietly revisited his birthplace. No Prussian gen-d'arme dared to lay a finger upon the condemned felon, now a diplomatic representative of one of the most powerful nations on the globe.

THE CARNIVAL IN MONTEVIDEO.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Herald has been roaming through South America and taking notes, and thus records what he saw in Montevideo. In many Catholic countries the carnival (which immediately precedes the season of Lent) is the grand festive season of the year, and great license is tolerated, as if to compensate, in some measure, for the austerities pertaining to the six weeks' fast the church imposes:

"Last night, or this morning rather, closed the feast of carnival. The opera, the theatre, the circus, the concert-hall, the arena, the cockpit, and every other sort and place of public amusement conceivable, were all in full blast during the carnival, and balls and masquerades, public and private, were very numerous.

"At this season a heavy business is done in perfumeries, Cologne, Florida, and other scented waters being spirted around with perfect recklessness. Everybody is armed with a small vial of tinfoil, much resembling the tubes in which an artist purchases his paints. These are filled with such waters. A small opening at the top ejects, in answer to a little pressure, a fine stream, which is aimed at the passers-by, usually of the opposite sex. As the weeks of carnival wear on, these sprinkling machines gradually increase in size and power, until the fourth day before the close, when large gutta-percha bottles, each holding about a pint, and having an ivory nozzle of proportionate size, are most in vogue. Every conceivable contrivance is resorted to for ducking everybody, and this ducking is a truly democratic affair. All are on a level here, except those at the upper story windows and on the housetops, from which heights every passer-by is doused. Pails and tubs are brought into requisition to keep up the supply. Immense waterproof paper-bags, strongly made, holding about two quarts each, are filled as required, and so thrown as to burst on the head, against the back, or at the feet of the pedestrians, making a report not unlike a mountain howitzer, and drenching completely the unfortunate victims. The meat is blown out of egg-shells, the shells filled with water, the ends closed up with tallow, and these are thrown by thousands everywhere, by everybody, and at everybody. Bruised limbs, bloody noses, and black eyes are given and taken as good jokes and matters of course. Men go along the streets having boys or servants following with boxes of these watered eggs, which are thrown numerously and furiously into every window, from which bevies of beauties challenge to combat by throwing bags of water or like water-eggs. The whole city is given up to this from 12 o'clock each day until sunset, and the limits of the water frolic are marked by the firing of guns for the purpose by the authorities. One has his choice these three days—either to keep hidden, if he can, or don his worn-out duds, sally forth, and pitch in. What a providential thing that it rained last week! There had not been a drop of rain for three months, and fresh water was selling throughout the city for 16 cents a pail, or two cents a quart.

"The people seem really to wake up once a year—in carnival season. Few people in the world have more beautiful young ladies than are found on the banks of the Rio de la Plata; their figures, dress, gait, hair and eyes being their strong points. Their eyes are usually described as 'stunning,' and it must be confessed they have much of the electric fire. But to see them sparkle and dazzle with their greatest brilliancy, you must see them in carnival time.

"In some Spanish countries, especially the Island of Cuba, this season is embraced by doth men and women for less innocent purposes. Where rivals meet, who are jealous of each other, aqua fortis, aqua regia, green and blue vitriols, sulphuric acid, etc., are sometimes substituted for these innocent perfumed waters, and spirted upon the face of the rival to destroy beauty. Sometimes others are hired to do this devilish work, so as to conceal both motive and actor; and where a man or woman is so spirted upon a score or two of times within a few minutes, it is, of course, difficult to identify the foe."

FEMININE LIFE IN AFRICA.

TAKEN generally, woman has no ill time of it in the districts of interior Africa which Dr. Livingstone's party traversed, though, if she and the village to which she belongs, happens to be captured by slave-dealers, she suffers, besides the common misery, the humiliation of being estimated as less valuable than her fellow captive, man, by a yard of cotton cloth. Four yards are given for a male; the market price of a woman is three. In their free homes Dinah is mistress, and master, too. At Killimanjaro, the women are the traders, and will not admit a man to make sales in the market-place. In some districts, where the husband is permitted to sell, he is only the good lady's factor. We found one who, having sold a goat without referring to his wife, was soundly rated by the business-like woman, who felt herself insulted. "Do you think you are unmarried?" asked the irate lady; "why, what sort of a man are you?" These strong-minded women are not Penelopes. Husbands too long absent at the chase or in war, are sometimes too hastily pronounced dead, and their dignities given to a successor. Polygamous husbands, of course, are the most respected, for they are the richest in cattle, and can not only support the greatest number of wives, but the oldest and richest of such wooers obtain the youngest and prettiest for wives. A smart, honest lover, with one cow, has little chance of winning the dusky young girl of his affections. When he counts his head of cattle by thousands, he can procure more young wives than he wants. These ladies do not comprehend how England can be happy and powerful, seeing that no man can keep more than one wife, which to them has a mean and shabby aspect. Notwithstanding all this, there are true hearts beneath some of these dark and homely bosoms. We read of one girl who, rather than marry as her chief would have her, and her inclinations would not, slew herself, and escaped what to her was degradation.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

ONE ought to have dates at one's fingers ends, seeing they grow upon the palm.

THE gentleman whose lips pressed a lady's "snowy brow," did not catch cold.

"So far, so good," as the boy said when he finished the first pot of his mother's jam.

SEEING a cellar nearly finished, a waggish fellow remarked that it was an excellent foundation for a story.

"WHO is that with Miss Flint?" said a wag to his companion. "Oh, that is a spark which she has struck."

GENTLEMEN who smoke allege that it makes them calm and complacent. They tell us that the more they fume the less they fret.

A DOCTOR detained in court as a witness, complained to the judge that if he was kept from his patients they might recover in his absence.

"DOES my son William, that's a soldier in the army, get plenty to eat?" asked an old lady of a recruiting sergeant, the other day.

"He sees plenty," was the laconic reply.

"Bless his heart, then, I know he'll have it if he can see it; he always would at home."

A WRITER says that "fathers, remembering their own boyhood, should make some little allowance for their children. But the trouble is that many of our children, after spending their "allowance," go in debt for double the amount.

AN Irishman being asked whether he did not frequently converse with a friend in Irish, replied:

"No, indeed; Jemmy often speaks to me in Irish, but I always answer him in English."

"Why so?"

"Because, you see, I don't want Jemmy to know that I understand Irish."

"JOHN, I saw your cousin Isaac a few weeks ago, and he has just received a fall, which cut a most horrible gash in his arm."

"Ah, poor fellow; what did he fall on?"

"Well, really, I forget now; but it rather strikes me he fell on Tuesday morning."

"JACK," said a father, "yesterday I forbade you associating with the neighboring children any more, and to-day you have disobeyed me. The next time I catch you there, I shall be obliged to punish you." The next day Jack was there again, totally oblivious of the interdiction, until he saw his father entering the neighbor's yard with a rod in his hand. Jack made for the fence, over which he leaped, pursued by his father, and ran into the barn; there he was caught.

"Now, my son," said the irritated father, "what did I tell you I would do yesterday?"

"You told me, father, that if you caught me there again, you would punish me."

"Well?" said the father.

"Hold on, father!" said the little reprobate, who knew that if he could make his father laugh, the matter would be all right: "you didn't catch me there,—you caught me here!"

The desired effect was produced, and the rod was dropped; but the interdiction was renewed.

BEFORE a Court of Common Pleas, a case of breach of promise was recently under consideration. The breach between the parties was apparent enough, but as to the promise, there existed a slight shade of doubt, until the plaintiff set the matter right, as follows:

Question by the defendant's counsel—"Did my client enter into a positive agreement to marry you?"

Answer—"Not exactly, but he courted me a good deal, and he telled my sister Jane that he intended to marry in our family."

"MAMMA," said a little fellow, whose mother had forbidden him to draw horses and ships on the mahogany sideboard with a sharp nail—"mamma, this ain't a nice house. At Sam Rackett's we can cut the sofa and pull out the hair, and ride the shovel and tongs over the carpet; but here we can't get any fun at all."

A PUBLICAN blowing the froth from a pot of porter which he was bringing to a customer, the gentleman struck him. Boniface eagerly asked why he struck him? "Why," replied the gentleman, "I only returned blow for blow."

AN instance of the ruling passion strong in death, is thus related of old Cook, who was known as a miser, and had amassed a large fortune. On his death-bed, when the gasp was approaching, a tallow candle was burning upon the stand, a flickering flame in the fire-place. Suddenly he called to his son, saying:

"Woodbury, come here."

The son approached his bedside, when the old man whispered—

"Woodbury, blow out that candle; tallow's most as dear as butter."

A MILLINER'S CARD.

When lovely woman longs to marry,
 And snatch a victim from the beaux,
What charm the soft design will carry?
 What art will make the men propose?
The only art her schemes to cover,
 To give her wishes sure success,
To gain, to fix a captive lover,
 And "wring his bosom," is—to dress.

"IS YOUR horse gentle, Mr. Dabster?"

"Perfectly gentle, sir; the only fault he has got (if that be a fault), is a playful habit of extending his hinder hoofs now and then."

"By extending his hinder hoofs you don't mean kicking, I hope?"

"Some people call it kicking, Mr. Green; but it's only a slight reaction of the muscles; a disease rather than a vice."

AN inquisitive caulker wants to know if we shall have any more pitched battles at sea, when they have covered up all our ships with iron plates? O come (oakum) Mr. Caulker, it seams, is dished! Tah!

WHAT living creature has a beard without a chin? An oyster.

A QUAKER'S ADVICE.—Don't scold a woman least she scold better than thee.

WHEN is the weather most like a crockery shop? When it is muggy. (Oh!)

ARE the minutes relating to an affair of honor always drawn up by the seconds?

OFTENTIMES a girl says "No" to an offer, when it is as plain as the nose on her face that she means "Yes." The best way to judge whether she is in earnest or not, is to look straight into her eyes, and never mind her nose.

GROUND RENTS.—The effects of an earthquake.

A SPIRITUAL INQUIRY.—Is it likely that ghosts talk in the dead languages?

COUSINS' TALK.—"No, Amy, you're quite wrong. I never was refused in all my life."

"Oh, Tom, how can you say so? Why, there was Louie Simpson ——"

"I tell you again, you're wrong, completely wrong. It's true I was 'declined with thanks' once, but I never was refused."

TRUEFITT, the fashionable hairdresser, upon being asked what hair was the richest, replied quite in an off-hand manner, "The plain golden, sir; in every sense, sir, there's none so rich as the plain golden." His inquirer nodded assent, and said, "Perhaps you're right, Truefitt. It stands to reason, you know, that hair which is plain gold, must be richer than any hair which is simply plaited." Truefitt acquiesced, but was evidently puzzled with the abstruseness of the proposition. He retired into his studio to ponder over it.

MAGEE'S NEW PATENT ELEVATED DOUBLE OVEN RANGE is a decided improvement upon all that we have seen. It is very easily managed and regulated, and burns less fuel than the general run of stoves; it has also double the surface for cooking, having six boiling places. It has also this great advantage, that hot air fixtures can be applied for heating rooms above. ALEX. M. LESLEY, 605 Sixth Avenue and 1,310 Broadway, N. Y., is the Agent.

The People have been so much imposed upon by several worthless Sarsaparillas, that we are glad to be able to recommend a preparation which can be depended on as containing the virtues of that invaluable medicine, and is worthy of the public confidence. Dr. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA cures when anything can cure the diseases that require an alterative medicine.

FASHIONS FOR 1866

The Latest Novelty.

The Great National Fair.

The lady directors of the NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHANS' HOME, will commence to hold a FESTIVAL FAIR in the City of Washington, on the 15th of MAY next, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the support and maintenance of the Orphans of National Soldiers and Sailors not otherwise provided for in their respective States and Territories.

The ladies invite all who can to contribute toward representing their State by a table at the Fair.

The charity is a noble and deserving one, and it is hoped that each State and Territory will be liberally represented.

All contributions should be addressed—"NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME, Washington, D. C.," and forwarded, if possible, 10 days before the opening of the Fair.

The Institution will be opened for the reception of children on the 1st of June next, and applications for admission may be forwarded immediately. tf

The Peruvian Victory.

THE war between Spain and the allied South American republics has taken proportions little anticipated by the former when she sent her fleets against Peru and Chile, and it promises to result in a serious weakening of her power, as it already has in her defeat and humiliation. Up to this time she has not gained a single political advantage or material trophy. On the contrary, she has lost the Covadonga, by capture, and her fleet has sustained two repulses in the waters of Chilco. She has lost what little respect the world entertained for her—small, indeed, but her all—by a cruel and cowardly bombardment of an undefended city. And now she has suffered the disgrace of defeat, in a contest of her own provoking, at the hands of Peru, in the harbor of Callao. The particulars of that contest, so glorious for Peru, will be found in another column, together with an accurate illustration of the event.

The consequences of this defeat promise to be serious. To carry on even a small war, as that between Spain and the allied republics, at so great a distance, from home and supplies, and without a single friendly or even neutral port within thousands of miles, would be no easy task for a strong and solvent power. How much more difficult, then, for a relatively weak and utterly bankrupt State like Spain? She has sent the flower of her fleet to the Pacific, where she has no depot of supplies, no harbor for refuge or repair, and where the whole coast bristles with foes, from the Isthmus to Cape Horn. Her enemies can afford to laugh at any attempt at landing, and the permanent occupation of any portion of their territories is impossible. With the exception of Valparaiso, Callao and Guayaquil, there is not a single port worth the shot to destroy it. The allied fleet will not fight, naturally enough, except at an advantage, or until it receives the powerful reinforcements which are on the way to join it. After such junction, the advantage of superiority would probably be with the allies. To blockade four thousand miles of coast is hopeless.

In view of these difficulties and dangers, we can quite conceive that the report reaching us from Madrid is true, and the recent operations of the Spanish fleet confirm it. This report is to the effect that the Spanish Government, satisfied of its inability to compel the submission of the allied States, and conscious of its financial weakness, long since determined to visit on each of these States some signal act of vengeance and then withdraw from the contest, before its naval superiority in the Pacific should be endangered. It proposed to attack Valparaiso, the metropolitan port of Chile; next, Callao, the principal port of Peru; then Guayaquil, the ever important port of Ecuador, and finally burn the squalid little port of Cobija, the only one which is possessed by Bolivia. We know how the first part of this spiteful plan was carried out, and the Spanish name is welcome to all the lustre it has gained from the transaction. The second part has been attempted, and with such ill success as will probably prevent the realization of the entire scheme. If our information be correct, which there is no reason to doubt, the Spanish squadron, reinforced so as to reach 275 guns, was so much crippled as to make impossible the completion of the programme. Two of the ships, the Villa de Madrid, the largest frigate in the world, carrying 56 guns, and the Berenguela, of 36 guns, were thoroughly disabled. As there is no port to which they can go for repairs, it may be assumed that the effective force of the squadron is reduced by 92 guns, or quite one-third. In such case, although possessing one iron-clad, it will evidently be no match for the allied Chilean and Peruvian squadron, which, by this time certainly, has been augmented by two new and heavily armed iron-clads, the Huascar and Independencia.

The victory of the Peruvians in Callao may, therefore, result in the complete annihilation of the Spanish fleet, which, as we have said, constitutes the flower of its navy. This effected, it may be safely assumed that the allies will not be slow to take the offensive, and it is quite possible that Spain may ultimately be astounded by the apparition of a formidable hostile fleet on the coast of Cuba—especially if, as is almost certain, New Granada and Venezuela join the alliance, offensive and defensive, which now exists between Peru, Chile, Bolivia and Ecuador. There is a Nemesis in all evil deeds, and the conspiracy against republicanism in America may so react as to destroy utterly the conspirators. The independence of Cuba is not only a possible but a probable result of this remote South American war, which cannot fail, also, to react favorably for the Liberal cause in Mexico.

Under every view, the Peruvian victory is invested with interest and importance—not alone as it may give lustre to Peru, but in its ultimate results on this continent and in Europe. O'Donnell holds his position by an uncertain tenure, and the Bourbons are not the choice of the people of Spain, among whom there is a strong republican party, which such events as are occurring in the Pacific may suddenly place in power—a result, too, likely to be favored by the political complications of the Continent.

Incorruptibility of Marshals.

As we read the reports of Rynders vs. Burton in the daily papers, the memories of the palmy days of Democracy in New York crowded upon us. The glories of the old wigwam revived, and the long lists of the worthy Sachems who did their country, their party and themselves such lasting good, rose before us. Chief among them, the leader of their politest assemblies, and hero of their love-feasts, was the individual whose name figures most prominently in the above case—his name, but apparently not his pecuniary interests. For aught that appears in the report, this bright exemplar of all Democratic virtues might have gone to the happy hunting-grounds of his fathers, leaving us to deplore his loss, if not to follow his footsteps. But we find, after diligent inquiry, that he is still among us, and as we are not yet called on to write his epitaph, he has furnished us with the latest illustrations of the virtues which are to adorn his tomb.

Far be it from us to deny to the ex-United States Marshal the merit of zeal in his late office. We can all remember the humanity with which unfortunate negroes, unable to appreciate the delights of perpetual bondage and escaping from their happy homes, were conducted by him back to the tender mercies of their masters; and also the energy, tempered with courtesy, with which he ushered himself on the platforms of public meetings, to check by his mild persuasions the too exuberant expressions of opinions which it was then the fashion of his party to oppose.

Stripped of legal verbiage, the case lately tried before the Court of Common Pleas is this: The late Mr. Burton was desirous of disposing of his theatre in Chambers street to the United States Government, by either leasing or selling it, to be used as courts or offices for United States Marshals or for other official purposes. How Mr. Isaiah Rynders, then holding the position of United States Marshal, came to be the medium through which Mr. Burton's wishes were made known to the Government does not clearly appear; but it is certain that about this time two promissory notes for $2,000 each were drawn by Mr. Burton in favor of Mrs. Rynders, and it was for non-payment of these notes that the exec[utors] of the late Mr. Burton were sued. Th[e d]efendants alleged that these notes were given as consideration for services rendered, or to be rendered by Isaiah Rynders, in procuring the leasing or purchase of Mr. Burton's building by the United States Government, and in support of their defense, they produced a contract, whereby it was stipulated that if the theatre building were purchased by the Government within three years for $215,000, Isaiah should receive $15,000, on his canceling the two notes, and crediting this unique account, $5,000, making his total perquisite in the transaction $10,000. Whether this part of the contract was performed does not appear, but the holder of the notes claims that they were given for money loaned, and that the meaning of the contract was, that if the property was sold as stated, Mr. Burton would then be able to pay the notes immediately, which, no doubt, he would, and the only wonder is, that the executors should ever have placed any other construction on it. The jury decided, on the evidence, that the notes were given for money loaned, and, under instructions from the Court that the subsequent contract, although immoral and illegal, did not affect the right of recovering payment, they gave a verdict for the holder for $5,101.62.

Of the dead it is becoming to speak well, and in an age when compounding felonies is common, Mr. Burton may have thought that he was doing no immoral act in agreeing to pay the moderate commission of five per cent. for the lease or sale of his property; and it was only his misfortune if the receiver happened to be already an official of the Government, and was precluded by his oath of office from being also a real estate broker. Besides, the compensation was moderate—and we have already described modesty and moderation as characteristics of the ex-Marshal. But the claim that the notes, maturing some years after date (principal and interest curiously amounting to even sums), were given for money loaned, being supported by the verdict of the jury, it follows that the stipulations of the contract have not been fulfilled; and although the United States Government has leased the theatre building, the reward to the ex-Marshal, for exerting his influence to procure this has not been paid. Surely the laborer is worthy of his hire. Can it be that the innate modesty of Mr. Rynders, or some new-born sense of propriety, prevents his claiming it from the executors? We can easily understand why these gentlemen should refrain from tendering the amount of this claim on the estate to its deserving recipient; but why is it not as boldly demanded as it was deliberately concocted?

To "kill two birds with one stone" is commonly said to be a good shot, and by making his wife a present of these two notes—for it is in her name the suit is brought—Mr. Rynders displays at once the tenderness of his domestic affections and the incorruptibility of his public virtue. The world is called upon from time to time to admire the workings of conscience in cases of restitution to the public treasury of sums of money of which it had been defrauded; and if it were the misfortune of the position of an United States Marshal that the trickling of such streams of money toward his private treasury, though only the natural perquisites of his office, might excite a base suspicion of his integrity, he disarms such hostile criticism by passing them over to the partner of his domestic joys.

Mr. Rynders has, as we before stated, in his time rendered his employers some good service, and the crowning glory of his career ought to be in this public vindication of his honor and honesty; and if we congratulate him on his success, it is with the hope that this is not the last of his illustrations of Democratic administrations.

Mr. Gladstone, in his recent speech in the British Parliament, on the future of England and the United States, is reported to have said:

"There is another country not only as rich in mineral wealth as ourselves, but with a coal surface 37 times greater than the coal surface of this country. I allude to the United States of America, and though most of the coal there contains so large an amount of anthracite that it is not fit for steam or for smelting purposes, yet to domestic purposes it is capable of being adapted."

Mr. Gladstone clearly does not know that our navy uses anthracite coal, and that our steamers can make longer trips without coaling than those of England. Has he never heard that our steamers emit no smoke, because they burn anthracite coal, and, but for this, blockade-running would have been ten times more successful than it was during the war? Could England have furnished to the rebels anthracite coal to make steam for the steamers she built for them, the war would, perhaps, have been much prolonged. If Mr. Gladstone will visit New England, he will find that nearly every spindle of her factories is driven by steam generated by anthracite coal, and when he rides on railroads located within 200 or 300 miles of anthracite coal-fields, he will be drawn by a locomotive fed by anthracite coal. So much for "steam purposes." The same is substantially true as regards smelting. Anthracite is extensively used for this purpose, and produces a superior iron.

The following anecdote is told of Victor Hugo: An artist of Paris having lately finished an etching after Gericault's picture of the head of a supplicié (a legally murdered man), sent a proof with a request that he would give an appropriate line to be engraved beneath it. Hugo replied: "Since you ask a line from me, inscribe beneath your beautiful engraving these closing words of my 'Claude Gueux,' 'This head of a man of the masses, enlighten it, educate it, moralize it—you will not need to cut it off.'"

There were 84 deaths by lightning in France in 1864, of which 64 were masculine victims, and only 26 of the better sex. Striking and curious. In 1863, the number was 103. The average yearly deaths for the last past 30 years have been 81. The number of persons more or less hurt by lightning-strokes is represented as four times greater than the killed. It appears that these numbers, both for killed and injured, is proportionally less for the whole population in France than in Sweden, Saxony and Prussia. The Prussian proportion is more than two-thirds greater than the French. What seems to make this fact the more remarkable is, that the French departmental statistics in the case show that the hilly and mountainous departments furnish the greatest number of victims.

A Mr. Curling, who has been for 17 years agent on the Devon estate in Ireland, makes the following statement apropos of the question, "Is animal food necessary?" He says: "There are 6,680 persons on the estate. They are energetic, moral and well-behaved. I do not remember a crime in 17 years, not even so much as stealing a chicken. They are a contented, grateful people—grateful even for fair play. Out of 600 farmers, deduct 50, and the rest do not see a wheaten loaf, or smell meat, except at Christmas and Easter. They have been brought up to this custom. One tenant on the Devon estate I have seen sit down to potatoes, buttermilk and Indian meal, who purchased at a recent sale £10,000 worth of property, and did not have to borrow a shilling to pay for it. I believe this to be the usual mode of living in Limerick."

Our Government, we are told, having received information that the French Government is not carrying out their agreement in regard to the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico, but have dispatched additional troops since the Emperor's letter, giving his adhesion to their gradual withdrawal, has notified him that we expect a strict observance of said understanding, and that no more French troops must be dispatched to that country.

A correspondent of the daily Times writing from the City of Mexico, April 29, informs us that "It makes little difference on which side the correspondent in Mexico leans—whether he be eager to tell of imperial victories or republican successes—unless he willfully perverts the truth, he can but acknowledge that, as far as territory and order are concerned, the empire is steadily passing from a government of disfavor to an object of pity."

Some of the Italian journals state that after a ball lately given to the King of Italy by the city of Milan, he said to the members of the municipality: "Gentlemen, you have given me a ball at Milan; next year I will return the compliment by giving you a supper at Venice."

One of the organs of the Methodist Episcopal Church gives us the returns of the membership of that church for quadrennial periods, since 1784, as follows:

1784	18,000	1828	421,156
1792	65,980	1832	548,593
1796	56,664	1836	650,103
1800	64,894	1840	852,918
1804	113,134	1844	1,171,356
1808	151,995	1848	636,066
1812	195,357	1852	728,700
1816	214,235	1856	800,327
1820	256,881	1860	994,447
1824	328,523	1864	728,320

The great apparent falling off from 1844 to 1848 is accounted for by the division of the church North and South in that period.

Though the size of material particles cannot be presumed, it is easy enough to separate some substances to the last degree of fineness. A drop of water containing one-millionth of a grain of indigo turns a blue color; the bulk of this particle, even if it were all in one mass in the drop, which it is not, would be only one five-hundred billionth of a cubic inch. The separation of silver in sea-water is still more remarkable, for one hundred million parts of liquid contain only one part of the metal, and though this cannot be seen, its presence can be proved by chemical tests. And yet this is not the last degree of division, for the gold in gilt wire is so thin that a grain of the metal may be divided into ninety-five thousand million visible parts; that is to say visible under a microscope.

"Admiral" Semmes, as he is called in "Dixie," the notorious commander of the pirate ship Alabama, was unanimously elected Judge of Probate in Mobile, on the 7th of May. An order from the General commanding the department forbids him from entering on the duties of the office.

The whole number of snow-storms in Boston during the past 23 years is 667; depth of snow during the same period, 94 feet 10½ inches. The average number of snow-storms during the same period (23 years), 29; and the average depth of snow is a fraction over four feet and two inches.

The Memphis Avalanche, referring to the recent riot in that city and the general want of order, says:

"We have heard many ex-soldiers of the South declare that they would prefer a military administration of municipal authority to that which disgraces the City and State, and by its utter incapacity, gross mismanagement and the prejudices of its agents, has brought upon Memphis lasting evils. The true remedy for all misfortunes, now contemplated, consists in the reformation of the city charter."

According to Mr. Gladstone, Prussia owes $215,000,000; Holland, $425,000,000; Russia, $1,385,000,000; Austria, $1,580,000,000; France, $2,000,000,000; Italy, $760,000,000; Portugal, $165,000,000; Turkey, $255,000,000. From the latest census, Prussia has 18,500,000 people; Holland, 3,500,000; Russia, 59,250,000; Austria, 35,000,000; France, 37,333,000; Italy, 21,750,000; Portugal, 3,666,000; Turkey, 2,500,000. That is to say, the Prussians owe nearly $12 per head; the Hollanders, $121 per head; the Russians, over $23; the Austrians, over $45; the French, over $53; the Italians, about $34; the Portuguese, nearly $40; and the Turks, $115 per head of the entire population. The English owe $125 per head, and we owe about $100.

TOWN GOSSIP.

And so the Academy of Music is no more! St. Cecelia has been carried off, like a second Elijah, in a chariot of fire to the realms above. The dead echoes of Grisi, Mario, Gazzaniga, Brignoli, Bosio, and the seraphic hosts have passed through the purifying process of flame. "The Catacombs," of the facetious ogre of the Herald, the fidus Achates of the "good, gracious Max," after becoming as warm as purgatory, have ascended to the seventh heaven of Urania. As we illustrate this lamentable event on another page, we shall content ourself here by saying that we most sympathize with the musical critics. When oysters were cheap they were called the Bivalve Brigade, but since the invention of greenbacks, oysters have declined, and green seal and canvas-back duck, with green turtle, have ruled the gold pens of the musical and theatrical Solons. There is something very remarkable in this select band, which tells the ignorant public who are and who are not great actors, actresses, singers, pianists, etc., etc. They are composed of two classes—feeble and febrile dandies and the raw and gushing neophytes. They have a traditionary vocabulary of slang terms; we will, in humble imitation of the glossary of Mariner's "Tonga Islands," give a few of them: If a man performs the chief part in a play, they call it the "title rôle." It is amusing to observe how one of these "inspired men" will splurge upon a newly-found term. Another favorite word is "rendition." Then these semi-inspired demigods take a Havre steamer, and rush off to la belle France. If they like the manner in which the hero of the paint-pot has daubed his canvas, and made a pig look like an elephant, or six feet of green like a meadow, they call it "mise en scene." We will not dilate upon their rhapsodies over the Irish Italian of vocal nomenclature, for since two out of three of these erudite critics confound the mezzo-soprani with mezzotinto, and basso-profundo with basso-relievo, we leave them to obfuscate an enlightened and gullable public, meekly contenting ourself by observing that, although the Academy of Music is burnt down, there is still the other and more congenial catacombs of Pfaff's left, where the more understandable condiments of Limberger kaese, Welsh-rarebit, lager and half-and-half supply the place of Donizetti, Mozart, Bellini, Verdi and Meyerbeer to these not frozen-out gardeners, but burnt-out critics.

We are glad to find that the new act for the prevention of cruelty to animals is producing the most beneficial results. A man now thinks twice before he beats his wife; and, wonder of wonders, there is a chance of even compelling those irresponsible monsters, the managers of the railroads from ill-using the cattle which draw the cars for the cattle which ride in their miserable vehicles. We have no wish to be alarmists, but we are convinced that if that terrible but well-invited and well-deserved scourge and guest, the Cholera, ever comes here, it will be in consequence of the joint importunities of the tenement-houses and those still more disgracefully over-crowded tenements, the railroad cars—which, as conducted now, are sarcasms upon the forbearance of that soulless epicene, the public of New York. Indeed, the meekness with which we put up with the grossest frauds is something wonderful, and makes us doubt whether we are not Chinese instead of Anglo-Norman Americans. The ferries of Hoboken and Williamsburg are really facetiously bad—more especially the former. There is more regard paid to the calves and pigs in London and Paris than there is to corresponding animals of the human species in Hoboken. There is a lively mixture of octogenarian imbecility and brutal indifference in its management, which is rapidly making a visit to one of the sweetest spots around New York akin to what running a muck was in the days of the Mohawks.

Belligerency has now reached the churches, and owing to the "evil doers," it is a moot question whether the congregation meet for fighting or prayers, and whether Bibles are as liberally thrown at one another's head as texts used to be in the days of Luther and Calvin. If, however, other congregations acted with the same spirit that was displayed lately in one of the churches, where the brawlers were driven out, an end would be put to the career of these ecclesiastical rowdies, who, if they cannot rule, wish to ruin.

The news from Europe is received with much more placidity than could have been expected; but the days are past when we were part of a circumference whose centre was London. The great rebellion has trained us; the growing youth has become the giant, both financially and politically. The gristle of 1860 has become the bone of 1866. We have just outgrown our provincialism, and now really are, what we have long been called, the New World. We have, in fact, thrown off two slaveries at once. Let us be thankful that 3,000 miles of ocean breezes separate us from the leprosy of European decrepitude. The commercial selfishness of England, for once, is likely to be beneficial to mankind. She now loves monopoly better than balance of power or divine right; but, for all that, her prudence is fatal to her prestige, and may inaugurate a saturnalia in which many of the thrones, principalities and powers will disappear.

The theatrical world deserves only a word, and a very short one at that. Niblo's, where the spectators are so highly packed that they resemble more the teeth in a harmonium than those human beings conspicuously absent, and which seems to require a good deal to dislocate you from your position, or make you leave the inspiring music of the orchestra. The new piece has been devoted to Dulcie's [illegible] and is most admirable and graceful performance. The Misses Sisters have been equally successful at Wood's little theatre. While that dreary really, Sing-Sing drama, "Never Too Late to Mend," has drawn large audiences at Wallack's. The purely musical Monken has closed his peculiar equestrianism at the Broadway, much to the regret of Broadway and all silvery-headed men, who delight in symmetry. The great feature just now is Carlotta de Bay, the most wonderful leap through the drum we illustrate on another page. Said lively bantling, the De Bays, has gravely declare her to be half-sister to Queen Elizabeth, on the ground that Carlotta is a woman, and "good Queen Bess is a Tudor." Barnum's, as usual, is the favorite resort of all who love to combine instruction with amusement.

The leverets of sports, notwithstanding the destruction of the Academy, had a fine treat at the new French Theatre, which opened, on Monday night. The performers troupe, under the direction of Mr. Richfeey, rendered the comedy of "Doctor of Alcantara" in a most pleasing manner. Miss Richings, Miss Harris-son and Miss Bennett appearing in their various parts and sustaining themselves finely. Messrs. Castle, Campbell and Meeker received with decision at their first phase. Altogether the effort was a decided success, and we congratulate the lovers of classic music on the opportunity of rational enjoyment.

The lovers of letters have had their attention excited by an exceedingly interesting match for the championship between Mr. John Dewey, of Troy, and Joseph Dion, of Montreal. Dewy is well-known as a practical and easy writer, who, in several years past, has gained the reputation of an accomplished knight of the pen. He is more familiar to the public as the keenest great skill, which on this occasion made him the winner. Dion, on the contrary, is known to the public leaders by 134 points, though he made some larger scores than his conclusion.

BOOK NOTICES.

LOSSING'S CIVIL WAR IN AMERICA. G. W. Childs, Philadelphia, Publisher. The first volume of this work has just been issued, and embraces a period from the Union Convention to the end of the first Bull Run. In many respects this will form the most interesting and valuable history of the war. Mr. Lossing has brought all his well-known patient research, accurate observation, careful analysis and earnest spirit to bear in collecting and arranging the material for his work, while at the same time he is simple, graceful, manner, that coarse and enchants the reader. Mr. Lossing has brought to the many incidents and events connected with the rebellion and its progress that are not generally known, and that disclose many freely the malevolent spirit that inaugurated the contest, while there is nothing in any regard to partisan feeling to bring into proper prominence every person and event connected with it, thus rendering the work in time as a record and admirable as a history. The illustrations are numerous and well executed, and the photographical character of the book corresponds with its general excellence. It will be completed in four volumes, and as it is published by subscription, those who desire to possess it will do well to forward their orders at an early day.

PERUVIAN MAIZE.

Something for Farmers.

In the June number of the American Agriculturalist there is an article from Mr. E. G. Squier, the Peruvian traveller, on a very remarkable and valuable kind of maize, or Indian corn, which he found on the head-waters of the Amazon, in Peru, and which he has endeavored to introduce in this country, but which could not fail to be a real boon. We reproduce the article entire for the benefit of our agricultural readers:

I have made some effort, necessarily in a small way, to introduce into the United States some varieties of what I regard as the first in value of all the grains of the world, and which I found growing, in great luxuriance, in the valley of the Huallaga, or Huallaga River of Peru, about 16 miles to the westward of the city of Cuzco, the capital of the Inca Empire. This valley, Cumayo, which, lower down, takes the name of Urayal, is the true source of the Amazon, its valley is rich throughout, often no more than a mile cabin, but in others having by high and sometimes precipitous banks; there, there are sections where it wide-as out to the width of three or four miles, or a mile to a mile, affording room for cultivation, which is often much extended by an elaborate system of terracing up the hills and mountains to great heights. The particular intervale to which I refer is a comparatively level one for 15 miles, where they had a palace and extensive "hanging gardens," which are nearly as perfect to-day as when first built. The place then, as now, was called Tunay, and was celebrated in the yaravies or songs as the "Seat of Delights."

The mountains skirting in the charming vale of Tunay are of a shining, slaty limestone, and they are nearly destitute of soil, and irrigated through deepest, dating from the time of the Incas. The principal crop of maize in the valley is white, of which there are three varieties, white yellow and black, the latter being The white (Fig. 3) is the largest in grain and cost valued; the yellow (Fig. 2) is smallest, more compact and the baby hardier; while the black (Fig. 2) is sweetest, and most in demand for fermented drinks. Each of these give herewith accurate drawings of average kernels of three kinds.

The maize blanco, or white variety, is that which most impressed me. The ear is rather short and thick, the cob small, and the stem and interstices with kernels leaves than our varieties of maize throw out, and the roots start out in rings, two inches or more apart, the height of from 12 to 20 inches from the top roll. It ripens, therefore, a deep soil, and is planted in deep mold. The native plant it in rows, in rather deep furrows, and plow between the rows twice in the season. The number and group of the roots give the stalk, as I have said, an appearance of vigor and strength which I have seen nowhere else. Each stalk sends out from six to eight, and often more ears. The kernels are large, prolific, and are excellently farinaceous, so sweet and pleasant to the taste as to be rather agreeable than not when eaten raw, and absolutely delicious when boiled or made into cakes. In the most of these it is as much delicate as that of wheat.

The weight of Mays is about 10,000 feet above the sea, and produces wheat and barley. The peach and apple grow in it, and the red and black cherry is indigenous. There is one small, in our sense of the word; but there is the tuny, cold season, which pretty much suppresses vegetation, and gives the fields the aspect of early December. Regarding these circumstances, I thought it not impossible that this maize, as well as the yellow and black, might be acclimated in some parts of our own country, and I accordingly brought home some ears, and last spring distributed them as seeds, in small quantities, widely. I have not heard the result in all cases. Some planted in light soil, rather late in the season for the ordinary way, in Schenectady county, in this State, grew to the height of 14 feet, matured, but only sent out rudimentary ears, and were much afflicted with the smut. Others sent out their root rings for a foot or more above the kernels. Some planted in Virginia, and in Westchester county, also rather late, have grown vigorously to the height of from 10 to 12 feet, developed a few ears, but these small, but few kernels, and was cut off by the frost. Altogether, the experiments have been unsatisfactory, but sufficient to leading to the conclusion that our season is not long enough to enable it to ripen. Dr. Seiss Rehlman, who planted a few grains, says: "It grew immense stalks, without ears. I suppose that it would not get out every year it would be very valuable here for fodder." A list of grains, from Peru, which I sent to Dr. Seiss Oelpihs, but would succeed in South Carolina. Some have also been planted in Florida and Texas, but the soil is in each with air roots three feet above the ground. The seeds sown in Washington, by Mr. Wilson, Mr. Bayard Taylor, on his farm, not far from Lancaster, Pa., "grew splendidly."

"My Dear Sir—These are the facts of my experiment with the Peruvian maize: The grain was sown in a small pole, about the middle of April, and set in a hotbed. There were fifteen plants. They were planted in four or five inches high, they were planted in the open ground. The growth of the plants was very rapid indeed, and they attained the height of 12 to 15 feet before there was any sign of tassel. They were then taken canes, two or three weeks more elapsed without the appearance of a single ear. I began to fear from this that eight or ten small ears made their appearance. About the middle of September, when the cool weather of fall of these are ripening sufficiently to furnish seed, I gathered them. There are not usually two or three scattered grains; the others were tolerably well set, the ears hanging down. I think, from present appearance, I could, we found their flavor far beyond that of any sweet corn we had ever tasted, extremely delicate and delicious.

"I was struck with the growth of circles of roots from each joint to the cane, to the height of 12 or 18 inches from the soil; and, as the plants were in the open, the period to make any change, that the plants should have been sent in thinner, and their roots encouraged with earth as far as they were thrown out.

"This is about all I have to communicate. I shall be very glad to try again, because my climate is a little more favorable. I think, that, if I had had the seed, I would have had a plentiful crop. The flavor of the cob is so delicious that I would like a pig if it were not somewhat how saturate it."

I think the introduction of this maize would be a real boon to the country, and I am sure it would prove good in the Southern States, and that the seed could be got four bushels of this maize over the Andes at this port. I proposed that the Government should send it to the editor of the paper for this purpose, so that the experiment might be extensively tried, but we tried on a adequate scale. I will undertake the correspondence and arrangements to get the seed here.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The 350th anniversary of the settlement of the City of Saint Augustine, Florida, was celebrated at that place by the Historical Society, and a book by the Rev. Dr. Abbott, containing the papers available in the occasion were delivered in the First Presbyterian church, was published. The city is illuminated by a procession of fire and military companies paraded through the principal streets of the city.

The drouth in many portions of New-England is causing much anxiety and discouragement among the farmers. Vegetation has made but little progress for the last week, destroying much woodland and several fires. About 4,000 acres in Plymouth county, in the towns of Sandwich and Monument have been burned, including large stocks of valuable wood.

—Within the past few weeks seven men have been killed by wheels in the Pennsylvania coal region in Clair County, No. The men were robbers and horse thieves. The slightest effort to capture any one of the parties engaged in the lynching, but it is known that they were principally from the lower and middle districts of the State.

The Fenian emigration to the port, which was very heavy in 1864 (numbering 20,918 persons), and 1865 (numbering 16,349), has fallen off this year to still greater the year, if the arrivals up to the time in which we write may be taken as a fair indication of the year's movement. In four and a half months, from the 1st January, 1866, there have arrived 1,000 persons here. In the four months from January to April, inclusive, in 1865, the number was 5,000, while the corresponding period of 1864 the number was 41,950.

The commerce of Chicago is increasing. It employs 910 steamers, with a capacity of 373,154 tons, valued at $12,000,000, and 1,000 sailing vessels, with a capacity of 110,000 tons, valued at $8,800,000. The receipts of grain for the year 1865 were 29,000,000 bushels, and shipments 26 steamers and 31 tugs. Louisville, 66; Memphis, 60; Wheeling, 46; St. Paul, 30.

A new city ambulance has been erected at Bridgeport, near Chicago, intended for the entire transport of the sick and wounded. It is 20 feet long, 175 wide, and three stories high. It has a daily capacity for sending off 1,000 persons, and will be ready for service on May 30th.

The Cincinnati Gazette announces that "pure essence of coffee" is now made in that city out of the cheapest, dirtiest materials. The coffee is first burned, cooled, and when hard, is broken and pulverized. Then it is put into a large kettle, and water added to the mixture, labeled "Pure Essence of Coffee," is sold by the gallon.

—A Kentucky paper tells of May recently demolished the freedmen's village on Port Royal Island, S. C. Forty cabins were destroyed, and many others were more or less injured—two mortally. The damage on St. Helena Island was considerable. The Baptist church was nearly destroyed, with several lives lost and many injured.

—The hail-storm which occurred at Rochester and vicinity on Saturday, 26, proved very destructive to the young vegetation as well as to buildings, and it is said that several persons were killed. The storm also across the chapel in Mount Hope Cemetery, where a large congregation had assembled, but no one was seriously injured.

—Great distress is said to prevail in many parts of Louisiana overflowed by the recent floods. The Acadians in the noted Grand Coteau district, in St. Landry parish, lay upon the crops last year from the same cause. This year they were struggling hard to make up for the miscarriages of the previous season, but another flood has swept everything away.

—The Grant House, at Franklin, Penn., was destroyed by fire on the 19th of May. One of the waiters-girls, in her flight, leaped from the fourth story of the house, and was killed. Two or three others were badly injured, and it is feared have perished in the flames.

Foreign.—While the annual ratio of mortality for the whole of England is 22 per 1,000 of the population, it is, taking 10 years' average, 31, and in 1865 was 32·6. Death's dark shadow, in a second paper on Life Insurance, enters fully into the subject of the causes of death, and the effects of disease in that city. He divides the atmospheric impurities of towns into two classes, the solid matters which float in the air, which occupy the lower stratum, act as irritants to the lungs, and are the cause of bronchitis and consumption; from the medium, are direct exciters of many types of disease, and the second, the invisible enemy the epidemic, and resident in our sewer gas. "Of the solid impurities," says Mr. Hyde Clarke, "the most active is soot, which forms a continual dark and dense canopy over Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, and in the streets, from which they are never free."

The sewerage system in England has increased the making of steel pens. In 24 years 120 tons have been made. Of this quantity 100 tons were found to be unserviceable. Now there are a number of houses which make 100,000 pens a week, and 5,000,000 pens a year, at such cheap rates that a gross may be sold for four pence.

There is much talk at Rome of astounding cases of exorcism said to have occurred in the Papal States. Among the most famous, named Maciangoy, is every day exercised by monks, who say that she is possessed of seven devils. She has been a cottage near the monastery, and is taken to the church of the Gesu for the exorcism. On April 8 the Francisco Superior brother-hood delivered a sermon, in which he solemnly proclaimed the power of the devils who had that day been cast out of the woman. The Pope would not receive the Archbishop of Lamps, Faustino Declamator, etc. The Pope would not give religious credence to the absurdity of this superstition, for he has sent a physician to examine the ecclesiastic girl.

A London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes: "We have, as you know, been getting on rapidly of late in the matter of the Volunteers, but the present season has witnessed a further development of military enthusiasm. The Rifle Clubs' Gazette is the 'go' in the most fashionable circles. The young gentlemen have taken to it as a new toy, and at the breakfast, the 'frisky matrons' the reign supreme. Amongst the latest fashionable novelties are rifle jackets, rifle in the sleeves, at the bosom, and rifle caps. A fashionable tailor in Regent-street has a rifle range in the rear of his premises, and the other day one of the most fashionable—a gentleman and a lady—had the only fun obtained by those who are in high favor with presiding authorities, and the Queen herself, to the most eminent persons. The amusement consists at covering with a rifle a number of pictures of public men, especially with their cigarettes. To give some idea of the interest which this novel amusement has already given to promote, I may state that the 'Scuffers' are so called from the fact that the rifle balls and tubes are launched from the room, and the members sit or lounge on the floor to avoid the balls."

Soon after the death of the celebrated French actress Rachel (nee the London Pall Mall Gazette, her sister, Mme. Dicker, married a Jew, and converted herself to oyster-breeding, on the shores of Mount St. Michael's Bay, in Normandy. Her success for many years past she has successfully directed an extensive trade in oysters. It is said that the widow of Mme. Cascade distrust has been attacked has depopulated her bed, and that she is about to sell her property, and retire to obtain a livelihood, so she has obtained a license to sell oysters in the streets of Paris. It is said that the Emperor of Russia has given orders that the Russian ships propose to acclimatize the American oyster, a delicacy therefore unknown to European gourmands.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSES IN SOUTH AMERICA.

THE correspondent of one of the daily papers gives a detailed account of his visit to an immense slaughter-house, near the city of Montevideo, from which it will appear that New York cannot boast of any very extraordinary degree of cruelty in the mode of supplying animal food. In fact, the method of slaughtering here described is probably less revolting than that practiced among ourselves; while the removal of the cattle-pens and all their appurtenances to a distance from the town would be a more revolting spectacles and disgraceful nuisances that are so common in this city:

"The saladero is truly a feature of this country. Let me describe one which I visited in South America. It is that of Sellor Le Fonds, across the cove or inner harbor of Montevideo, and is a large, low, brick, tile, tallow-boilers and the bone-mine can be smelled while you are yet a mile distant. Before the establishment, at 11 o'clock the head of the cove, I saw an enclosure, about 200 yards square, with a low, broad, low, thick building of corrugated iron, in the centre, of which stood a tall brick chimney, from which rolled the only black smoke of the township.

"The cattle-pen covers a circular area of two or three acres, surrounded by a fence about nine feet high, very strongly built. From its gate, on the side next me, two broad passages, also fenced in, like the very jaws of death, as they are, the distance between these constantly narrowing as they approach the slaughter-house. Opposite this gate is another, which opens into a lane about 100 yards long, 10 feet wide, and 15 or 16 feet in head, and 80 at the foot. Into the cattle are driven lots of 80, more or less, at once. At the further end of this is the slaughter-house, a building several hundred feet in length and about 60 wide, sloped toward either side from a railway track in the centre, running its entire length. On either side, on the outer border of the slope, is a deep gutter for carrying off the blood. The floor of the lane slopes referred to be plank, and the ground has sufficient fall from the pen to the slaughter-house to carry off the blood of animals let to the floor at its lower end. Into this, and forming a part of it, a door opens from each of the passages from the cattle-pen, the door opening into the cross as may have been described, and fitting so closely as to prevent the escape of cattle. Each door is provided, and fitting against the fence, is a gate, which, when open, forms a wing to the passage, and when closed stands the middle with it. Each gate is provided with a bolt, which, when shot, fastens it to the fence. Again he sings out 'Este bois!' the barrier turn about, the gate is passed into the next wing, and the animal is dumped off. One matador was sitting, while I looked on, with his knife ready to hand, and as each animal was to the slaughter-house, while it, upon at the sides. I had no idea that it was so simple a matter to wield a butcher-knife. The bullock is caused with his head toward the matador, who, with a blow of his knife, on the forehead, has lost half his blood. One man alone takes his hide off, and he performs the task in a manner that I can vouch in 15 minutes—some even go in less minutes! Boys are employed to carry off the offal to the boiling spot. Another bullock drops down at the right, in place of the first, and the matador, without moving, cuts off one of his hide and disposes in like manner. She hide of each animal is then thrown into a pit, where, by a succession of shifts in three different vats, into a base liquor, it is cured in 20 days. The hide is then in a condition manufactured, and from which it rules out to get the best hides in the market, and smallest. The flesh, as it is cut, with thousands of others, it goes into the market for the use of the poor.

"Throughout the most of the butcher has quitted the scene in the rear of the cattle-pen, where the blood, the offal, the hide and sleeping in a mob bed, or a series of mob beds rolling in the sun. Here, in the shade, from 11 o'clock to 3, the men sleep, about 25 feet wide, 60 feet long, and 15 feet high. The floor of the slaughter-pile is of stone, and the whole is of the most dramatic press, by which the entire stock is pressed into bales of 300 lbs. each. Each bale is covered with a piece of hide. This is done on two rail fences, about seven feet high. The rails are made of the trunks of trees, and are round and smooth. The sides of trees are hung across these rails, closely together, and the meat is left to dry in the sun day in the fresh air and sunshine before being offered for sale. The bones are shipped to England and the Continent likewise. I saw many such stacks, and several acres of ground covered with the bones awaiting sale. The well-known jerked beef, and from this place and Buenos Ayres. The hoofs, horns and feathers are also shipped. Some of it is cast of with coarse and some fine wool. The latter is used for making the best quality beds, each depending upon the market for which it is being baled. The bales was being loaded on a steamer for shipment on a correspondingly large scale. About 1,000 cattle are killed here every morning."

LOVE, CARTERS, AND SAUSAGES.

ABOUT 100 years ago, a young lady of Amsterdam, named Wilhelmina Terschelling, was riding in a carriage with her father, when the horses of the horse-b came frightened, and ran away with her. The young man who accompanied her, and to whom she was introduced, offered to get out and stop the horses, but desire to say one that would stop the horses.

The young man, however playing ball upon the green near by, seeing a woman in danger, threw themselves before the runaway horses. One of them was thrown down and wounded; two others received contusions; the horse fell, and the beautiful Wilhelmina rolled in the dust. The young man who had so gallantly interposed threw his cloak over the lady before any one else had time to perceive it, and thereby secured her good name.

Mademoiselle Terschelling, on being carried home, had time to reflect; and the result of her reflections was that she resolved that she would be too much grateful to had seen her glorier. She sent for her betrothed, and said:

"Now tell me, that the man who threw his cloak over me?"

"Who! I? What an enormity!"

"I thought you would refuse. Then I shall marry him. When my life was in danger, you offered one thousand florins to any one who would save me. You are upon my hand. Here are twenty-five hundred. You have made a good bargain."

She sent for the stranger.

"Monsieur," she said, "I am rich and young. (She blushed prodigiously while adding one of those hypocritical observations which are the common sense of their beauty.) I am not considered repulsive. I wish to marry you. Here are twenty-five hundred florins that will be frank with you. I have a set to you because you have saved my life, and I am grateful for it in a legal service, moreover. Without you, all the young men of the Amsterdam would have run away. If, said, I could have married them all, I should have killed myself. But if you refuse my offer, I am not so happy to be grateful. I shall give my hand and fortune to a man who will kill me. Do you accept? Yes or no?"

"Yes, a thousand times yes."

The marriage took place, and was like all other marriages, probably; we have no particulars on the subject. The husband and Baroness were invited to the baptisms and subsequently toasted.

Their death, which took place in the course of time, the following ordinal was found in her will:

"My husband, Baron Carter, has been for me Moses, will remain for ever, whoever may be the proprietor of it, bears to this name and arms. I leave my property, under penalty of forfeiture, on the 15th day of May, ladies will of the Amsterdam Society of the Orphans Free Church Schools, to the sum of 25,000 florins. The young men who assemble on the 15th day of May did not fail to pay perfect the 15th day of May, 1866."

Until the present time—that is, during a hundred and one years—this bequest has been paid with punctuality executed. But the present heir, on the 15th of May, 1865, refused to pay the legacy. Hence the lawsuit of conforming to the declared system, he gave twenty-five florins to each of the heads of the school of the children of the youth of Zaandam.

The Court of Appeal confirmed the twenty orders refused protest," but this year they have brought a suit against the heir, and it is said the case be decided before the 15th day of May next.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA DE BERG,

The Celebrated Equestrienne.

THIS charming and wonderful artiste, whose performances are now delighting crowded and fashionable audiences at the New York Circus, was born some 22 years ago in the gay capital of France—Paris. So early did she develop her marvelous aptitude for horsemanship, that she made her first appearance at the Paris Circus when only four years old, and ever since she has been, as child, girl and woman, the bright particular equestrienne star of Paris. With the exception of the time taken up in her professional tours, she has been engaged since 1851 at the Cirque Imperial, and occasionally at the Cirque Napoleon. During the vacations in Paris, she has visited all the principal European capitals, where she was received with the greatest enthusiasm. She has also been introduced to most of the crowned heads of Europe, who testified their admiration of her admirable and dashing feats, so far superior to anything they had ever seen, by handsome compliments, and still more handsome gifts.

Having entered into an engagement with L. B. Lent, she arrived in New York a short time ago, and made her first appearance at the New York Circus, Fourteenth street, on the 23d of April, where she created a perfect furor of applause. Our engraving represents one of those daring and yet graceful feats, to which no description can do justice—they must be seen to be understood and appreciated.

THE MODERN DIOGENES

Or, The Hermit in a Tub.

HUMANITY has many phases; some love elegance, and some are not less attached to dirt. A singular being has just been unearthed by the Sanitary Inspectors, who thus reports of a remarkable hermit squatter, whose hermitage is situated on three lots on the southerly side of 85th street, between 6th and 7th avenues. We give the Inspector's own words, simply omitting a few which describe culinary peculiarities, eminently Chinese, albeit super-eminently unsavory:

"The squatter's name is John Krauchi. His abode is a barrel, around which he spreads several filthy old carpets on the bare rock. On these he lies, and there he takes excitement weather he chooses the hard shoulders into the barrel. Adjacent to his abode is a pile of old bones, evidently elevated from the rock to allow his dogs to crawl underneath. He has no protection. All this is surrounded by baskets, barrels, pans and boxes, containing decomposing bones, lobster-shells, fish-heads and tails, dead cats, rotten grease, and every conceivable kitchen refuse, swill and garbage fished out of gutters and scrolled all over garbage boxes, all of which mixture, or part thereof, is stewed or cooked in a mixed state by said Krauchi, and fed upon any, amid a shanty population, and when stewed or cooked, is eaten by Krauchi and his numerous dogs. Evidence is not wanting to prove that he has eaten the dead rats and cats found on the public highways, and that he kills his own dogs for their meat as food when no other nourishment is at hand."

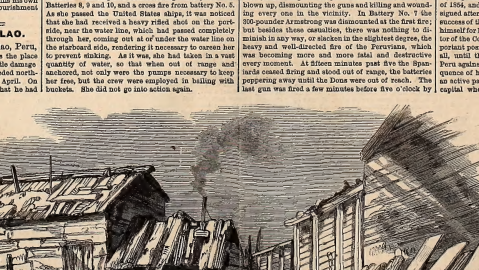
BOMBARDMENT OF CALLAO.

On the 2d of May the city of Callao, Peru, was bombarded by the Spanish fleet, but as the place was vigorously defended, it received but little damage. After the affair at Valparaiso, the fleet proceeded northward to Callao, arriving there on the 24th of April. On the 26th, Admiral Nuñez issued his notice that he had come to operate against the city and its fortifications, and gave foreigners and non-combatants four days' notice to remove from the scene of action. Immediately all was bustle and excitement, and in a short time the city gave every evidence of being deserted, except by those destined to take part in the affray. At 11 A. M., on the 2d of May, the signal was made from the flag-ship to get under weigh. Soon after the six frigates formed a line of battle in two columns.

At ten minutes past 12 the first shot was fired from battery No. 2, at the Numancia, and was replied to at once by that ship. Not more than five minutes elapsed before the action became general with both divisions of the fleet, that to the northward rising so as to be behind the western column. The firing from the ships was very rapid, too much so, indeed, for it was wild, and gave evident proof that the captains of the guns were not as deliberate in their aim as they might be. The fire from the batteries was at first slow and inaccurate, but they soon began to get the range, and their heavy shot was soon to tell on more than one ship. It was thus half an hour after the action commenced, the Villa de Madrid made a signal, evidently asking for assistance the little Vencedora went in and towed her out of the fire, and as she came in plain view, it was evident that her motive power had been damaged, for the steam was seen issuing in clouds from every part of the vessel.

The next ship to retire was the Berenguela. She moved out slowly, about 30 minutes after the Villa de Madrid. This ship had been receiving a heavy fire from Batteries 8, 9 and 10, and a cross fire from battery No. 5. As she passed the United States ships, it was noticed that she had received a heavy rifled shot on the portside, near the water line, which had passed completely through her, coming out at or under the water line on the starboard side, rendering it necessary to caream her to prevent sinking. As it was, she had taken in a vast quantity of water, so that when out of range and anchored, not only were the pumps necessary to keep her free, but the crew were employed in bailing with buckets. She did not go into action again.



The action continued with great spirit by both the batteries and remaining ships. At half-past two the Blanca and Resolucion retired to repair some injuries, but soon returned to their positions, when all remained until the fight was over, except the two first-mentioned.

Soon after the commencement of the fight, Battery No. 3, containing two 300-pounder Armstrong rifles, was blown up, dismounting the guns and killing and wounding every one in the vicinity. In Battery No. 7 the 300-pounder Armstrong was dismounted at the first fire; but besides these casualties, there was nothing to diminish in any way, or slacken in the slightest degree, the heavy and well-directed fire of the Peruvians, which was becoming more and more fatal and destructive every moment. At fifteen minutes past five the Spaniards ceased firing and stood out of range, the batteries peppering away until the Dons were out of reach. The last gun was fired a few minutes before five o'clock by the monitor Victoria, thus ending [an action totalling a disgrace upon Spain greater, if possible, than her defeat at San Domingo.

Nothing reliable is known of the exact number of killed and wounded on either side. The Peruvian Secretary of War, Senor Galvez, was killed in Battery No. 3, when it was blown up. Admiral Nuñez is reported to have received no less than eight wounds and contusions; one in the head pronounced severe. By the shot that disabled the steam pipe of the Villa de Madrid, 18 men were killed, and 21 wounded; so, taking the disabled done by one projectile we may be safe in judging the Spanish loss as far in excess of that of the Peruvians.

THE INNER PORT OF CALLAO.

THE harbor of Callao is a broad sheet of water, crescent-shaped, and protected from the prevailing winds and currents, which here are from the south, by a tongue of land two miles in length, projecting at right angle from the shore, and by two island (the principal one called San Lorenzo) lying at a distance of four and a half miles. Notwithstanding these protections, the great Pacific swell is to heavily in the harbor, necessitating in construction of a sort of inner harbor or dock, within which passengers and freight may be readily embarked and disembarked. Our engraving repre sents this inner harbor, with the accumulations of merchandise awaiting movement, as also the station building of the Callao and Lima railway. The scene is a busy one. Most of the articles represented as accumulated on the wharves are bags of flour from Chile and jars or amphoræ of the Peruvian liquor called Italia or Pisco. As it never rains in Callao, the troubles and costs of storage are very much lightened. Articles of the most perishable character may be safely left in the open air, with no protection except against robbery. Callao, we need not say, is the port of Lima its—" down-town"—and is only 10 minutes distant by rail from the capital.

THE INNER PORT OF CALLAO.

SENOR DON JOSE CALVEZ,

Late Minister of War of Peru.

SENOR DON JOSE GALVEZ, late Minister of War of Peru, was killed by the accidental explosion of a shell during the late fight between the Spanish and Peruvian fleets, off the port of Callao, on the 2d of May, was born in the most important province of Peru. He was among the most ardent and advanced of the Liberals of his country, a thorough American, and at the time of his glorious death, but in the prime of age.

Educated to the profession of the law, he nevertheless took up arms against Gen. Echenique, in the revolution of 1854, and obtained the rank of colonel, which he resigned after the battle of La Palma, which secured the success of the revolution, and in which he distinguished himself for his bravery. He next held the position of Rector of the College of San Carlos, and afterward filled important positions under the Government, declined them all, until the unanimous revolution in favor of Prim against the administration of Gen. Pezet (in consequence of his concessions to Spain), in which he took an active part, and was one of the three who left the capital when that traitor absconded. He was named Minister of War, not alone on account of his military aptitudes, but mostly on account of his known integrity, and died in one of the very batteries which he had ordered erected, and where he was foremost in resisting the aggressions on his country. He died as all patriots might wish to die with the glory of victory lighting up the folds of his country's flag. We learn there is a movement on foot among the South American republicans in New York to raise a statue to this martyr to the grand doctrine of Monroe.

THE oldest republic in existence is that of San Marino, in Italy, between the Apennines, the Po and the Adriatic. The territory of this State is only 40 miles in circumference, and its population about 7,000. The republic was founded more than 1,40 years ago, on moral principles, industry and equity, and has preserved its liberty and indep-ndence amid all the wars and discords which have raged around it. Bonaparte respected it, and sent an embassy to express his sentiments of friendship and fraternity. His government has a captain-regent, chosen every six months by th. representatives of the people (the number), who are elected every six months by the people. The taxes are light, the farm-houses are neat, the fields well cultivated, and on all sides are seen comfort and plenty, the happy effect of morality, simplicity and frugality.

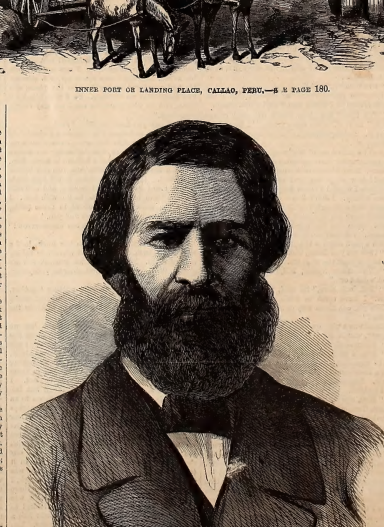
BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, N. Y.

THE famous Opera House of the Empire City has not long survived its sister of the Chicago, for on Monday night, the 21st of May, between 11 and 12 o'clock, the two employés, whose duty it it was to see that all was safe before locking the doors for the night, discovered smoke forcing its way from beneath the stage. An alarm was immediately given, and although the fire companies were promptly on the spot, and everything done that human exertion could perform, the entire block on 14th street, of which the Academy formed part, was totally destroyed, leaving only blackened walls. In addition to the Opera House, the Medical College, a church, and several houses were involved in one common ruin. Not content with this devastation, the high wind then raging carried the flames across the Third Avenue, and destroyed Worcester's Pianoforte Factory, as well as a house adjoining it. The damage is estimated at about $1,000,000, but we regret to add that two gallant firemen lost their lives in the heroic discharge of their duty.



The Gran Troupe singers, as well as musicians, have lost all their wardrobes and instruments, and Max Maretzek is a loser to the extent of nearly $20,000. It is also a great detriment to the Buisley Troupe, who had engaged the Academy for their performances, commencing on the 11th of June. The prevalent belief is that it was the work of an incendiary, and Fire Marshal Baker is now busy in investigating the affair. It certainly seems strange that Barnum's, Butler's, and the Academy should all be consumed by fire in the course only a few months. The last fire will prove a very heavy blow to the Insurance Companies, already severely suffering from previous conflagrations.

It is appalling to contemplate the fearful loss of life that would have ensued had the fire broken out half an hour earlier, for the opera of "Le Juive," had only just been concluded, and Madame Garzanigo had not left the house five minutes, when the fire burst out. The janitor's family, which slept on the premises, had a very narrow escape of their lives, having gone to bed; but they were fortunately aroused, and were thus enabled to escape.

HISTORICAL ILLUSTRATIONS OF SCRIPTURE.

"Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest".—Matt. xi. 28.

AFTER sentence of death had been passed on Charles, I. he had an affecting interview with his children. The Prince of Wales and James, Duke of York, were out of England at the time; Prince Henry, a child eight years old, and a daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, were all who could be presented to the condemned king. Charles was executed on the 30th of January, 1649, after which his daughter was removed to Carisbrooke Castle, in the Isle of Wight. Charles himself had once escaped to this castle, and his daughter, being thoughtful beyond her years, often called to mind the misfortunes of her royal father. Henrietta Maria, the mother of Elizabeth, seemed to have forgotten both her husband and her children; the princes were scattered here and there; no friend or companion cheered the solitary hours of this interesting child. Deprived of earthly comforts, she took special delight in studying the word of God. Day by day she was found with the sacred volume open before her, and day by day attended on entering her room, found her dead, her head leaning on the Bible, which was open at the words, "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." She was buried in Newport Church in the Isle of Wight. When Queen Victoria selected the Isle of Wight as a residence, she remembered the history of the little captive, and she had a marble monument erected to her memory. The monument consists of a female figure reclining her head on a marble book, with the text already quoted engraven on the book.

SENOR GALVEZ, LATE PERUVIAN SECRETARY OF WAR.—SEE PAGE 180.

THE POPULACE OF NAPLES.—Early day in the Bay of Naples! Have any of our readers seen it? Do they remember it? Can they forget it? Did the seeing of it seem to justify the boastful national saying, "See Naples and then die?" The brightness of land and water; the beauty of outline, and of the vegetation that fills up those outlines; the glitter of white, green, scarlet, purple, and blue; villas and palaces; gay vestments; snowy lateen sails, shooting like sudden smiles across the face of the sea; all the glory of nature that hides, as with a bright screen, dirt, ignorance, poverty, misgovernment, and whatever else is faulty or painful in the condition of that careless people, for whom brave hearts have struggled and suffered, and are yet struggling; but who, in their whole nature, resemble ill brought-up children more than any other peasantry on the face of the globe. Even in their bursts of daring effort to right themselves politically, this may be seen. Wat Tyler—the "Jack of the Coverse," as he is styled in old-fashioned accounts of that rebellion, and William Tell, the hero of Helvetian romance—rose, with men's hearts, to do men's work, with a steady purpose, and, as far as possible in ambitious human nature, with a certain abnegation of self in behalf of the general good. But Masaniello's revolt, laughable as is his story, was the burning-out of a school-boy sick of a tyrannical master; tyrannical in his turn, and rebelled against in his turn, by companions yet more reckless and short-sighted than himself. Even in their daily occupations—their slack, uncertain industry, easily interrupted for any show or procession; their coarse, destructive gabble; their vehement disputes about trifles, when they should be seriously talking of their business—we have a childishness unsurpassed. Life, with them, becomes a filling up of some irregular, ill-passed holiday—a holiday that has been too long even for their own comfort, as we often see with children. There is no evidence of reality in what they do. They seem playing at everything; playing at buying and selling; playing at mending nets; playing at cookery in one corner, and at building or carpenter's work in another. Even the women seem at playing at washing, as they chase each other laughingly, or come carelessly along, swinging a basket of wet linen between them, passing barefooted over the bright sands, whose moist gleaming surface on a sunny day often reflects, as in a mirror, the feet and limbs and colored raiment of the burden-carriers

IN THE COUNTRY.

I.

The winds odorous
That wander o'er us;
The apple-blossoms
With scented bosoms:
(What perfume sweeter doth mortal ken?)
The soft caresses
Of air that blesses;
The warmth all balm
In the mid-day calm,
Tell how the May-time is come again,

II.

The corn-lands plowing;
The grass-lands sowing;
The time is nearing
The sheep for shearing;
The cattle feed in the pastures late;
The village rouses;
In all its houses
New life is springing;
The wife is singing;
The maiden bareheaded comes to the gate.

III.

By singing waters
The schoolboy loiters,
And loudly hollows.
The busy swallows
Squeak and chatter about the barn.
The bee is humming;
The partridge drumming;
The night is falling;
The cuckoo's calling;
The hylas sings by the sedgy tarn.

IV.

Lamps are alight
In the balmy night;
Twos lovingly
Come strolling by,
And sweet old tales are softly said.
No need to borrow
A care for the morrow;
It will be fair
The signs declare:
The winds from the north—the sun-set red.

Madman's Gully:

AN ADVENTURE IN AUSTRALIA.

When the Victoria gold fever was at its height the people were literally mad with excitement. Lord! lord! the queer sights I have seen, and the queer stories I could tell would fill a dozen books. I have worked with all sorts of mates, and lived all sorts of lives. The strangest mate I ever worked with was a man who went by the name of Cranky Bill. He was as thin as a lath and as tall as a May-pole, and he would talk—Lord! he would talk, I believe, for days and nights without stopping, if he could only get some one to listen to him. He had come out to the colony under a cloud. When I say under a cloud, I don't mean that he had done anything wrong; but he was obliged to run away from England for a reason I didn't know then, but which I learned afterward. He had brought his wife out with him, a poor, weak, delicate creature, who died soon after he landed, leaving behind her a little girl. This little girl Cranky Bill left with some people in Melbourne, and came to the diggings to try his luck. I was working in Dead Dog Gully, near Forest Creek, which was just discovered, and Cranky Bill and me had somehow or another come together as mates. A better one I never wish for. Barring his gift of the gab, which was an awful nuisance, to be sure, I never had anything to complain of. He never shirked his work; and once, when I was laid up with low fever, he nursed me like a woman, and worked the claim without a murmur. Soon after I got well our claim was worked out, and we had to look elsewhere for another, for every inch of the gully was taken up. I remember the night we parted. We were sitting in the tent, with the gold before us and our revolvers on the table—for we had to look out pretty sharp, those days, mates. Many's the man who has been robbed and murdered without any one being the wiser; strange things have been done at the diggings which man's tongue will never speak of. I've seen some sights which make me shiver when I think of them; just the same as Cranky Bill—but I mustn't spoil my story.

Well, we were sitting there, with the gold before us. Our claim had been a rich one, and we had over three hundred ounces to divide, after all our sprees.

"Tom," said Cranky Bill, as he sat looking at the gold, "if I had had my share of that gold at home, I should never have come out to the gold-fields, and my wife would not have died."

"How can you tell that, Bill?" I asked.

"Ah, but I know," he said. "You see, ours was a love match. We lived at Birkenhead. There was an old hunks of a money-lender wanted to marry my Lizzie; but although her father tried to force her to the match, she would not consent, and we were married one morning, quietly, and without their knowing. We were very happy—she was a good girl, was my Liz—and we could have got along very well if it had not been for that money-lending miser. To spite me for marrying the girl, he bought up all my debts—they were not much, about four hundred pounds—and almost worried me mad. And, do you know, one morning I caught the villain in the act of insulting my wife, and learned that this was not the first time he had done so, threatening that, if she mentioned it, he would sell me up and put me in prison. I didn't show him any mercy, you may be sure; I beat him till he was sore, and kicked him out of the house, and the next morning I had to fly, for his bailiffs were on the look-out to arrest me for debt. He sold me up, and turned my wife into the streets, and we came to Liverpool in a sad plight. However, I shipped before the mast, and a friend assisted me to pay for my wife's passage. It was not until we had been at sea a week that she told me the doctor had said if she left England she would not live a twelvemonth. She died within the year. So, you see, if I had had my share of that gold at home, I could have paid that old scoundrel's debt, and my wife would not have died. If I can ever get enough money to go home and ruin him, I shall die contented."

And he broke out into a storm of oaths and curses.

"I tell you what, Tom," he said, after a bit, "I shall go down to Melbourne, and see my little daughter, and then I'll go prospecting. I know that there are places where the gold can be got in lumps, and I mean to find them out. I dreamed the other night that I came upon it in the rock, and that I had to cut it out with a chisel."

I tried to persuade him from this, for I did not like the idea of losing my mate; but I might as well have talked to a mile-post. So we divided the gold, and that very night he started on the tramp to Melbourne.

I did not see or hear anything of Cranky Bill for some months after this; and somehow or other, luck was against me—every hole I bottomed turned out a duffer. I went to every little rush, had half-a-dozen different mates in as many months, and didn't earn tucker any week during that time. I wonder where all the names they give to the gullies come from? I've worked in Jackass Gully, Starvation Gully, Donkey-Woman's Gully, Peleg Gully, Chok'em Gully, Dead-Horse Gully, and lots of others; I've sunk holes in them all. But no place is so strong in my mind as Madman's Gully, and I shall never forget the way I came across it.

I had been at work for nearly three weeks on Murdering Flat—nice sociable names, ain't they?—and was pretty well down on my luck. I remember that I had made about seven pennyweights in those three weeks, and I also remember that I hadn't an ounce of gold left in my bag. I was working as a "hatter," and I had been particularly unlucky that day, having got about three grains, which I flung away in a rage. I was just thinking whether I might not as well go to the grog shanty for a nobbler or two—it was nine o'clock at night—when who should walk in but Cranky Bill. I did not know him at first, for he had let the hair grow all over his face, and he was covered with it up to his eyes and down to his breast; but I wasn't long in the dark, for I recognized his voice directly he spoke.

"All alone, Tom?" he asked.

I nodded; and without saying another word he went out, and brought in in his arms a beautiful little girl, asleep. She wasn't above six years old, but she was so pretty, and looked so like a little angel, that I fell in love with her at once. Of course I was a bit surprised when he brought her in, and he could see this as he laid her down upon my stretcher.

"This is my daughter, Tom," he said, answering my look; "if ever I go to heaven, I shall have her to thank for it. She is my good angel."

"Where are you come from, Bill?" I asked, after we had covered her up with the blankets.

He looked cautiously round, and then taking a seat close to me at the end of the stretcher, said, in a whisper:

"I've found it, Tom!"

His eyes glared round so awfully, that I felt quite scared as I asked him what he had found.

"I've found the place where the gold comes from," he said, in the same voice; "I know I am near it. I always thought I should find it at last. Look here!"

And he pulled out of his breast-pocket a nugget weighing nearly seventy ounces, and half-a-dozen others, from fifteen to twenty-five ounces each. Lord! how my heart beat as I looked at them, and how I wished I could drop across some of the same kidney. I don't know how it is with you, mates, but although I don't value the gold much when I have got it, I can't express the eager delight which fills me when I come across a rich pocket. I think the sight of bright shining gold down a dark claim is the prettiest in the world.

"How are you doing, Tom?" Cranky Bill asked, as he put back the nuggets.

"Can't make tucker, Bill," I answered; "my luck's dead out."

"Well, look here," he said, "you're all right, now. I have come to fetch you, to show you where you can make fifty ounces a day. Will you come?"

That was a nice question to put to a hard-up digger, wasn't it?

"When shall we start, old fellow?" I said.

"Stop a minute, Tom," he said, gravely. "I have something to say to you first. I want you for a mate again; but we've got to make a bargain. You see my little girl there?"

I nodded.

"Well, she is the blood of my heart. I am like a plant, Tom, which would wither, if deprived of God Almighty's blessed dew. She is my dew. And if anything was to happen to her, I should wither, and rot, and die. I want you for my mate, because I believe you to be honest and true. And I am going to show you a place which, of my own free will, I would not show to another man in the world. But do you know, Tom, that since I have had my little pet with me"—and he laid his hand, oh! so gently against her cheek—"all my recklessness and courage seem to have gone clean out of me. For, I think, What will become of her if I should die—if I should slip down a shaft, or the claim should tumble in upon me, or I should fall ill of a fever, or anything of that sort? These thoughts haunt me day and night, and I have a presentiment of something I cannot express. Now, Tom, listen to me. The place I am going to take you to will make you rich—if we can keep it to ourselves for two or three months (although there is another in the secret, but he won't peach for his own sake), we'll get five thousand ounces, and perhaps more. Now, lay your hand upon your heart, and swear that if anything happens to me, you will take care of my pet, and be a second father to her, when I am gone."

I rose and bent over the dear little one's face—I can feel her sweet breath again upon my cheek—and kissed her. Then I said:

"That kiss is a sacrament, Bill. By all that's holy, I will be a second father to your little girl. So help me God!"

He took my hand and the big tears rolled down his beard. We neither of us spoke for five minutes, and then he commenced again.

"Now, I will tell you all about it. You remember my leaving you to go to Melbourne, after we had worked out our claim in Dead Dog? Well, I went down and found that my little girl was not being well treated. The people she was living with had taken to drink, and had neglected her. And my heart so grew to her—her face is the picture of my Lizzie's—that I made up my mind never to leave her again. We've traveled together, since that time, I don't know how many hundreds of miles."

"How did you manage that?" I asked; the little thing could not walk.

"Sometimes I carried her," he answered; "and I got her odd lifts, now and then, upon the drays and wagons. There was never a drayman or a wagoner who refused to give my little girl a ride, if he was going our way. Why, do you know," he said, laughing, "once she saved me from the bushrangers. They were upon me in the Black Forest, before I knew where I was, and called out to me to stand. We had just been having tea, and I was stooping over the log fire to get a light for my pipe. I jumped up, and saw them before me. There were three of them. They were splendidly mounted, and were dressed in red serge shirts and silk sashes. Well, my girl runs up to my side, and stands looking at the three men. They were dumfoundered. 'Is that yours, mate? they asked. 'Yes,' I answered; and then one of them got off his horse, and asked my little girl to give him a kiss, which she did; and he knelt down before her, and put her two hands on his eyes, and kissed them over again. 'If every man had a little angel like that by his side,' he said, 'it would be the better for him.' And then, taking off his silk sash, he put it round my girl's waist; and they all wished me good-night, and rode off. That was a lucky escape, was it not? However, while on the road, I could not get along as quickly as I wanted to, so I bought a wheelbarrow."

"A wheelbarrow!" I exclaimed, surprised.

"Yes, a wheelbarrow," he said, with a comical look; "and I put my little girl in it, and wheel her wherever I want to go. Well, to get along with my story, I came upon the gully where I am working now. Directly I saw it, I knew that it was right for gold. I went to a station, about twelve miles off, and laid up a stock of provisions. Then I set to work. Oh, Tom! it is a gully; and rising up steeply on one side of it is a rocky range, with great masses of quartz sticking out. I've broken up a lot of it, and have got plenty of little nuggets out of the stone; and I know that if we could get a shaft down, we should find the gold in lumps. I worked by myself in this gully for two months, and got over four hundred ounces; but one day, when I was cradling, I saw a man looking at me. My mind was made up in a minute. He had wandered by accident to the place, and had discovered me working. So I took him for a mate, and we were together until the day before yesterday."

"And now you have parted," I said.

"Yes. My pet don't like him, and I absolutely think he doesn't like my pet. Then there's my dog Whisky snarls at him whenever he comes within chain-length; and I believe in dogs, Tom. I had a stand-up fight with him the day before yesterday. He said something to Liz that made her cry; so I gave him a thrashing, and told him I would have nothing more to do with him. I knew you were knocking about in these parts, and I determined to come and find you."

"Did you bring the child in the wheelbarrow?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied, "it is in the bush, half a mile away, with my swag, and Whisky is taking care of them. No one must know where you are going. What do you say to packing up your swag, and starting right off?"

My swag did not take long putting together, and Bill, taking the little girl, who was half asleep and half awake, in his arms, led the way into the bush.

We traveled the whole of that night, lest we should be tracked, taking it in turns to wheel the little girl, who slept soundly all the time. It was a beautiful starlight night, and as we went along, Cranky Bill pointed out lots of likely-looking places, that had never had a pick put in them to prove if there was gold there or not. I wanted to stop and try some of them, but Bill kept urging me on, and would not listen to an hour's delay. We lay quiet, and slept by snatches during the next day, and at night we pursued our journey. Well, about midnight, we came to the gully. We had been traveling for two or three hours over a heavy rocky range, and what with the steepness of the hill, and the weight of our swags, and the wheelbarrow with little Liz in it (although she often got out and walked, or was carried in our arms a bit), it was awful work, I can tell you. At last we got to the top, and there beneath us, some five hundred yards down, was the gully. It was scarcely a gully: it looked to me, when I first saw it, for all the world like a large basin, shut in by the steep ranges. You would have thought there was no outlet from it, unless you climbed over the hills; but when you got down, you discovered two or three artful little turns, which took you to other gullies and basins, almost as queer-looking as this. As we walked down, Bill showed me his tent, and said that he should not wonder if his mate was sleeping in it. Sure enough, as we came near out he rushed with a revolver in his hand, and he let one barrel fly at Whisky, who had sprung at him the moment he made his appearance.

"Lie down, Whisky," said Cranky Bill, seizing the dog by the collar: "and you, Ted, put down that revolver, or I'll wring your neck for you."

And, almost on the words, Bill let go the dog, and jumped on the fellow, wrested the revolver from his hands, and sent him spinning a dozen yards away. It was not too soon done, for I believe he would have shot us in another minute. He was a desperate-looking fellow, was Teddy the Tyler. I heard some queer stories about him afterward.

"You murdering villain, you," said Bill, as Teddy the Tyler rose from the ground, with an evil look, and shook himself; "what do you mean by pointing your pistol at me like that? Do you know you might have shot my little girl?"

She was standing at his side, and clinging to him, trembling with fear.

"A good job if I had," muttered Teddy the Tyler, vindictively.

Cranky Bill strode quickly up, and seizing him by the shirt-collar, forced him to the ground by dint of sheer muscular strength.

"Now, just you listen to me," he said, as Teddy lay helpless at his feet. "If ever you raise your hand against me, or my little girl, or my mate, or my dog, or anything that belongs to me, I'll break your infernal back for you; I will, by the Lord!"

"What do you bring loafers into the gully for?" growled Teddy.

"That's my business," answered Bill; "this is my mate now, and if you call him a loafer again, I'll knock your ugly teeth down your throat. But I'm not going to have anything more to do with you. I make you a present of the gully; I know a better one—ah! you may stare, but you'll not put your foot into it, my lad. To-morrow morning I shall take my tent away, and you can work here by yourself till you rot, if you like. I don't think you are fool enough to get the place rushed, for that would put an end to your little game. Pick up that revolver, Tom, and stick it in your belt. Throw out of the tent everything that belongs to the thief."

I carried his blankets and some clothes out to him, and threw them down, while he stood scowling.

"There's another thing in there," he said; "there's my neckerchief."

And I flung him a bright-colored handkerchief which he wore round his neck. As he slung it carelessly over his shoulders the light of the moon caught it, and I noticed particularly the combination of bright colors in which it was woven.

"Ain't you going to give me my revolver?" he asked, sulkily.

"Not likely, my lad," replied Cranky Bill; "you might find too much use for it."

"All right," he said. "But just you look out, Bill; I'll make this the worst night's work for you that you have ever done. If I don't make you smart for this, may I be——"

We did not take any more notice of him, but, putting the chain on Whisky, we went into the tent, and lay down till morning.

We were up with the lark, and out. As we passed along the gully, I noticed that Teddy the Tyler had put up a sort of mimi, and was asleep under it.

"Now, then, Tom," said my mate, "I'll show you a place that will open your eyes. That fool there doesn't know anything about it. You remember the old school-boy maxim, that 'cheating never thrives.' Upon my word, I believe it to be true; for if I had not found out that he was a cheat and a thief, I would have shown him a better gully than this one."

Coming to the end of a gully, we walked over a little bit of a rise, Bill leading the way, through a heavy clump of timber on the other side. We might have gone half a mile, when Bill clapped his hands before my eyes, and told me not to look. We might have walked a hundred yards further, when he took his hand away, and told me to open my eyes. It was a strange-looking spot, to be sure. It was a steep gully, that seemed to have been scooped out of the range, and it was just the shape of a saddle.

"Look here, Tom," said Cranky Bill, stooping down before the stump of what had been a large tree, and scraping up the earth from the roots; "here's a couple of pennyweights," and he held up a little nugget he found in the dirt. "We shall get some heavy nuggets in the saddle."

Well, to cut a long story short, we removed the tent here, and commenced sinking. Talk of jewelers' shops! One of our claims took the shine out of all of them. And as day after day went, and our bags got heavier and heavier, I began to talk to Bill about going home, and buying a farm, and settling down. It was all settled. We were to live together, and the girl was to grow up into a beautiful young woman, and get married, and then we were to take care of the children—and she used to listen to us, and laugh, and clap her little hands—lord! when I think of those five weeks we worked together, I can scarcely believe that what took place afterward was real. How I loved that dear little angel! She called me Father Tom; and every night, as she knelt by the crib we had made for her, she used to wind up her prayers with "God bless dear papa and Father Tom, and make me a good child!" Then, on Sundays, we would take a walk and gather wild flowers; and Bill, in the evening, would read a chapter out of the Bible. Do you know, mates, that I don't think Sunday on the diggings is at all properly spent. I know lots of diggers who make a practice of spending it in sly grog-shanties and nobblerizing. I don't know where the fault lies; but it's true enough there's something wrong. Those Sundays with Bill and his little girl are never out of my thoughts. I wish I could spend my Sundays now as I did then.

During this time we had only seen Teddy the Tyler once. About a fortnight after we started working, he came strolling upon us in the after part of the day. A tin dish, with nearly a pound of gold in it, was lying by the claim, and as he came up, he threw a woefully covetous look at it. I should tell you that the little girl was asleep in the tent.

"What do you want here?" asked my mate. We were both at the top of the claim.

"Nothing particular," he said. "I came to see how you're getting on."

He had his pick and shovel hanging over his shoulder, and, walking past the claim we were working, he stuck his pick in the ground, and began tucking up his shirt-sleeves.

Cranky Bill went up to him, and, taking the pick and shovel, pitched them a dozen yards off.

"Do you remember me telling you that you shouldn't come into this gully?" he asked.

"You might say what you pleased," said Teddy the Tyler. "It is as much mine as your's. I mean to fight for it, mate, at all events."

"That's fair," said Cranky Bill. "If you lick me, we'll give you our claim, and get another. Tom, come and see fair play."

And to it they went. But Teddy the Tyler might as well have stood up against a rock as against my mate. Bill was the strongest man I ever saw, and he gave Teddy such an awful thrashing that he threw up his arms in less than a quarter of an hour.

"Had enough, mate?" asked Bill, coolly.

Teddy did not reply, but shouldering his pick and shovel, he walked away without a word, throwing a devil's look behind him, though, as he went.

"He'd murder us, if he could," I said.

"I dare say," said Bill; "but we won't give him the chance."

You would hardly believe, would you, that in five weeks we got eleven hundred ounces of gold? We did, though; and then something happened that makes my blood shiver to think of. I had started the night before to get some provisions; we used to start off in the night, so that we should not be discovered, and when we went to the station early in the morning for meat and flour, the people did not suspect we had been walking all the previous night. I was the whole day getting back, for I took my time, and kept my eyes well about me, to see that I was not followed. I was within half a mile of our gully, when who should I meet but Cranky Bill, looking like a madman. Running up to me, he said, wildly:

"Tom, for God's sake, answer me quickly; have you seen Lizzie?"

"No," I said, while an uncomfortable feeling rose at my throat.

"She's lost! She's lost!" he screamed. "Oh, my pet, my darling! if I don't find you, may the world be burned, and all that's in it!"

I really thought he was going mad. I had a deal to do to keep myself cool, for I was full of fears, and you know I loved the little thing as if she were my own daughter. When I got him a bit calm, I said, as quietly as I could:

"Let us be cool, Bill, and we shall have a chance of finding her. If we don't keep our wits together, we might be her death."

"I know! I know!" he said, repressing his agitation. "What are we to do?"

"First, when did you miss her?"

"This morning," he replied. "I got up at daylight, and left her sleeping in her crib. I kissed her before I went out. I shall never kiss her again! I shall never kiss her again!" And he broke out into a passionate fit of sobbing.

I waited quietly until this was over, and then I told him to go on.

"I came back to breakfast, and she was gone; and the dog had been taken off his chain, and was gone, too. I've been looking for her all day, and I shall never see her any more!"

"I am glad the dog was with her," I said. "How long is it since you were at the tent?"

"I was there an hour ago; but all this talking will not bring her back. Let's search for her. Perhaps she has climbed over the range, and is lost in the bush."

"She could never do it—she hasn't strength enough, the dear little thing, to get to the top. Now, Bill, listen to me. I am cooler than you are, and I intend to keep cool; although I'd give my legs and arms rather than any hurt should come to her, I am not going to let my feelings run away with me. If I am to assist you, I must know everything. Let us go back at once to the tent, and start from there. Here's my hand, Bill, and I'll search till I drop before I give her up."

He took my hand, and we went back to the tent. The first thing I did was to look at the dog's chain. It had been unlocked in the usual manner, and the key was lying on the table.

"That's plain proof," I said, "that Lizzy herself let him loose, and took him out with her. Had she all her things on?"

Yes, her hat and mantle were gone, and also a little basket which she used to take with her sometimes, and fill with wild flowers.

"You see," I said, "she went out flower-gathering. Now, which way did she go?"

I was puzzled for a few moments, and then I thought she would probably take the road she knew best; and that was the one that led to the gully, Cranky Bill had first worked. There was a creek on the road, pretty deep in some parts, and I jumped at the idea at once that she might have fallen in. All this time Bill was behaving in a most dreadful manner. He took up the little things that belonged to her, and kissed them over and over again. He called her by name, as if she could hear him; spoke of his dead wife, as if she were standing before him; and, altogether, he was about as useless as a man well could be. Then, taking a match-box, half filled with gold, he threw it on the ground, shouting—

"To the devil with all the gold! Devil gold! Devil gold! Why did I come here and lose my pet for you? Oh, Lord! take all the gold, and give me back my daughter."

"Come along, Bill," I said, without appearing to pay any heed to his ravings, for I knew that was best; "I am going to the creek to look for her."

"She hasn't fallen in!" he cried. "How do you know she has fallen in? It's not true! My little pet is not drowned! No! No!"

"I don't say she is drowned," said I. "God forbid that she is! Behave like a man, Bill, and keep your senses about you, or we may as well give her up altogether."

You see, I could not help speaking so to him, and after a time I got him to be a little more reasonable. Then we started to walk to the creek. I searched carefully all the way, but could see nothing that would give me the slightest clue. When we got to the creek, Bill absolutely shook with fear. We tracked it up and down for a long way without any success, and then we sat on the bank, looking at each other.

"Don't be cast down, Bill," I said, after a little consideration; "she can't be drowned."

"How do you know that?" he asked, moodily.

"Why, the dog can swim," I answered, "and if he could not have saved her, he would be somewhere about." And then, as a sudden thought came into my mind, I said, "Bill, have you been to Teddy the Tyler?"

He gave a sudden jump, and turning quite white, he whispered:

"Why, do you think—"

"I don't think anything," I interrupted, decidedly. "Let us go and see him."

So we walked in silence to Teddy the Tyler's tent. It was late in the evening now, and Teddy was sitting by a log fire, smoking his pipe. He barely looked up as we approached, but I noticed that he drew near to him with his foot an ax that was lying on the ground.

"Good evening, mate," I said, by way of commencement, although I felt more inclined to throttle him than be civil to him. As for Bill, he was trembling with excitement. There was a gleam in his eyes I did not like, and I knew that I must keep myself cool for his sake.

Teddy did not reply to my good evening, but still sat smoking. He had one eye on the ax, though; I didn't miss that.

"Are you deaf?" I asked.

"No," he snapped. "Are you?"

"Look here, mate," I said—

"And look you here, mate," he interrupted, "I don't want any of your good evenings, or any of your company. What are you loafing about my gully for? I'll split your skull open if you stop here much longer."

"Keep a civil tongue in your head, mate," said I. "We've come here especially to see you, and I am going to ask you a question or two. You will have to answer them, my lad, or you will never answer another."

"You can ask a thousand questions, if you like," said Teddy; "you won't get me to answer one."

"We shall see," I replied. "We are in search of little Lizzie. She has not been home all day. Have you seen her?"

Cranky Bill had been quiet all this time, but had never moved his eyes off Teddy. He did not seem to like this, didn't Teddy, and he shifted his position more than once. When I put the question to him, he gave us both a sharp, quick look, but made no answer.

"Have you seen Lizzie?" I repeated. "Has she been here to-day?"

Still no answer.

Suddenly, Bill made a spring at him, but Teddy was on his legs in an instant, brandishing the ax over his head. Bill avoided the blow, catching the handle on his arm, and, closing with Teddy, had him on the ground in no time, with his knee on his chest, and his hand at his throat.

"Hold off, Bill!" Teddy choked out. "Take the madman off, or he'll throttle me!"

"Answer that question," shouted Bill, loosing his grasp a little; "if you don't, I'll kill you!"

"She hasn't been here to-day," the fellow gasped.

"Have you seen her anywhere, you devil?" said Bill.

"No," was the sullen reply.

"You may get up," said Bill, rising; "I believe you are lying, you thieving knave. If I find that you are, I'll tear your heart out. Mark me, Teddy the Tyler, if I discover that you have seen my girl to-day, and have been telling us lies, you shall cry blood. Come away, Tom—the sight of him turns me sick."

We had a weary night of it. We searched in every likely place: we lighted fires on every little rise, so that they might catch the child's eye if she was anywhere near; but when the morning came, we were as far off finding her as ever. What puzzled me most, was the absence of the dog. We could find no trace of him. If anything had happened to the child, I thought, his instinct would surely have led him back to the tent. We came home tired and disheartened. We had not eaten a morsel the whole night. Bill, I don't believe, had tasted food since he first missed her. He had not even smoked a pipe. I was thinking to myself what we should do next, when my mate, who had thrown himself upon the ground, said in a low voice, as if he was frightened that any one should hear him, "Tom, we have not looked down the claims."

The idea that our little girl might be lying at the bottom of one of the holes, dying, turned me quite faint.

I jumped up without a word, and we recommenced our search. Bill was terribly shaky, every fresh hole we came to. I went down myself, so as to save him the shock; and I cannot tell you the relief I felt when I came up from the last hole, without finding her.

"Let's go to the old gully, and look there," said Bill.

And we went in silence. The sun was just rising over the hills, and the laughing cockatoo was waking everything up with its gurgling laughter. Teddy the Tyler was not out of bed, so I first went down the claim he was then working. I suppose the noise disturbed him, for he came presently, half undressed, and looked over the claim. Bill was standing at the top, and Teddy had just come as I climbed out of the hole. He began cursing, and asked what we wanted now.

"It's only fair to tell him," said Bill. "We're looking for my Liz. She might have tumbled down one of the claims, you know."

I noticed Teddy's lips turn white. But he commenced again grumbling and swearing, and we left him. We searched every hole in the gully, but found nothing; and then we went away. I noticed that Teddy was watching us all the time.

And now, mates, something happened that I have thought of a hundred times since with wonder. I was a better man then than I am now, for you see I had the impression of those Sundays, with the chapters out of the Bible, and the quiet walks with little Lizzie full upon me. And I thought at that time that God Almighty had assisted us to the end of our search. We had got out of Teddy the Tyler's gully, and were passing a gum-tree, upon which half a dozen laughing cockatoos were perched. As we passed, they all set up a laugh, which, somehow or other, so grated upon me, that I threw my stick at them and sent them flying away. I went to pick up my stick, which had fallen to the ground a good distance off, when I noticed an abrupt turn in the range, leading to a gully. Knowing we had not searched there, I called out to Bill, and we walked down the declivity.

"Look, Bill," I said, "some one has been prospecting. Here's a six-foot hole."

And I put my feet at the side to go down. Before I reached the bottom, I saw that our search was over. There lay our little girl, with her face turned upward, as if she were asleep. I could not distinguish the expression of her features, and, indeed, I did not stop time enough, for directly I saw what was below, I came out of the hole again.

"Well, Tom?" said Bill; and then seeing something in my face, for I was awfully white and fear-struck, he added, "for God's sake, speak, Tom, is she there?"

"She is, Bill," I said, as quietly as I could, "but be steady, lad, be steady; let us get her up first. Don't give way, Bill, as you love your dear little one; don't give way yet a while."

And all the time I was speaking, I was getting the rope ready to raise her. Bill was shaking and quivering all over, but he stopped himself and gave me what assistance he could, and in a very short time she was lying at the top of the claim. As she lay with her eyes turned blindly to the sun, I could scarcely believe she was dead. In her innocent young face the roses were still blooming, and my eyes brimmed over as I saw grasped in her pretty little hands the remains of a few wild flowers she had been gathering. I stooped and kissed her pure fresh lips. Then I turned away, for my emotion was overcoming me.

"Oh, my darling! my darling!" I heard Bill say. "You are not dead. Look at me—speak to me, my pet. Throw your arms round my neck!" and he pressed her to his breast, with a fierce eagerness, and kissed her a thousand times. "She can't be dead, Tom. Feel her heart—is it not beating? Feel, feel, I say!"

I placed my hand upon her heart to please him, but its pulse was stilled for ever.

"Bill," I said, solemnly, for it was an awful thing, was the sight of that dear angel, lying dead upon the grass, "she's dead. She has gone to a better world than this."

"Dead!" he cried, springing to his feet, and throwing his arms wildly about him. "Then strike me dead, too!"

And he looked up, as if expecting a thunderbolt to fall upon him.

"Hush, Bill," I said; "do not blaspheme at such a time as this. It is God's will, and she has gone to Him."

He threw himself upon her body again. He clasped her in his arms—he nursed and rocked her, as if she were asleep—he called her by every endearing name; and then, as if awaking to the fact that she was dead, he sprang up and screamed wildly:

"How did she die, Tom? Who killed her? Do you hear me? Who killed her?"

I was hurrying away, when he seized my arm.

"Where is the dog, Tom?" he cried. "Where is the dog?"

And he tore about like a madman in search of the dog. I looked for it, too, for the absence of that dog was a thing I could not understand. I heard Bill's voice, calling out that he had got it from a clump of bush hard by; and presently he came up to me, and laid poor Whisky dead at my feet. The dog had been shot through the heart.

"Who shot him?" he asked, a little more quietly. "You see he's been shot. Who did it? Whoever killed the dog, killed my child!"

I knelt down and examined the dog's body. It was quite stiff, and had something in its mouth. Forcing the jaws apart, I took it out, and recognized it immediately. It was a piece of the colored silk handkerchief I had thrown out of the tent to Teddy the Tyler, the first night we came to the gully. The dog had evidently torn it away savagely, for shreds of it were sticking in its teeth.

"There has been foul play here, Bill," I said.

"I know, I know!" he exclaimed, impatiently. "Whose handkerchief is that off, Tom? I want to hear you say the name. Out with it, man!"

"That is a piece of Teddy the Tyler's handkerchief," I said.

But I could say no more, for Crankey Bill had dashed off like a madman in the direction of Teddy's tent. Although I followed him at once, I could not keep pace with him, and when I got to the gully, I saw Teddy flying up the range, with Cranky Bill tearing after him. Teddy, who had a revolver in his hand, turned round twice and fired at Bill. The last time he did so Bill staggered, but recovered himself in an instant. The range, as I told you, was very steep, and as they scrambled up, Bill gained ground rapidly. Just before they got to the top, my mate seized Teddy and grappled with him. Then commenced such a struggle as I never wish to see again; and, presently, down they dashed, one over another, locked in each other's arms. I ran up to the spot where I knew they must fall; and although they came down with a crash, they were not separated. They were both dead. Bill had been mortally wounded by the pistol-shot, but he had such a grasp on Teddy's neck that I could not loosen his fingers. And that was the end of Cranky Bill and poor little Lizzie. I did not stop any longer by myself in the place, you may be sure; but I went and told the story, and in twenty-four hours five hundred men were working in what was called—how it got the name or who bestowed it, I can't tell—Madman's Gully from that time.

I buried little Lizzie and Cranky Bill in one grave, and the miners helped me to put a fence round it; and that is the end of my story.

SOME SCIENTIFIC ITEMS.

On the 4th of January Dr. L. Tietjen, of the Observatory of Berlin, whilst observing the 85th small ultra-zodiacal planet, which was discovered in September last by Mr. Dolman, made the discovery of another, the 86th, belonging to this remarkable series of planets, which have been found during the present century between Mars and Jupiter.

A crystalized mass of gold, weighing 201 ounces, has recently engaged the attention of mineralogists in this city, to which it was sent from El Dorado county, California. The crystals, mostly imperfect, are strangely grouped, and have some peculiarities which are worth studying. The value is $4,000.

Students interested in the geology of California will be glad to learn that a thick octavo volume has been published by authority of the Californian Legislature, containing a report of progress and synopsis of field work in the Geological Survey of the State, from 1860 to 1864. It purports to be the first volume of a series; and, judging from its contents, geologists will have no reason to complain that they cannot get full particulars of the interesting subject on which it treats.

Some readers will remember that, during the laying of the Atlantic Cable last year, a number of suggestions and speculations were offered as to the cause of failure. One of the most plausible was a magnetic storm; and this is now supported by an American telegraphist, who, having made observations on the effect of the aurora on 100 miles of wire, is led to the conclusion that, on some occasions, the "auroral energy" is equal to more than 32,000,000 horse-power for each cubic mile of space. In communicating his observations to the American Journal of Sciences and Arts, he remarks:

"When we remember that the effects of this aurora, or magnetic storm, were felt in England, as noticed by Mr. Airy, and probably upon the Atlantic Cable then being laid, we can, in some degree, realize what mighty energies may be at play around us, and yet their effects be as harmless as the silvery moonbeams."

A remarkable instance of the conversion of mechanical motion into heat is recorded in the Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences (Boston). A turbine working in a race led from the Merrimac river, and supplying the motive power to one of the Lowell cotton factories, was observed to be irregular in its motion. On examination, it appeared that the "steady-pin," at the lower end of the shaft, made of steel, two and a half inches diameter, and working in a box of case-hardened iron, was actually fused, although it had been constantly plunged in the race, through which 75 cubic feet of water rushed every second—4,500 feet per minute. The pin and portions of the iron box were exhibited at a meeting of the Academy, and on each the signs of fusion were clearly apparent. The moving power of a turbine is known to be great; but here we see it converted into heat, which, in defiance of the rapid stream of water, rose to the temperature of the welding point of iron. That heat is but a mode of motion is a question that has worthily occupied the attention of Dr. Joule and other mechanical philosophers, and to them we commend this new and striking illustration.

At a recent meeting of the American Philosophical Society, it was stated that the native Flora of Pennsylvania was rapidly yielding to the inroads of a foreign Flora. Plants which one of the leading botanists in the United States had described as rare, were becoming plentiful, and had taken possession of the valley of the Susquehanna. Numerous plants, not indigenous, had appeared in the yard of the convict prison at Philadelphia. In this instance, the strangers were supposed to have been introduced in the wool brought in for manufacture by the convicts; but the change of the Flora on the large scale was attributed to the spread of railways; and some of the botanists present at the meeting expressed their opinion that the "foreign" Flora would supplant the native in a comparatively short period.

Congelation of Animals.—We some time ago gave an account of a series of curious experiments instituted by M. Pouchet, the learned physiologist of Rouen, France, with a view to determine the real effects of intense cold on the animal frame. The same author has now communicated to the Academy of Sciences another series of experiments intended to show the peculiar effects of cold on the blood. As it had hitherto been held that congelation did not necessarily cause death, it became important to prove that death was inevitable by the complete disorganization of the globules of the blood. M. Pouchet remarks that if this proposition be true, then, if half the body of an animal be congealed, its life will not be in danger so long as the state of congelation exsits, because the blood remains stagnant in the congealed part, and does not mix with that which occupies the part still in motion; and that on the other hand, death will take place as soon as the congealed part is thawed and the vitiated blood can mingle with the other. To demonstrate this, M. Pouchet introduced an eel, three decimetres long, into a tube, leaving one-third of the body free, and exposing the rest to a cold of 15 degrees centigrade below freezing point. After a lapse of two hours the eel was taken out perfectly alive, its posterior portion alone being thoroughly congealed and as hard as a stone. This eel died half an hour after having regained its normal temperature. Another eel, on the contrary, treated as before, was left in the apparatus, and continued to live in it for six hours. The blood of a third eel was examined after one half of it had been congealed as before, and then thawed, and it was found that its blood contained an enormous quantity of nuclei and disorganized globules. A fourth eel was completely congealed for the space of two hours, and the heart being afterward examined, was found to contain nothing but nuclei, save a very small proportion of nuclei that had escaped disorganization. M. Pouchet sums up his results as follows: 1. The first effect of congelation is to contract the capillary vessels. 2. The second effect is to disorganize the blood in three ways: either the nucleus breaks from its envelope and floats freely in the plasma; or, though still in its envelope, it is opaque and in an eccentric position; or, lastly, the globule is only more or less serrated on the border, and of a darker hue, the latter case being chiefly that of mammalia. 3. Every animal that has been thoroughly congealed is absolutely dead and cannot be revived. 4. When the congelation is but partial, the organ that has been exposed to it is attacked with gangrene and destroyed. 5. If the congelation is of small extent, life is not in imminent danger.

BEATING THE BARS.

O MORNING air! O pale, pure dirt!
Wing and consume my bonds away!
This stifling stench of sordid flesh
Shuts in my spirit from the Day!

Through sudden chinks the radiance blinks,
And drives the winged creature wild;
She hears rejoice each ringing voice,
She guesses at each happy child.

In fleeting glints are shining hints
Of freer beings, good and glad,
Her dream can trace each lovely face,
Each form in lofty beauty clad.

She hears the beat of joyous feet
That have no fetters; fear no thorn
And almost feels the breeze that steals
From out the ever-growing morn.

She hears the flow of voices low,
And strains to catch the half-known tongue;
She hears the gush of streams that rush
Their thrilling waters into one.

With longing sighs, her baffled eyes
She sets to turn the cruel bars to stars
With frantic heats her wings she beats,
And breaks them on the stubborn bars.

"O Light!" she cries, "unseal mine eyes,
Or blind me in thine ardent glow!
O Life and Death! O Life in Death!
O bonds! dissolve and let me go.

'Let drop this cruel of cankering rust.
The only crown my brow hath won;
Shake off the sears of briny tears,
And dry my pinions in the sun!"

The Spectre of Cliffe;

CHAPTER I.—THE SCENE THROUGH THE SKYLIGHT.

THERE are some men, whom one cannot help envying, that wit as readily execute a duty as confer a benefit or a pleasure; who feel no embarrassment whatever in having to say a disagreeable thing, and whose facility for managing unpleasant matters with a high hand should commend itself (and yet somehow fail to do so) to public admiration. There are others, again, who shrink from giving pain to their fellow-creatures, as from a surgical operation, or homicide, and unreservedly from high, or even benevolent motives, but because their natures are sensitive, delicate and selfish—what you will—epicurean.

Although Ralph Clifford was a good man (as good men went in those days), he was one of these. Such a kind heart, and withal such a wounded nobody's feelings, if he could have helped it; but if somebody must needs be offered the cold shoulder, it was not likely to be that person upon whom his own happiness and comfort principally depended: it was likely to be that person least of all. Expediency and convenience, as well as doting fondness, all combined together to make his wife's will a law unto him, and to cause him to look coldly upon the nonsuccour she had cut off from her good graces. But, at the same time, he would never knowingly have committed an injustice to please her; and it was very possible that even to do what was harsh. Thus, when he invited his second son to sup with him in his own turret-chamber, with the object of telling him that he was not wanted at home, the Master of Cliffe did look forward to a pleasant evening. His conscience pricked him, and the milk of human kindness flowed forth from the wound toward poor Raymond. Nevertheless the interview, he was patient in listening to what the young man had to say for himself; and even when that defense took something of the form of accusation of Mrs. Clifford herself, he suffered him to say on.

"I do not deny, son Raymond," rejoined the old man, pacing the little chamber to and fro with his hands behind him, "that you have something to complain of. Your stepmother has, I fear, been somewhat remiss; while you, Ray, on the other hand, are not of a conciliatory disposition. There are troubles enough threatening this house without the accession of this unnatural dissension—I cannot bear it. I have come to the conclusion that, for the present at least, it will be better that you should absent yourself; there is an excellent thing for a young man of your age, I spend, therefore, the next few months or a year abroad. When you have quite a lesson need to be very ambitious of military honors—what say you to a commission in his majesty's Foot Guards? Money, dear Ray, you may be sure, will never be a subject upon which we shall disagree. At my death, you will at once succeed to your mother's little private, but by no means small, again. I have not forgotten you in my will, Ray; and in the meantime—I wish you to want for nothing—here are notes to a considerable amount—"

"What! father; am I to leave Cliffe at once? Even a servant is not thus turned out of doors without warning!"

"Nay, lad; I mean not that: a week hence, nay, a month, if you will have it so; there shall be no haste, no harshness. There are arrangements to be made, of course, friends to be written to, interest to be made."

Raymond looked at his father with a sad and pitying smile; he was not angry, though deeply grieved; he will knew that the old man was mentally contending, not with him, but with another not then present.

Ralph mistook his glance. "Is the money not enough, good lad? Then let me double it. Heaven knows I have grudged thee nothing."

"Nothing but your love, father," returned the young man, reproachfully: "and now you have it not to give me. I trust that she who has won it all away from me, may not require you ill for so much good fortune."

"Raymond, you do me wrong; I love you, boy; how should I not have love for my own son?"

"Ay, how should you not?" returned the young man, bitterly. "The babe you danced upon your knee so often—your black birdie! The child you took before you upon your pommel for many a breezy ride? The boy whose light-hearted laugh, you said, was the only music you cared to listen to? How should you not, indeed? And yet you have forgotten all these things?"

"No, Ray, no—I have not forgotten them," answered the old man, hurriedly, patting the stripling's head with his great hand. "No one will ever love you so, Ray, as I love you. Ray—dear Ray! Never weep, lad; that is not like a Clifford."

"Who can see me weep, save thee?" returned the young man, passionately. "But I have a heart, which some have not, believe me, who can weep when they please."

Ralph Clifford knit his brows.

"Hush!" said he. "That is Mildred playing in the organ gallery, is she not? How strangely it swells forth into the summer night; something divine seems gathering in my soul, but without power to put out."

He placed his hand upon his heart and sighed, then listened in silence, with his eyes turned to the unrelieved wood and stone ceiling.

"Father, since I am to leave you," continued Raymond, earnestly, "I trust that you will listen to a last few words, which may be the very last that will ever pass between us."

They may be, indeed," returned the old man, still gazing into the night. "Some day a crowing near when I shall be but a memory to thee, Raymond; then think upon me as tenderly as thou canst."

"Say not so, father: you are yet strong and hale; I trust there are many happy years——"

"Stay!" interrupted the Master of Cliffe, with quick scorn. "How should a Clifford having a son be happy? I speak not of thee, Ray; thy light and wayward nature may be somewhat out of tune with mine, and may vex and anger others; but there is nothing in thee to cause the current of a father's blood to freeze."

Nor in Rupert, neither," answered the young man, resolutely. "The organ pealed and thundered; "although it may be some one's interest to make his father think so. What I would say to you, father, has nothing to do with my interests, and are words of warning, not of hate, upon mine honor."

"Being thus pressed, I cannot refuse thee, Raymond; yet remember that it is the last draught which leaves its flavor on the palate, and men are not to be enjoined for the sins which they do not their friends its lees at parting. My heart is toward thee, Raymond; it is, indeed. I pray thee then to hear me well and as we shortly separate."

"That must be light love, father, which is so lightly left," returned the young man, bitterly—"and though I prize it—being all that I may claim, it seems—yet I will not be forbidden. If I tell you lies, I will give you leave to hate me, nay, if I do not prove that I speak truth, then you shall hate me still."

"Prove what,, Raymond?" asked the old man, with kindling eyes. "Trust me, having said so much, you cannot go to sleep to midnight, and need my rest, you shall say all."

Above his hoarse deep tones, the organ, "yearning like a god in pain," thundered and thundered.

"I will prove then, father, that the sad story of our race, and of its curse, has been made the handle of deadly and damning wrong; or perhaps you have seen so often is no illusion indeed, but verse—the cruel trick of a guileful woman; that the Fair Lady of the Shroud—the spectre of the Glorious Work" here broke forth jubilant and full, and stormed about their ears in wild acclaim —"that the haunting fear of Cliffe is not a bad blood—nay, is the woman whom you have made your wife, to dupe and fool you— Strike, father, strike me, I say, but hear me, then, do but me thine eyes!"

Raymond opened a little door in the Turret Chamber, which gained upon the castle leads, and flung it wide.

"Follow me," cried he, "and cast me down upon the stones of yonder court-yard if I do not prove my words!"

With hasty and uneven steps, his hair streaming in the autumn wind, his bronzed face pale with rage and expectation of he knew not what, the Master of Cliffe followed upon his younger son. The moon was small, and hidden at times by the flying clouds; but there was light enough to show the dark outline of the vast and vast expanse of roofing, diverse in form as any frozen sea—here level—there ridged; here rising to peep down at them, and there with pinnacles and gables. The various periods of the stately place were pictured there to the antiquarian eye in horizontal section; not a ray from within was to be seen save in one spot, to which they were rapidly directing near; this shone through a small, unstained-glass light, and was illuminated by the junction of two towers. Three hideous gargoyles leaned from their stone bases, as though to peep down at the scene below, and grinned approval.

"One moment, father," cried Raymond, laying his hand upon his arm; "I have staked all on this, and must go through with it; but it is for your sake I have done it—as much, ay, more than for my own. You have a right to look there; but though she was Jezebel herself, I would not play the spy without her husband's leave. That is Mrs. Clifford's private chamber, sir."

"She is not up," returned the old man, hoarsely; "she bade me 'good-night,' ere you joined me at the supper-table."

"She is up, father: that is her light, burning as bright and purely as though it were an altar-candle in the chapel yonder. She is dressing for her part to-night. Look! look!"

For an instant the Master of Cliffe leaned heavily upon the shoulder of his son; then with a great effort he strode forward rapidly, but firmly, and looked through the sky-light upon what was passing in the room beneath. For a few moments there he stood, unmoving, with his head thrust through the sky; then over his face a shadow fell, as falls on him, who, at the crater's mouth, looks his very last upon the wife he loves most utterly—the great eye of anguish, he pressed his hand against his broken heart and fell backward.

Raymond sprang toward him, and, as he did so, could not but see that which had so moved his father. In a small room, and windowless save for the sky-light which he had surveyed her, stood Mrs. Clifford, with her eyes cast upward in terror and despair, while her hand met her husband's downward gaze at the very moment when she, in the quaint black robe in which she was wont to play her youthful part, leaned over her back-hair loose and fallen to her waist, was practicing her rôle before the tire-glass. The shroud was in one hand, and needle and thread in the other, while her face wore a look of triumphant malice, which would have unmasked the foul fiend himself, though safe in sacred precincts. One instant, she stared upward as though spell-bound, and then quenched the light.

Mrs. Clifford had not seen her husband fall: but there were some precious minutes before her yet, she knew. Swiftly she entered the next chamber, which was but a closet containing a large jewel-case from the dressing-table, emptied its glittering contents into her pocket: from a small locked drawer in the same table she took a leathern purse, filled tightly with bank-notes.

"All but—and dream, when I began the board," she muttered, "that I may wherrom to use it was so near, or it would have been thrice as large."

Had the day ended? Was the game quite lost? She paused upon the threshold of her chamber, and worried her own fair lips with her sharp teeth, till they ached. The expression of her husband's face had been unmistakable—a fish shattered, love misplaced, unutterable pain and woe, had been the shadow entered there. He had been undeceived with a vengeance. That other form, too, she had seen was Raymond's—her husband's favorite son—and, doubtless, that she was indebted for this evil turn. She had been baffled, beaten by that hateful boy. That was the bitterest drop in the cup. How came he wandering on the leads at midnight in that fashion? So doubtless, however, it had happened, by some chance, that he had brought his father to look likewise. Curse the cunning boy! And yet, was she not herself to blame, running such a risk at all? Patience—small, of such unmitigable ruin. Why had she not put up a blind? Why use a light at all? Could Mildred have betrayed her? Her face blackened at the thought. No, she dared not have done it. Her trembling fingers, had she been privy to the treason, would have broken out these organ thunders, which even now were swelling through the house, as if in mad playing, and therefore her aunt could not make out, as she had meant to do, through the great gallery. She opened another drawer, and took out letters. She did not wish to meet a human being; she would leave Cliffe and all it held, and begin life again elsewhere. She had gone through a bad post, and had had been at first, but, alas! here was Rupert coming, and at speed, in the narrow passage; there was no time for escape after him.

"Make haste!" cried he—"quick—quick!"

He spoke impatiently, and seemed scarce to comprehend his own speech and motion seemed to fall him all upon a sudden: with mouth agape with terror, and eyes starting from their sockets in a stood dumb, looking from below to Ray, with fear and loathing, as from some terrible and unclean thing, he turned and fled.

For a moment Mrs. Clifford watched him with irresolute eyes.

"I forget my strange attire," she muttered; "the fool takes me for the Fair Lady; he thinks I am the harbinger of death. How were it if I really be so, Ray? Nay, nay, sighing," said he. Perhaps his heart has killed him, as he always thought it would. If so, all may yet be well. My son is not a man to betray me. Who will believe an idle tale like this, vouched for but by a dead man and a boy? I will put by this masquerading gear, and return to the arms of a tender wife once more. If I have the smoothing of Ralph Clifford's pillow, another dawn shall never trouble his vexed soul again."

Hastily she put away her black garment in a safe and secret place, and seized herself in the dress she had worn that evening; then, stepping forth into the now vacant gallery, took the way that led to the chamber where her husband had stepped, and where a crowd of many voices and the tramp of many feet could now be heard.

CHAPTER XI.—OVER THE BODY.

In the same room where father and son had talked together of parting but a few minutes back, Ralph Clifford lay upon a little couch, with Raymond kneeling by his side. Another sort of parting than that of which they had spoken was taking place, and the stiffening fingers could not even return the lad's mute pressure in token of farewell. The mighty chest of the Master of Cliffe still rose and fell, but in uneven spasms, as though his gloomy soul was struggling to flit away. Around stood many a serving man and maid, summoned by those mysterious messengers, Misfortune, that flies so swift and far, and to whom the fleet is but the day. Scarce one of them had ever before ventured to intrude upon his privacy, but now they watched him with reverence, but without fear, setting forth upon that journey which rich and poor must alike make. One groom had already been dispatched for a doctor, another for a priest; but somehow it was known to all that their lord would never open his proud eyes again. They had been kind eyes, for all their pride—the voice, now hushed, had been a voice to speak a precious one to all his household. Some honest tears were falling. There had never, at least, been so good a Clifford as this lad.

"Where is my brother Rupert?" asked Raymond, huskily.

"I told him what had happened, sir," returned a domestic, respectfully, "and he threw on his dressing-gown and started hither as soon as I. He took the passage by my lady's room, meaning to call her by the way——. But here is my lady, sir."

Mrs. Clifford entered very swiftly, with her dress only half fastened, and her hair disheveled, like one suddenly aroused in her preparations for retiring to bed.

"What is the matter?" cried she.

No one answered, but all were sorry for her, and it was strange to see how all became conscious at once of their relative positions, now that the mistress had come. Some even left the room, awakened to the consciousness of having no business there, and fearing sharp rebuke. Quite a great space was left between the little circle of curious domestics and the couch where the young man was still kneeling by his father's side. Had Raymond spoken, he must yet, of course, to her husband had voice to speak? Had the servants withdrawn thus suddenly at her approach from loathing or from pity?

"What has happened to my own dear husband?" murmured she, falling upon her knees beside his head.

"Murder!" returned Raymond, under his breath.

She did not hear him so much as see the movement of his lips, but even without that his stern reproachful eyes would have given her the like answer.

"My poor, poor Ralph!" exclaimed the widow—a widow already setting that mask, which in its signature to our release from all worldly cares, upon the slowly stiffening face—" and am I not to be allowed to share this grief?"

"Touch him not!" hissed Raymond, fiercely. "Have you not heard that when a murdered man approaches the body he kind that slew him, his blood will flow afresh from his drained wounds? Beware, I say! Lay but a finger on his sacred cover, which his son has helped to spread, and I will take thee by the throat and proclaim thy crime!"

He had not, then, at present proclaimed it: the precious time this fool had wasted were golden moments to her indeed. An accusation thus delayed was a confession of half its danger. Why had Raymond spared her?

"For my father's sake," said the young man, answering to her look as it were his own question, "I have spared you hitherto, not because I love you—you fair devil—but that I would not the world should know that my father's and noble heart was cooled. Where is Rupert, madam?"

For the first time in her life, Grace Clifford quailed and shuddered; the concentrated passion with which the young man spoke was terrible to listen to. She was afraid at all events to put on Hats and Gods with their own weapons, but not the plowshare which was revealed in the hand of her stepson. She knew that she stood in danger of that awful Something whose shadow was the shadow of a face—that if she refused to, suit that forehead—already losing its pained look, and growing calm and cold, with her false lips, and her false hair, and her false rings, and her false heart, she would not mind what things he might say against her—her chief peril in that respect was past. She had spoken his powerful brain. Once round her throat, they might not part with it again; it may be that she judged him by herself in that hour, and thought that Raymond's heart took she well might fear. She had once seen Cyril at the Dene look at her brother Gideon much like this lad, just as he drove to cut him down from limb. She had no leaded weapon, as Gideon had, to beat such an assailant back.

"Where is Rupert?" muttered her stepson, furiously; "your presence is pollution—your work is done here. That poor abused fool ear can drink in like no more. Away, I say!"

Mrs. Clifford arose from her knees with as little haste as she dared to use. As she did so, a female servant came over on the outskirts:

"Mr. Rupert is taken very ill, madam. Miss Mildred is with him, and they help, but she bid me tell you as soon as possible. He was coming hither herself, and came upon him lying upon the floor in a swoon, close by his own door, in a fit or something."

"Do you hear this new misfortune, Raymond?" cried Mrs. Clifford.

"Ay, go you to my brother," returned the young man, sternly.

And as she turned away with anguished but fearless eyes, and firm, swift tread, the bystanders murmured to one another: "How wise and strong she is in all this trouble! How dutifully she leaves the beloved dead, for whom she can do no more, to tend the son who was so dear to him."

"In a fit or something," soliloquized the Lady of Cliffe, as she hurried to Rupert's room. "Heaven foresend that I should have frightened the fool to death! My tenure of Cliffe is valueless indeed if it has to be shared by that dark boy you have driven to his death. I will be revenged upon him. He has missed his turn; but when my turn comes round, look to thyself, Raymond Clifford! No man shall make me pale as thou hast done, and live to boast of it. I would that Gideon were here, or Cator, or even the poor coward Clement. This Mildred is scarce safe; she serves me, but it is with grudging. If Rupert lives this bout, he must be married to her, mad or sane. If she denies him—let her, too, look to herself. I have not gone so far to turn back now; and though I be alone, I am yet a match for all of them!"

CHAPTER XII.—THE EXTORTED PROMISE.

Rupert Clifford was very ill, and near to death; but for his stepmother's cunning hand, which bled him ere the leech could reach the castle, Raymond would surely have been heir of Cliffe; while afterward the sick man would have sunk had it not been for her niece. Long weeks elapsed before his head could leave the pillow, where it lay calm and patient while Mildred was in his chamber, and restless, with roving eyes, when she was absent. Her voice revived his failing strength like wine; her hand upon his brow was as the magnetic charm which beckons away all pain, and as the precious drug which dowers the dullest with delicious dreams. It pleased her well to be of service to him; she gave up rest and exercise, and pleasure beyond words to tell (for might not Raymond now have borne her company all day), with cheerful readiness. She was glad at heart that she had such opportunities of proving her good will toward him; she tended him like his own sister; and since she was not his sister, the Lady of Cliffe approved and smiled upon her. Such gentle ministering must, in her aunt's opinion, have, as her own had had, some selfish end; and what end could this be, save one alone? She never called her "Child" now; it was "Mildred, love," or at least "My pretty Mildred," whenever she addressed her niece in Rupert's hearing, as though she would have suggested to his mind the very words which he himself should use.

So helpless and enfeebled was poor Rupert at first, that the young girl thought of nothing but his weakness, and how she might conduce to his recovery. But when the color came back to his cheeks and some vigor to his limbs, and he could sit up and talk to her, Mildred almost regretted her past kindness. He was grateful to her, of course, but with his expressions of gratitude was mingled something warmer, which she could not affect not to understand, and yet which, in Mrs. Clifford's presence, she dared not utterly reject. Though her aunt felt satisfaction at present with her conduct, the girl well knew that only so much the greater would be her hate and fury when she came to learn the truth; nor was Mildred to blame for this dissimulation. It was not a matter with which "moral courage" had anything to do. To have confessed: "I cannot wed Rupert, since I have pledged my faith to Raymond," would have been to produce a catastrophe such as she dared not even picture to herself, since its consequences would certainly have extended to her lover. She feared, with reason, for his very life; and so the poor girl temporized, only too well aware of the passion with which Rupert was consumed; yet trusting that the flame would never gain such head but that her "No" at last might quench it, or at all events procrastinate, as before, the evil day.

The young man's illness, while it weakened his physical strength, seemed to have healed his mental malady. There was nothing now to inspire her with apprehension of his look beside its love, and if returning reason had been indeed vouchsafed him, surely, with his natural generosity to second it, he would withdraw—when her dread hour of confession came—from his unwelcome suit.

Something like this she framed to comfort herself with; but it scarcely fulfilled its office. She could not always forget how insecure was the foundation of this hopeful faith; for not only might Rupert's seeming calmness be untrustworthy, even as matters were, but a revelation was at present withheld from him, which was likely to try it sorely. He had not as yet been told of his father's death. When given to understand that he was ill, he had received the information with quiet sorrow, but without surprise. "I know it," said he, calmly, evidently with reference to the immediate cause of his own ailment, all allusion to which was of course avoided. He meant to say that he had seen the Herald of Calamity in the Fair Lady of Cliffe, and was prepared for domestic misfortune. Still, it was strange that he never asked after his father—laid long since by the side of the Cliffords, mad and sane, in the chapel vault—nor remarked upon the sable suits of all around him. This was not, however, because he had not examined them. One morning, Mrs. Clifford, doubtless by design, having left the room, and the sick man and Mildred being alone together, he addressed her thus. It was the first day he was well enough to leave his bed, and that only for a sofa:

"How soon, think you, after a man has died, may his son marry, Mildred?"

She was in the act of handing him a cup of broth, and her tremulous fingers almost refused their office, as she listened to his words.

"How soon, Mildred?" said he again.

"That is a question, Rupert, which I cannot answer. It depends upon the love that the son bore his father."

"I am thinking of one who would have loved his father well, if there had been room within his heart; but there was no room. There was space for nothing there but love for the girl who was to be his wife. You tremble, dearest, pretty fluttering dove. How soon, how soon, sweet heart?" His languid eyes looked on her earnestly, but without a trace of doubt, as one who in an orchard watches for the ripe fruit to fall between his palms while another shakes the tree. "What sweet revenge thou hast taken on thyself, for thy pretense of cruel hardness, in this long, kind tendance: to be my nurse before thou art my bride—that is rare indeed. I will not think that pain itself could shadow that fair brow, or shrink that dimpled cheek; but if it ever doth, my Mildred, I will wait upon thee, day and night, counting all toil as pleasure, all weariness as blissful rest; and while though hast strength to smile, be overpaid indeed. Smile on me now, and seat thee by my side; for as some Eastern king delights in hearing his own greatness proclaimed to his own ear, so yearn I, Mildred, to hear thee say: 'I love thee,' although none knows thou dost so well as I."

His nerveless hand closed on one glossy curl, and carried it to his lips; while, lapped no less in the sweet assurance of reciprocated love than in the calm content that comes to the recovering frame long racked by sickness, he waited for her answer.

"Rupert," said she, "I thought that the last time we spoke of—the last time, that is, this subject was touched upon by you, we agreed to wait a while before it was resumed. When I then said: 'You are still very young, Rupert,' I did not mean too young by weeks, or even months, but years."

"Am I so young, dear girl?" said he, with a tender smile. "I thank heaven for it. There will be then more time in which to show my love to thee. How happy shall we be together, and how long! Youth is sweet—ah, me, how sweet it is; and after youth, there is the prime; and then beyond the prime is that which I have read is best of all—the calm content of tried and faithful love; two hearts bound up in one, with joys, regrets, and memories in common. My bud—my full-bloomed flower—my rose, whose faded leaves (if thou canst fade) shall be odorous and precious to the end, ah, how I love thee!"

Mildred's heart sank within her. If she had been his wedded wife already, the young man could scarcely have uttered these words with a more settled faith.

"Why speak of this, which we were not to speak of, Rupert?"

"Because, sweet, there is no longer any reason for keeping silence. I am the Master of Cliffe now, and there is none to say me 'nay,' when I say 'yea.' Moreover, I have learned that my good father gave his consent in private to our union, so the very dead will smile upon our nuptials; while your Aunt Grace— Nay, then, I will not mention her, since you mislike her, but she has been a trusty friend to me, Mildred. When the light of love was low within my cheerless heart, she fanned its embers with encouragement; not that she knew why they were so faint and pale; not that she guessed the secret. Ah, you have not forgotten it, I see. I hoped you had, Mildred. There is no need to remember it any more. By thee, fair saint, that demon has been exorcised, I hope."

His voice, so confident hitherto, though low and weak, here wavered and broke off. His hand, which he would have carried to his forehead, failed by the way, and sank down, as it happened, upon hers: then straightway, as though revived, Antæus-like, by that sweet contact, he spoke again.

"She bade me woo thee, since I loved thee so—that surely was no evil counsel, Mildred? and when I found thee cold, she bade me press my suit—did she not do well? 'Twas she that sent thee to me on that morning to her private chamber—"

"I knew it," interrupted the girl, gravely; "and sent thee, too, to Ribble Cave to spy upon thy brother."

"Mildred!"

"Ay, Rupert: she came between Raymond and his own father, and now she would come between Raymond and you. She is the go-between of hate, and not of love; her offices are evil, and not good. The tender mercies of the wicked, Rue, are cruel."

"She is not cruel to me, Mildred, but kind," returned the young man; "and strange it is that, though she stands not in thy favor, it is for thy sake only that she stands in mine. For her I have no more liking than the sailor hath for the biting north wind, whose favoring gale is bearing him to the wished-for haven. She would wreck me, if it suited her purpose, I doubt not; but since her interest and my happiness are fellow-passengers——"

"Be not so sure of that, Rupert Clifford," broke in Mildred, earnestly. "Beware lest there is no pleasant shore awaiting you, no isles of Paradise; beware rather lest she is driving you on the rocks. If she has represented what poor tendance I have paid you in this sickness in any other light than that of sisterly affection and good-will—if she has dared, whether by hint or by outspoken word, to plight my troth to yours, to proxy-wed me, then has she deceived both me and you—nay, more, if she has ever told you that I love you, she has lied!" Her tone, which had been vehement and almost fierce, here melted into pity, as she added, "Rupert, I love you not!"

Stupefied amazement, wretchedness, despair, took each the other's place on Rupert's features as the girl went on; when she had finished, he lay with his white face blank, as though life and passion had left it together. Seriously alarmed, Mildred seized his cold hand, and strove to warm it in her palms; the charm of her touch still worked; the life-blood which had ebbed from his very lips flowed slowly back; and in the rayless eyes a fierce and lurid light began to kindle. Twice his parched tongue essayed to utter something, but she could not catch its meaning; the third time he spoke plain. "Send me the traitress hither. Let her take thy place, and lean above me with her lying smile. I want to whisper something in her ear. Send me that woman hither."

"Hush, hush! I hear her coming, Rue; be calm."

"Calm! with those words of doom still ringing in my ears? Calm—ay; as the tropic sea is calm, beneath whose waveless face the shark awaits the swimmer. Give her thy chair, Mildred—thou who lovest me not."

"You will not tell her, Rupert—that would be base indeed."

"Tell her—ay; just one whisper in her ear. Then, afterward, you may tell her what you like. I have got some news for her to take to Pluto."

"Dear Rupert, for my sake, do her no harm," pleaded Mildred, in an agony of terror. "When I said I loved you not, I meant not yet."

Revenge and cunning, which had held divided sway in the sick man's face, here abdicated together; hope for one moment sat there like a sun, and then was succeeded by suspicion.

"I do not believe thee, Mildred Leigh," answered he, fiercely; "nor will, unless thou swear'st it!"

"Swear'st it!" echoed Mrs. Clifford, entering the room. "Heyday, but I must look to this! My Mildred put upon her oath! When I was young, it was the man who swore, whereby, if troth was broken, he was perjured, but the lady was held blameless. There is no such courtesy in these days. Shame upon you, Rue!"

She stood beside the two, with one small hand on either's shoulder.

"It is not I who am to blame," said Rupert, hoarsely. "Fair mother, wilt thou not sit?"

"Nay," returned Mildred, hastily, "you have not taken your broth yet. Let me tend you a little longer. Mrs. Clifford has been your nurse all day."

"So, so," said the lady of Cliffe, with a silver laugh, "this is pushing us from our stools indeed! You tell me frankly what I am to expect when Cliffe shall change its mistress. It was not troth that you were plighting, then? The question was, 'How soon?' Am I not right, dear Rupert?"

"Ay, I asked her that."

"And what was the reply?" quoth Mrs. Clifford, pressing her hand with meaning against Mildred's shuddering flesh. "A month? I guessed it was a month. Come, since my modest Mildred will not answer thee, I will answer for her. In a month she shall be thine, Rupert."

"I must hear it from her own lips, good mother; you prophesy too smoothly."

Mrs. Clifford's fair face darkened; matters were not, then, as they had seemed. Mildred had refused him, or procrastinated at least. The young girl's face was buried in her hands, but not to hide its blushes; it was as pale as marble.

Grace Clifford's soft voice hardened; it was music still, but clear, incisive, as the clash of cymbals.

"I do not pretend to be a prophet, Rupert; you wrong me there; but what I promise, that will come to pass. My niece shall be your wife; and as for her scruples about time, that is a maiden's way."

"From her own lips, I say," repeated Rupert, hoarsely.

"Swear, then, niece Mildred—I pray thee find thy voice—to wed the Clifford within thirty days."

Never was deadly menace clothed so fair; never did spoken words convey more cruel meaning than was shot from those azure eyes.

Fear for Raymond's safety threatened, as it seemed to her, in every tone of her aunt's voice; fear on her own account, which always overwhelmed her when brought face to face with Mrs. Clifford; pity for Rupert, and terror as to what violence he might commit upon the instant, if she should answer "No"—for she had read murder in his eyes a while ago—overcame the resolution which had hitherto supported Mildred. Keeping her face still covered, and murmuring a "God forgive me" to herself, she answered, solemnly:

"I swear."

"Swear what?" asked Mrs. Clifford, pitilessly.

"I swear to marry your step-son within thirty days."

CHARLES THE ELEVENTH'S EXTRAORDINARY VISION.

Charles XI., father of the celebrated Charles XII., was one of the wisest kings who sat on the throne of Sweden. He put a check on the many privileges usurped by the nobles, diminished the power of the senate, and promulgated on his own authority several important laws; in a word, he altered the form of government, which until now had been oligarchical, and forced the States to acknowledge him as absolute ruler. The Lutheran religion found in this monarch a sincere adherent. He was brave and enlightened, but cold and precise in character, holding the imaginative powers under constant check and control. The death of his wife, Ulrica Eleanor, whom he treated harshly during her lifetime, made, however, a greater impression than could have been supposed on so rough and demonstrative a nature.

Becoming more and more morose after this event, Charles XI. gave himself up wholly to the management and affairs of his kingdom, thus betraying a mind ill at ease, which sought distraction from its own depressing thoughts in the toil and cares of government.

One autumn evening he sat, in company with Count Brahe and Dr. Baumgarten, opposite a bright fire, his head resting on his breast and his eyes fixed on the grate, in profound silence. The Count Brahe, finding that his presence was unheeded by the King, tried to make some excuse for withdrawing from the apartment, and suggested that his Majesty stood in need of repose; but a sign from the latter held him to his seat. The doctor in his turn spoke of the injurious effects of late hours upon the health. The King then replied, in a suppressed tone, "I have no wish to sleep at present." They attempted various subjects of conversation, but after a sentence or two their efforts fell to the ground. His Majesty was passing through a phase of profound melancholy, which rendered the position of the two courtiers somewhat delicate. One of them, looking toward the portrait of the late Queen, said, with a deep sigh: "How striking is the resemblance! what a sweet and dignified expression." The King, who seemed to consider every allusion to the Queen as a personal reproach, replied that the artist had flattered her, and rising from his chair, took one or two turns up and down the room to calm the agitation of his feelings. He stood for a moment at a window that looked upon the courtyard; the night was very dark.

The palace inhabited by the present Kings of Sweden was then in an unfinished state, and Charles XI., who had commenced its construction, occupied the old palace, which lay open to the sea. The King's private cabinet was situated at one of the extremities of the building, almost facing the large hall where the States met. The windows of this saloon appeared on a sudden to be brilliantly illuminated, a phenomenon which excited the greatest astonishment in the King. At first he made various conjectures as to the cause, but finally rejected them, one by one. After remaining for some minutes gazing on the windows, and just as the Count was about to call a page, the King held him back, and announced his intention to go himself and inquire into the singular circumstance.

The attendant, in whose charge were the several keys of the apartments, was immediately aroused from his bed, and the King entered the gallery which served as a sort of vestibule to the above-mentioned hall. What was his astonishment at finding the walls completely draped with black! He inquired by whose order this alteration had been made. The seneschal answered that this gallery had always been paneled with oak, and that he had never seen it otherwise. The King was advancing to enter the large saloon, when the old man exclaimed:

"Sire, do not go further; there is some magic influence at work here. Since her death, your august spouse visits the palace every night, and walks in the large saloon."

"Heaven preserve us!" rejoined the Count; "go no further; you know not to what danger you may be exposing yourself."

"At all events," added Baumgarten, whose light had been extinguished by a gust of wind, "wait until I call a score of halberdiers."

After much opposition on the part of his attendants, the King himself took the key, and before he could be prevented, entered the large hall, and this is the spectacle that presented itself to the wondering eyes of the monarch.

The saloon was illuminated with innumerable wax lights; black hangings had replaced the figured tapestry; along the walls were placed methodically German, Danish and Muscovite flags, trophies of the army of Gustavus Adolphus. In the centre were Swedish banners, wrapt in black crape. The various sections of the states were arranged according to precedence. Every individual was in mourning; and among them all, not one was personally known to the witnesses of this extraordinary scene. On the throne from which the King usually addressed his Court, a bloody corpse was lying, covered with the insignia of royalty. On the right stood a child, with a crown on his head and a sceptre in his hand. On the left leaned an aged man. This figure was enveloped in a cloak of ceremony, such as was worn by the former administrators of Sweden, before Gustavus Vasa had made one united kingdom of his country. In front of the throne sat several persons, grave and formal in their demeanor, and clothed in the black legal robes of judges. Before them was a table covered with books and papers. Between the throne and the corresponding side of the room stood a block, with a black vail thrown over it, and near to it lay an ax. No one in all this assembly seemed to take any notice of the presence of Charles and his companions, who, on their entrance, heard a low murmur of voices. Then the oldest among the judges, who appeared to fill the functions of president, arose, and struck three times on a book placed before him. A deep silence followed, and the door facing Charles being opened, the monarch saw several fine-looking young men enter the saloon, richly dressed, but with their hands tied behind their backs. They carried themselves haughtily and with firm countenances. Behind them walked a large muscular man clothed in a coat of brown leather, and in his hands he held the ends of the cord which bound the young men. The one who led the way, and who seemed to be of the most consequence among the prisoners, stopped when he reached the middle of the saloon, and gave a proud look at the block. The corpse then appeared to become agitated, as if in pain, and some light-colored blood issued from a wound. The young man bent his knee and bowed his head; the ax flashed in the air, and fell with a heavy sound. The head rolled on the ground until it reached the feet of Charles, whose shoes were sprinkled with the blood. The King until then had stood in dumb amazement, but this ghastly spectacle unloosed his tongue, and advancing a few steps towards the phantom in the official cloak of an administrator, he exclaimed: "If you come from God, speak; but if from hell, depart, and leave us in peace." The phantom replied, with slow emphasis: "King Charles, it is not in thy reign that this blood shall flow; but after five successive reigns, woe shall follow upon woe to the blood of Vasa."

The members of this numerous assembly then faded into pale tinted shadows; these again gradually disappeared; the lights went out, and the lanterns of the King and his attendants alone remained, casting a dim reflection on the old tapestry gently stirring in the wind. After a while melodious sounds were heard. The apparition had lasted about ten minutes. The black draperies, the severed head, the flowing blood, had all vanished with the phantoms; but on the King's slipper a dry stain remained, as if in souvenir of the extraordinary scene.

Charles, on retiring to his cabinet, caused the whole of the circumstances to be immediately written down, and added his own signature to that of his attendants. This document still exists, and its authenticity has never been disputed. Its conclusion is especially remarkable:

"And if that which I have stated," says the King, "be not the exact truth, I renounce all hope of a better life to come, which I may have merited in virtue of some few good deeds; but above all, for my zeal in advancing the happiness of my people and defending the interests of religion."

If we turn to the life of Gustavus Vasa, and to the condemnation of Ankarstroem, his assassin, we shall find more than one coinciding link between these facts and this singular prophecy. The young man beheaded was Ankerstroem; the corpse crowned represented Gustavus III.; the child is his son Gustavus Adolphus IV. The old man must be the Duc de Sudermanie, the uncle of Gustavus IV., who was Regent of the kingdom, and then King, after the deposition of his nephew.

Lately, at the London Royal Institute, Sir John Lubbock delivered a lecture on the "Metamorphoses of Insects." After clearly defining the position which insects occupy in the animal kingdom, and their distinguishing characteristic of possessing six legs, he described the changes they undergo in various stages of their existence. He quoted Darwin largely, and toward the close of the lecture gave some remarkable facts about the instinct of insects. The gnat, for instance, which feeds on blood, deposits its eggs in water, where the young can alone be developed. The solitary wasp fills its nest with the larvæ of other insects, after stinging them in their nervous system, which renders them helpless but does not destroy life, so that they keep without putrefying till they are required to be eaten. He spoke also of the instinct of ants, which are alleged, he said, in some cases to till the ground, and in America to have tunneled under a river as broad as the Thames. He was of opinion, from long observation, that external influences have much power over the changes of an insect after it emerges from the egg, and that the great changes it undergoes are necessary, because the muscles are attached to the thick skin and not to bones, so the animal can undergo no change without casting its former skin.

The correspondent of an English paper writes: "I had given to me the other day the translation of a funeral notice in the Hungarian language of such a touching simplicity and patriarchal character as cannot fail to interest even perfect strangers. The bereaved gentleman, moreover, is one of the noblest veterans among Magyar patriots. Here is his card of sorrow:

"'I had to bury the partner of my life,
My own Catharine Bay,
on the 28th of this February, in the 65th year of her life, in the 44th of our very, very happy union.
Four daughters, two sons, and eleven grandchildren are weeping with me over the ruin of my house, but we must be silent because it was the will of God.

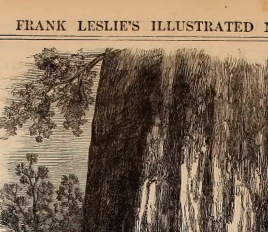
THE MAMMOTH TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

ABOUT 97 miles from Sacramento City, in a gently sloping, heavy-timbered valley, are the largest and tallest trees in the world. It is rightly called the Mammoth Tree Grove. We give a sketch of the method by which this giant of the forest was felled, not by chopping it down, but by boring it off with pump augers, and it employed five men for 22 days constantly at work to effect it. Its height was 302 feet, and its circumference at the ground was 97 feet. Upon the stump, on the 4th of July, 32 persons were engaged in dancing four sets of cotillions at one time.



The bark was 18 inches in thickness, which gave it a diameter of over 30 feet. But monstrous as were the dimensions of this tree, at a short distance from it lies the prostrate and majestic body of a still larger one. This is known as the "Father of the Forest." It is now half buried in the soil. It measured in circumference 110 feet; it was 435 feet in height; it is 200 feet to the first branch; the centre of it is now hollow, and a person can walk erect through it as though it were a large tunnel.

A short distance from these immense trees is a double tree, called the "Siamese Twins," which, as their name indicates, has one large stem at the ground, thus forming a double tree 41 feet in diameter. The height is about 300 feet.

There is another strange tree, of which we present an accurate sketch, which has been christened the Grizzled Giant. He is a sturdy, gnarled fellow, which, although badly bruised, and the bark almost all gone, so that a large portion of its original size is lost, nevertheless is still 39 feet in circumference, and presents that curious appearance which has gained for it the name of the Grizzled Giant.

SINGULAR ARTIFICE OF THE TURKEYS

On Discovering a Bird of Prey in the Air.

MR. THOMPSON, in his admirable and most interesting work on the passions of animals, has given several remarkable instances of that almost miraculous instinct which the Creator has implanted in the animal world for the purpose of self-preservation. We illustrate a very curious one, showing the "exceeding artfulness" of a bird sacred in the annals of Thanksgiving—the turkey. We quote from Mr. Thompson's words:

"Many animals are so extremely timid that they are alarmed at the slightest cause, and this occurs especially with birds: the pewit shrieks even at the rustle or passing flight of another bird, and all birds crouch and attempt to conceal themselves on the appearance of those of prey. The turkey, as well in the wild as in the tame state, utters on such occasions a peculiar note, and its whole brood disperses and conceals itself among the long grass and leaves. They even stretch themselves at full length upon the ground, and continue motionless, as if dead; and in the meantime the mother, with her eye directed upward, continues crying. On looking up in the direction in which she seemed to gaze, the author had discovered a black spot just under the clouds, but was unable at first to determine what it was; however, it soon appeared to be a bird of prey, though at first at too great a distance to be distinguished. He has seen one of these animals continue in this agitated state, and her whole brood pinned down, as it were, to the ground for an hour together, whilst their formidable foe had taken its circuits, has mounted, and hovered directly over their heads; at last, upon his disappearing, the parent changed her note, and sprang forth another cry, which in an instant gave life to the whole trembling tribe, and they all flocked around her with expressions of pleasure, as if conscious of their happy escape from danger."

BUFFALO ATTACKING A HORSE.

THE ferocity of a buffalo when thoroughly aroused is really appalling. Professor Thunberg, when he was traveling in Caffraria, Cape of Good Hope, Africa, witnessed a scene which he says left a profound impression upon him, accustomed as he was to adventure.

He and his companions had just entered a wood, when they discovered a large old male buffalo, lying quite alone, in a spot that for the space of a few square yards was free from bushes. The animal no sooner saw the guide, who went first, than, with a terrible roar, he rushed upon him. The fellow turned his horse short round behind a large tree, and the buffalo rushed forward to the next man, and gored his horse so dreadfully in the belly, that it died soon after. These two climbed into trees, and the furious animal made his way toward the rest, of whom the professor was one, who were approaching, but at some distance. A horse without a rider was in the front; as soon as the buffalo saw him, he become more outrageous than before, and attacked him with such fury, that he not only drove his horns into the horse's breast, but even out again through the very saddle. The horse was thrown to the ground with such excessive violence that he instantly died, and many of his bones were found broken. Just at this moment the professor happened to come up, but from the narrowness of the path, having no room to turn round, he was glad to abandon his horse and take refuge in a tree. The buffalo had, however, finished for after the destruction of the second horse, he turned suddenly round, and galloped away.

MELODRAMA AND OPERA.

IT would be difficult to find in an American audience the counterpart of the characters represented in the illustration of scenes at the play. These characters are essentially English, and are designed to show the power of emotion over the features of the countenance.

We can readily infer the feelings of these personages from the expression of their faces, and can take almost as much satisfaction in the analysis of their peculiarities, as in witnessing the performance ourselves.

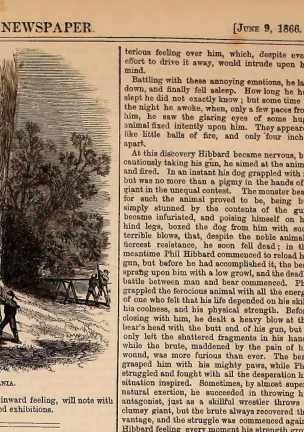
To the physiognomist they are an interesting study; in fact, any one fond of observing the outward expression of inward feeling, will note with interest these marked exhibitions.

A Perilous Combat in the Woods.

Few things stir the heart more than adventures, in which the courage and skill of man are pitted against the strength and instinct of the brute creation—when man measures his power with the lion, the bear, or the buffalo—the sympathies of the least adventurous are roused, and the struggle becomes almost our own. The family history of many of those who settled sixty years ago in the western parts of Maine is full of these perilous incidents. Among the most exciting is one that was related to us by the grandson of the hero of one of these dangerous episodes in border life. We will give it as nearly as possible in his own words:

One bright and frosty morning in November, Phil Hibbard, with his trusty dog and gun, started for a few days' hunting, leaving his two boys, Charlie and Sam, at home with their mother. He spent the first day along the banks of a pretty little stream, and at night pitched his tent in a pleasant little patch of forest land, which seemed made on purpose for seclusion from the busy world. Selecting a spot where the trunks of several immense trees grew so closely together as to form almost a wall, he made a kind of shelter of cedar and pine boughs, placed in the form of a hut; and then, collecting a goodly quantity of dry leaves, which lay around in profusion, he made them his bed, throwing his heavy cloak over him. He had, however, previously kindled a fire, on which he had broiled a venison steak; this, with a good pull at his brandy flask, made him a very substantial supper. After smoking his pipe, he laid down for the night, with his dog and gun close by his side. There being no moon, and the woods thick and heavy, it was very dark; but the light from his fire penetrated to a considerable extent into the surrounding gloom, clothing the trees and everything near him in weird shapes and habiliments.

Like every individual whose mind is unassisted by the facts and principles of science, Phil was superstitious. He had no sooner cast his eyes about him after darkness set in, than he began to imagine strange things. He was not a coward in any sense of the word, but there came a mysterious feeling over him, which, despite every effort to drive it away, would intrude upon his mind.



Battling with these annoying emotions, he laid down, and finally fell asleep. How long he had slept he did not exactly know; but some time in the night he awoke, when, only a few paces from him, he saw the glaring eyes of some huge animal fixed intently upon him. They appeared like little balls of fire, and only four inches apart.

At this discovery Hibbard became nervous, but cautiously taking his gun, he stood at the animal and fired. In an instant his dog grappled with it, but was no more than a pigmy in the hands of a giant in the unequal contest. The monster bear, for such the animal proved to be, being but simply stunned by the contents of the gun became infuriated, and poising himself on his hind legs, boxed the dog from him with such terrible blows, that, despite the noble animal's fiercest resistance, he soon fell dead; in the meantime Phil Hibbard commenced to reload his gun, but before he had accomplished it, the bear sprang upon him with a low growl, and the deadly battle between man and bear commenced. Phil grappled the ferocious animal with all the energy of one who felt that his life depended on his skill, his coolness, and his physical strength. Before closing with him, he dealt a heavy blow at the bear's head with the butt end of his gun, but it only left the shattered fragments in his hand, while the brute, maddened by the pain of his wound, was more furious than ever. The bear grasped him with his mighty paws, while Phil struggled and fought with all the desperation his situation inspired. Sometimes, by almost supernatural exercise, he succeeded in throwing his antagonist, just as a skilful wrestler throws a clumsy giant, but the brute always recovered the vantage, and the struggle was commenced again. Hibbard feeling every moment his strength grow fainter and fainter. As the combat progressed, the two combatants had worked themselves up to the fire, which had partially burned out, when, as though inspired by the extremity of the danger, Hibbard suddenly seized a brand from the ashes, and as the maddened beast opened his mouth in the fury of its rage, he thrust a burning mass down its throat. Instantly it relaxed its hold, and with an unearthly yell, which reverberated through the woods, leaped into the thicket.

Hibbard, fearing a return of his enemy, armed himself with another brand of fire, and stood ready for an attack, should the beast renew the conflict. The bear, however, did not return. Hibbard was stripped almost completely of clothing in this fearful encounter; his flesh was terribly lacerated, and his strength nearly exhausted. Rekindling his fire as well as he could, he drank a little brandy from his flask, and then sat down, hoping to rest, but not daring to sleep. The struggle, however, had been too much for him, and in his weakness he unconsciously fell into a sound slumber. When he awoke the sun was high up in the heavens, and a burning fever had seized his frame. He could not rise; the flesh on his limbs was swollen by the dreadful wounds he had received, and being far from any human assistance, he began to feel that his last days were approaching. Fortunately, as the day advanced he began to grow stronger; his fever left him, and he attended to his wounds as best he could.

He remained at the same place that night; and the next day, feeling much refreshed, he started for home. He could travel but slowly—for he was in no condition for such a task. On, on he patiently plodded his way, and when he supposed himself near his cabin, he was astonished to find himself at the very place where he had staid the two previous nights, and where he had encountered the bear.

This was a strange circumstance, but resting awhile, he started off once more, and in the course of a few hours found himself back to his old quarters again! He now made up his mind that he was emphatically lost; yet he resolved to make another effort, and again started forward. Night came, and he knew not where he was; everything was strange—for he had never been in these parts—and tired, feeble and sick, he almost gave up in despair.

In this condition he wandered about from day to day, camping wherever night overtook him, and subsisting on whatever he could find suitable to eat. Exhaustion at length overcame him, and he was compelled to be quiet. He made himself a little "bough-house," and prepared to rest.

In this a week was passed, but he was still unable to venture on his journey. He thought of his home, his wife, and his children—how they would miss him and wonder at his absence. He felt that if they knew his condition—how he was "lost in the pine"—how much he had suffered—they would at once fly to his rescue. But they could not know; and as each day's sun went down, they gazed into each other's faces with silent sorrow at the failure of his return. But his wife and children had not been idle in searching for him, and many were the days he traveled over on this mission.

One day, as Phil entered his little "bough house," unusually weak and heart-broken, feeling that he might never again leave it alive, his thoughts went back to the various scenes in his life. His had been a hard lot. His face and hands were sun-browned and hardened with toil, but his heart had always been generous, warm and kind. Now, to suffer so much—to die alone, in the midst of a wild desert—it might be within a few miles of his own home, where his little world existed—was too much for him to bear, and in the midst of these reflections he fell asleep.

It was a refreshing slumber, in which he realized that deliverance had come, and so overjoyed was he that he awoke. His awaking was more joyful than his dream had been; for there, bending over him, as he opened his eyes, he saw his two sons and heard them softly whisper:

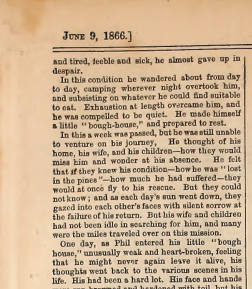
"Father, is it you?"

Deliverance had come. With a thrill of electric joy he bounded to his feet, and, weakened as he was, he clasped them in his arms, and in a strain of wild delight, cried:

"My children!"

He was carried to his home, where open arms and tender hearts were ready to receive him, and where, with careful attention and nursing, he gradually recovered strength and spirits.

THE WEDDING EVE.



THE eve of Dick's wedding was a wild December night. He was to be married next morning; but, in the meantime, he and the men were all out upon the beach, drawing up their boats, and hitching of a ship seen before dark, and holding, as they thought, a dangerous course.

While they spoke of it, a flash, like lightning, sprang out of the darkness, and in an instant more a message of distress and danger boomed across the sea. Another flash! and again the imploring gun echoed, like a hundred waves in one, among the rocks. The storm was increasing fearfully. A rocket, fired from the coast-guard station, rushed into the air, the strong wind carrying it far inland, but was answered by the harsh quick rolling of the life-boat's bell, calling the crew hastily together.

Dick Hazen had left the service, but the man to replace him had not arrived, and he remained on duty as before. He was the first to spring into the life-boat. She was quickly manned, and, in a few minutes, was gliding down the beach, and tossing like a cork upon the crest of the waves. A long cheer broke from the assembled crowd as the brave crew, bending to their oars, shot out into the darkness on their perilous voyage.

For a long while the lantern on the stern was seen at intervals above the waves, but at last the keenest sight failed to detect it, and silence and anxious waiting succeeded to the noise and hurry of the launch.

Come out with the life-boat! Come away into the storm and darkness. It is better than gnawing one's heart sobore there with Bessie and the rest. To be still to torture when dear lives are staked. See how the muscles start from the strong arms bared to the shoulder! The parted lips and heaving chests have no breath to spend in words. The strong excitement gives unnatural strength, and the force of their united will carries them, like an arrow, on their dangerous way.

Brave hearts, thinking only of the perishing ship. In their generous haste the men had forgotten their lifebelts. They didn't think they would be drowned; or if they did, they would not return.

The firing has ceased; the moon is up, misty and pale, behind swift flying clouds; a dark object, still far off, is discerned in the direction of the dangerous reef. The life-boat is flying on, often full of water, but as quickly emptying again; the men, drenched to the skin, have found breath enough to send a cheer forward to the sinking ship, and a faint cry has come to them from her crowded decks. They are in time to save!

Oh! that I could end here! But joy and rest have scant place in this disguised world, and I can speak of neither here, except as represented by the grave. Let me hasten to the end, the end that has no end—sorrow upon sorrow, like the rolling waves. The life-boat neared the wreck, when a wave, fiercer than the rest, dashing over the reef, filled her and flung her off; but, drawing her furiously back, hurled her so violently against the wreck, that the side was stove in, and she became unmanageable. Some of the men escaped by clinging to the vessel they had risked so much to save, and afterward, with the cold sea, were washed off and stranded on the shore. But two of the gallant lifeboat's crew were lost. Dick Harris and Jonker.

I thought these eyes of mine, so old now, could weep no more. I thought the old man had outlived his heart, but I see and feel the terrible cheering scene again. How Bess ran into the water to meet the lifeboat, crowded with the saved; but missed her love! She never spoke nor wept, but her face turned white as death, and changed no more, and day and night she waited by the sea, until at last he came. The villagers bell of it still. How with a wild shriek she threw up her arms to heaven, claiming her dead, and, plunging waist-deep into the waves, fought with them for possession of her own. Her wild shrieks rang out his death-knell in the night. Nay, always near her, helped her to carry him to a quiet spot, and, covering him reverently with her shawl, ran for help to the village, leaving Bess to watch him. When they came, but found poor Bessie lying beside her lover, a stream of blood flowing from her lips. She did not die at once, but her white scarred face grew thinner day by day. And Dick's grave was opened to receive her, according to her wish, long before there were any flowers to lay upon it.

THE EXTRA TICKET.

WHEN the opera of the "Prophet" was first brought out in Paris, so great was the demand for seats that tickets were sold at a most extravagant premium. One night a young military officer, who had just made an unsuccessful application for a ticket at the office-box, and was about to fall back in despair, was dexterously relieved of his watch by a pickpocket. Detecting the thief before he had time to escape, he recovered the stolen time-piece without the interposition of a policeman. Then, taking the culprit aside, he entered into conversation with him:

"You are an expert in your profession," said he, "and I desire now to avail myself of your skill."

"Monsieur le Capitaine may command me to the utmost of my abilities," said the sharper.

"Then," whispered the officer, "go immediately and relieve some gentleman of his opera-ticket, and I will pay you one hundred ounces for it. No hesitation—be quick—the money is ready."

"It shall be done," was the sharper's business-like answer.

In three minutes the adroit rascal returned with an elegant card-case, containing four opera tickets, together with a number of cards having the name of Mademoiselle Solange Dudevant engraved upon them.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the captain, "you have been robbing a lady."

"No, indeed, sir," replied the thief. "There is my victim."

As the sharper made this nonchalant reply, he pointed to a rosy-cheeked young gentleman in a black dress-coat, black tights and white vest, with plain flat buttons and white kid gloves, who was engaged in an animated conversation with a couple of young ladies just within the vestibule.

"Doh!" exclaimed the captain, "that is a lady dressed en cavalier. It is Mademoiselle Solange Dudevant herself. Return the article immediately."

"Monsieur is right," said the pickpocket. "No one but a brute would knowingly rob a lady, especially when the lady is the daughter of George Sand, whom we all love so well. Excuse me, monsieur; rely upon it, I will yet succeed in procuring you a ticket."

In an instant the sharper placed himself before Mlle. Solange, with a profound bow.

"Begging mademoiselle's pardon," he said. "She has the misfortune to drop her card-case."

"Thank you most kindly," replied Mademoiselle Solange, taking the card-case into her hand. "Allow me to reward you for returning it."

"As to that, mademoiselle," said the sharper, "permit me humbly to suggest that you have four tickets for the grand entertainment in your case, whereas the party consists of only three persons."

"You, then, would like to have the extra ticket?" asked the lady.

"Exactly so, mademoiselle," blandly replied the prince of sharpers.

"You are quite welcome to it," returned Mademoiselle Solange Dudevant.

The sharper took the ticket to the young officer, who, having treated the matter in which it was obtained, did not hesitate to receive it, and handed him over the promised 100 francs.

On taking his seat in the opera-house, the captain found himself either to elbow with Mademoiselle Dudevant, with whom he was well acquainted. He frankly explained to her the equivocal process by which he had procured his ticket, and the lady laughed at the trick of which she was the unconscious victim.

WHAT length ought a lady's crinoline to be? A little above two feet.

THE REGALIA OF GREAT BRITAIN.

THE coronation and other jewels of the British crown are kept in a room constantly open to inspection, in the Tower of London. The leading pieces are as follows:

1. St. Edward's Crown, made for the coronation of the second Charles, to replace the one broken up and sold during the Civil Wars, which was said to have been worn by Edward the Confessor. It is used in the coronation of all the sovereigns. This is the crown placed by the Archbishop of Canterbury on the head of the sovereign at the altar.

2. The New State Crown, made for the coronation of Queen Victoria. It is composed of a cap of purple velvet, inclosed by hoops of silver, and studded with a profusion of diamonds; it weighs one pound and three quarters. The large unpolished ruby is said to have been worn at Cressy and Azincourt by Edward the Black Prince and Henry V. The front cross is adorned with an unique sapphire of the purest and deepest azure, more than two inches long and one inch broad. The diamond cross is estimated to be worth £30,000. It was placed from the one constructed for the coronation of George IV.

3. The Prince of Wales's Crown is of gold, and unadorned with jewels. On occasions of state it is placed before the seat occupied by the full-apparent to the throne, in the House of Lords.

4. The Queen Consort's Crown is of gold, set with diamonds, pearls, etc.

5. The Queen's Diadem, or circlet of gold, was made for the coronation of Marie d'Este, Queen of James II. It is adorned with large diamonds, and the upper edge of the circlet is bordered with magnificent pearls.

6. St. Edward's Staff is of beaten gold, four feet seven inches in length, surmounted by an orb and cross, and ball with a steel spike. The staff is asserted to contain a fragment of the true cross. It weighs eight pounds nine ounces. It is carried before the sovereign at the coronation.

7. The Royal Sceptre, or Sceptre with the Cross, is of gold, two feet nine inches in length. The staff is plain, and the pommel is ornamented with rubies, emeralds, and diamonds. The fleur-de-lis, with which the sceptre was once adorned, have been removed, and replaced by golden leaves, bearing the rose, shamrock and thistle. The cross is covered with rose of brilliants, and the orb has in the centre a large table diamond.

8. The Rod of Equity, or Sceptre with the Dove, is of gold, three feet seven inches in length, set with diamonds, etc. At the top is an orb, banded with rose diamonds, and surmounted with a cross, on which is the figure of a dove—the emblem of peace—with expanded wings.

9. The Queen's Sceptre, with the Cross, is smaller in size than the preceding, but of exquisite workmanship, and set with precious stones of great value.

10. The Queen's Ivory Sceptre was made for Marie d'Este, and is mounted in gold, and terminated by a golden cross, bearing a dove of white ivory.

11. A Sceptre, found behind a part of the old wainscoting of the sacred jewel-house, in 1814. It is supposed to have been made for Queen Mary, consort of William III.

12. The Orb is of gold, six inches in diameter, banded with a fillet of the same precious metal, set with pearls, and surmounted by a remarkably fine amethyst, nearly an inch and a half high, supporting a cross of gold 32 inches in height. The orb, we need scarcely, is the emblem of sovereignty, though it have been derived from Imperial Rome, and to have been first adorned with the cross by Constantine on his conversion to Christianity. It first appears among the royal insignia of England on the coins of Edward the Confessor.

13. The Queen's Orb is of smaller dimensions, but of similar fashion and materials.

13. The Sword of Mercy, or Curtana, is of steel, ornamented with gold, and pointless.

15. The Swords of Justice, ecclesiastical and temporal.

16. The Armille, or Coronation Bracelets, are of gold, plain and large, and edged with pearls.

17. The Royal Spurs are of gold. They are carried in the coronation procession by the representative of the Earls of Hastings.

18. The Ampulla is an antique vessel of gold, used for containing the consecrated oil used at coronations, resembling an eagle with outstretched wings, standing on a pedestal. The head screws off at the middle of the neck, for the purpose of pouring in the oil; and the back being hollow to the beak, the latter serves as a spout through which the oil is poured.

19. The Gold Coronation Spoon is used for receiving the sacred oil from the Ampulla, at the anointing of the sovereign. It is supposed to be the sole relic of the ancient regalia. It has four pearls in the broadest part of the handle, and the bowl is richly chased within and without.

20. The Golden Salt-Cellar of State is formed a chased with the rose, fleur-de-lis, and shamrock.

THE OPERA.—SEE PAGE 188.

"Model of the White Tower;" but it has scarcely any other resemblance to that old keep than from the body of it being castellated and of a square form. It is of gold, adorned with jewelry, and ornamented at its base with mimic cannon, serpents, and grotesque figures. The receptacles for the salt are formed by the removal of the tops of the turrets.

21. Baptismal Font, of silver gilt, tastefully chased; was formerly used at the christening of the royal children, but a new font, of more picturesque design, has been recently manufactured for Queen Victoria.

22. A large and beautiful Silver Wine Fountain, which was presented to Charles II. by the corporation of Plymouth.

Such is a brief list of the treasures contained in the Jewel-House, which, while they attract the attention of sight-seers, contrast with the homely virtues and distinguishing characteristics which—"gems beyond price"—adorn the present illustrious ruler of Great Britain.

SCENES IN CENTRAL ASIA.

AFTER a short halt we again started, passing by a hill higher than the rest of the sand hills; upon the former we saw two empty kedjeve. I was told that the travelers who had been seated therein had perished in the desert, and that everything that had held men was respected among the Turkomans, and its destruction regarded as a sin. Singular superstition! Men sold to slavery and lands laid waste regarded as acts of virtue, and a wooden basket held in honor because men have once been seated in it! The desert and its inhabitants are really singular and extraordinary. The reader will be still more surprised when I relate to him what we witnessed this same evening. When it became cooler, I dismounted with the kervanbashi and some other Turkomans in search of some rain-water that we hoped to find. We were all armed, and each went in a different direction. I followed the kervanbashi; and we had advanced perhaps 40 steps, when the latter observed some traces in the sand, and in great astonishment exclaimed: "Here there must be men." We got our muskets ready, and guided by the track that became clearer and clearer, we at last reached the mouth of a cave. As from the prints in the sand we could infer that there was but a single man, we soon penetrated into the place, and I saw, with indescribable horror, a man—half a savage, with long hair and beard, clad in the skin of a gazelle—who, no less astonished, sprang up, and with leveled lance rushed upon us.

While I was contemplating the whole scene with the greatest impatience, the features of my guide showed the most imperturbable composure. When he distinguished the half-savage man he dropped the end of his weapon, and murmuring in a low voice "Amanbol," (Peace be unto thee), he quitted the horrible place. "Kanli dir, he is one who has blood upon his head," exclaimed the kervanbashi, without my having ventured to question him. It was not till later that I learned that this unhappy man, fleeing from a righteous vendetta, had been for years and years, summer and winter, wandering round the desert; man's face he must not, dares not behold!

The "vendetta" is here even tolerated by religion! and I was an eye-witness in Etrek to an occurrence where a son, in the presence of his mother, avenged the death of his father, that had taken place eight years before, by shooting his step-father, who had married her, and who, it appeared, had been an accomplice. It was very characteristic that the people who were present at his interment condoled with the mother and at the same time felicitated the son on the act of piety which he had accomplished.

In the last court I found about 300 Tchaudors, prisoners of war, covered with rags; they were so tormented by the dread of their approaching fate, and by the hunger which they had endured for several days, that they looked as if they had just risen from their graves. They were separated into two divisions, namely, such as had not yet reached their fortieth year, and were to be sold as slaves, or to be made use of as presents, and such as from their rank or age were regarded as ak-akals (graybeards) or leaders, and who were to suffer the punishment imposed by the khan. The former, chained together by their iron collars in numbers of 10 to 15, were led away; the latter submissively awaited the punishment awarded. They looked like lambs in the hands of their executioners. While several were led to the gallows or the block, I saw how, at a sign from the executioner, eight aged men placed themselves down on their backs upon the earth. They were then bound hand and foot, and the executioner gouged out their eyes in turn, kneeling to do so on the breast of each poor wretch; and after every operation he wiped his knife, dripping with blood, upon the white beard of the hoary unfortunate. As each fearful act was completed, the victim, liberated from his bonds, grasping around with his hands, sought to gain his feet! Some fell against each other, head against head; others sank powerless to the earth again, uttering low groans; the memory will make me shudder as long as I live.

I had almost forgotten to mention that the yasaul led me to the treasurer to receive the sum for my daily board. This personage was engaged in so singular an occupation, that I must not omit to particularize it. He was assorting the khilat (robes of honor) which were to be sent to the camp to reward those who had distinguished themselves. They consisted of about four kinds of silken coats with staring colors, and large flowers worked in them in gold. I heard them styled four-headed, twelve-headed, twenty-headed and forty-headed coats. As I could see upon them no heads at all, in painting or embroidery, I demanded the reason of the appellation, and was told that the most simple coats were a reward for having cut off four heads of enemies, and the most beautiful a recompense for forty heads, and that they were now being forwarded to the camp. Some one proceeded to tell me, "that if this was not a usage in Roum, I ought to go next morning to the principal square, where I should be a witness of this distribution." Accordingly, the next morning I did really see about 100 horsemen arrive from the camp covered with dust. Each of them brought at least one prisoner with him, and among the number, women and children also, bound either to the tail of the horse, or to the pommel of the saddle; besides all of which, he had buckled behind him a large sack, containing the heads of his enemies, the evidence of his heroic exploits. On coming up he handed over the prisoners as presents to the khan, or some other great personage, then loosened his sack, seized it by the two lower corners, as if he were about to empty potatoes, and there rolled the bearded or beardless heads before the accountant, who kicked them together with his feet until a large heap was composed, consisting of several hundreds. Each hero had a receipt given to him for the number of heads delivered, and a few days later came the day of payment.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHEN poor Curran was in his last illness, the doctor remarked one morning that he seemed to cough with more difficulty. "That is rather surprising," the patient gasped out, "for I have been practicing all night!"

A FRENCHMAN, on arriving in New York, and finding himself utterly unobserved, no official asking his passport, no policeman dogging his steps, no mayor demanding his business, felt sad and lonely, and exclaimed that he was taken no more notice of than if he was a little dog.

A TRAVELER stopped at an inn to breakfast, and having drank a cup of what was given to him, the servant asked:

"What will you take, sir—tea or coffee?"

"That depends upon circumstances," was the reply. "If what you gave me last was tea, I want coffee; if it was coffee, I want tea. I want hange."

WHY is a neat housekeeper like the sea? Because she is tide-y.

MR. QUILP (the brute) thinks the reason why so many young women are obliged to support themselves, is because the young men find them insupportable.

THE BOYS OF PASSAMAQUODDY

Here we are—a host
 Of the Fenian body,
Gathered on thy coast,
 Bay of Passamaquoddy,
Boys that Glory calls,
 Heroes of a million,
Looking out for squalls,
 Under Doran Killian.

If New Brunswick cries
 "No Confederation!"
With her sons we'll rise,
 In a botheration.
Should the Fishery fix
 Issue in hot water,
With the Yankees mix,
 And the British slaughter.

Britain's foes we'll aid,
 At the call of Glory:
But we won't invade
 British territory
Lest we and the Chief
 Of our numerous body,
Go from thee to grief,
 Bay of Passamaquoddy!

A CURIOSITY FOR THE LADIES.

THERE is on exhibition at the salesroom of Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON, No. 625 Broadway, the first Sewing Machine (No. 1) made by that Company, the present number being 220,000. Let the interested compare the Machine sold in 1851 for $125 with those now offered for $55. The former owner of this Machine gives its history as follows:

"This Machine was finished early in 1851, and I learned its use from Mr. WILSON himself. I was thus, you see, the first to work the Wheeler & Wilson Machine, and learned on the first Machine they ever manufactured.

"In 1854 I earned with the Machine $295, besides doing my own housework and taking care of my baby. In 1856 we came to Davenport, and brought the Machine with us. I believe it is the first Machine ever brought to Iowa.

"I run that Machine almost constantly for more than 14 years, on all sorts of work, from the finest dress-making to heaviest tailoring. I quilted a full-sized white bed-spread with it which has been exhibited three times at the Fair. It took me three weeks to do it, with my other work; but it could not have been done by hand in as many years. I have even stitched leather with it, and at the time I exchanged it (in 1865), for No. 193,320, it worked just as well as when made.

"It is perhaps unnecessary for me to add that I believe the Wheeler & Wilson to be vastly superior to any other machine made.

"Yours, respectfully,

Time tries all things. USE only furnishes the final test. Opinions of the skillful may be of value, but time is needed to confirm them. All failures have had their advocates. It is noteworthy that the Sewing Machine for which the highest premium was awarded at the World's Fair here in 1853 long since sunk into merited oblivion. The past 15 years have seen numerous Machines, with high-sounding pretensions, rise with a flourish, confound the simple, and vanish. So will it be while credulity lasts.

The Wheeler & Wilson Company fixed upon the "Lock Stitch" as the one best suited to the general purposes of sewing, for beauty, permanence, elasticity, and economy of thread, and experience has confirmed the preference. It was at liberty, then as now, to make a chain-stitch machine; and even now, at a cost of less than 10 cents each, can adapt its Lock-Stitch Machine to make the chain-stitch as well as the lock-stitch; but, not believing in the stitch, has steadily refused to give it any kind of endorsement.

While this Company has given to the public the best fruits of inventive genius, it has guarded it from a multitude of traps. Attachments have been added for various purposes, as hemming, braiding, binding, cording, &c., but it has been kept free of all useless complications. Simplicity of parts, and adaptation to the widest range of work, has been the constant aim. Instead of boasting of a variety of useless stitches and movements, it claims to make but one kind of stitch, and that with the fewest movements possible. Hence the Machine may run constantly for 14 years, like the No. 1 above-mentioned, or a life-time, even, and work just as well as when new. With a complication of parts and movements, it would require monthly repairs and adjustments. As the purchase of a Sewing-Machine is, or may be, an act for a life-time, care should be had in getting what time and use have approved.—Commercial Advertiser.

Multitudes of People require an Alterative, to restore the healthy action of their systems and correct the derangements that creep into it. Sarsaparillas were used and valued, until several impositions were palmed off upon the public under this name. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is no imposition. o

MAMMOTH OIL ENTERPRISE AND GRAND GIFT DISTRIBUTION.

40,000 Shares of Stock to be Sold for $5 each,

AND

40,000 Valuable Presents—One to each Shareholder.

$20,000 IN GREENBACKS—HOUSES AND OTHER VALUABLE PROPERTY TO BE DISTRIBUTED AMONG SHAREHOLDERS WHO INVEST $5 IN THE STOCK OF THE VANCEBURG OIL COMPANY, WHICH WILL PAY 200 PER CENT. PROFIT ANNUALLY ON THE AMOUNT OF INVESTMENT.

DISTRIBUTION TO TAKE PLACE TUESDAY EVENING, JULY 24, 1866, at IRVING HALL, NEW YORK.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The undersigned, the Trustee for 40,000 Shares of the Capital Stock of the Vanceburg Petroleum and Mining Company (incorporated under the laws of the State of New York), having thoroughly investigated the valuable property of the Company, and being fully satisfied that a proper development of its immense shale beds will prove more remunerative than any enterprise before the American people, has determined upon this method of interesting the public and furthering the objects of the organization.

The merit of this plan is two-fold. First, each subscriber to a $5 share becomes a stockholder in the Company, and entitled to the benefits of its success. Second, every person who purchases stock has a chance to receive a valuable present—a small fortune.

One quarter of the entire amount received from sales of certificates will be paid into the treasury of the Company, thus placing $50,000 in cash as its working capital, in which sum the stockholders will be mutually interested. This sum will erect 200 retorts (as the oil is produced by distillation), which will yield by actual demonstration on the lands of an adjoining Company whose works are now in operation, 60 barrels of oil per day, of a lubricating quality—worth $25 per barrel, or a NET PROFIT OF $400,000 per annum.

The lands of the Company consist of 1,000 acres, owned in fee simple. Upon these lands is an immense bed of bituminous shale, 200 feet thick, recently examined by Professor Barbour, the eminent geologist, who estimates the amount fully sufficient to supply 500 retorts for 500 years! This great shale formation is only 90 miles east of Cincinnati, immediately beside the Ohio River, in Lewis County, Kentucky. Professor Page and other eminent chemists have examined the oil, and pronounce it very superior lubricating oil. The cost of distillation is only eight cents per gallon. Any one of ordinary intelligence cannot fail to see that the legitimate character of this operation—it being simply a manufacturing process, free from the hitherto purely speculative nature of oil enterprises—places this Company beyond the question of possibilities upon the high basis of practical reality. Making the investment judicious in itself, as well as attractive by its gift accompaniment. The Company is officered by gentlemen of the highest respectability, doing business in the cities of New York and Cincinnati, and its affairs are at all times open to the inspection of the stockholders.

HOW TO OBTAIN SHARES.

There will be 40,000 shares and 40,000 presents, or a present to every shareholder. THEREFORE, NO BLANKS!!!

Forty thousand printed receipts will be issued, each entitling the holder to one share of stock in the Vanceburg Petroleum and Mining Company; and each accompanied by a card of admission (properly numbered), to the Grand Distribution, and entitling the holder to the present that may be drawn to its number on that occasion. The receipts and cards of admission can be had at the bookstores and of agents throughout country, at $5 per share, or by enclosing the amount in a registered letter to

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK,
No. 14 Chambers Street, New York.

A committee of twenty prominent citizens, holding shares, will superintend the drawing, in view of the assemblage. Forty thousand ballots, numbered from one to forty thousand (inclusive), will be placed in separate tin tubes, and deposited in a wheel. A boy will be selected from the audience to draw the numbers from the wheel, after being blindfolded. He shall hand the tube to the chairman of the committee, who will announce each number to the audience as it is drawn. The first number drawn from the wheel shall be entitled to the first present; the second number drawn, to the second present, and in like manner to the end. The utmost care will be taken to preserve order. Music will be furnished to add to the occasion, and a full report, with the numbers and present drawn to each, will be published in Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper immediately after the drawing. The presents will be delivered upon presentation of the cards of admission at any time within three months after the drawing at No. 14 Chambers Street, New York.

Chastellar's White Liquid Enamel,

For Improving and Beautifying the Complexion. The most valuable and perfect preparation in use, for giving the skin a beautiful pearl-like tint, that is only found in youth. It quickly removes Tan, Freckles, Pimples, Blotches, Moth Patches, Sallowness, Eruptions, and all impurities of the skin, kindly healing the same, giving the skin white and clear as alabaster. Its use cannot be detected by the closest scrutiny, and when once a table preparation, is perfectly harmless. It is the only article of the kind used by the French, and is considered by the Parisian so indispensable to a perfect toilet. Upwards of 30,000 bottles were sold during the past year, a sufficient guarantee of its efficacy. Price only 75 cents. FASHIONS FOR 1866.

The Latest Novelty.

The Great National Fair.

The lady directors of the NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, will commence to hold a PUBLIC FAIR in the City of Washington, on the 15th of May next, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to the support and maintenance of the Orphans of National Soldiers and Sailors not otherwise provided for in their respective States and Territories.

The ladies invite all who can to contribute toward representing their State by a table at the Fair.

The charity is a noble and deserving one, and it is hoped that each State and Territory will be liberally represented.

All contributions should be addressed—"NATIONAL SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' CENTRAL HOME, Washington, D. C.," and forwarded, if possible, 10 days before the opening of the Fair (15th May).

The Institution will be opened for the reception of children on the 1st of June next, and applications for admission may be forwarded immediately.

FASHIONS FOR 1866.

Bradley's Duplex Elliptic

OR DOUBLE SPRING

HOOP SKIRTS.

They will not BUCKLE or BREAK, like the Single Springs, but will ever PERMANENTLY HOLD STRAIGHT and PERFECT shape, where three or four ordinary skirts have been thrown away as worthless. Each Skirt is composed of two finely-tempered Steel Springs, braided TOGETHER and RIVETED together in knot, forming the STRONGEST, most Flexible, and still the Lightest Hoop made. In fact, for the Parlor, Church, or the Home, the Carriage, Theatre, Railroad Cars, Carriages, Crowded Assemblies, &c., &c., they are unequaled, combining more Comfort, Durability and Economy with that Elegance of Shape which has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC" the POSTPONEMENT.

THE
UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT
TO HAVE BEEN GIVEN AT
Crosby's Opera House,
On MONDAY, MAY 28th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 9th, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES will be presented to the ticket-holders, including $100,000 IN GREENBACKS.

The postponement is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet unsold, as the positive necessity there is for a proper registration of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns. We advise all parties selling tickets to spend for them without delay, as we have but a limited number yet on hand. We wish most particularly to impress upon the minds of our Agents the importance of their making their returns at once, and of rectifying whatever errors may have crept into their reports heretofore. We will say to those sending for tickets, that if they should all be sold at the time their order is received, the money will be returned. No orders will be received for the sale of tickets will be considered, as we have no more than sufficient tickets for those Agents we have already appointed. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at our Office, 124 Nassau street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage. We invite the particular attention of persons wishing to order tickets by mail to the following

Gen. Grant on the Situation.

There is no man in America whose opinions command more interest and possess more weight than those of Gen. Grant. The recognized military leader of any country is an important personage, especially during periods of unquiet, and when sections, parties or factions contemplate a resort to arms as among their expedients. But when that leader is known for clearness of political perception, and possesses a personal knowledge and appreciation of the people of the country, their condition and requirements, he becomes an authority as well as a power, and his views of public affairs become entitled to exceptional weight—especially when he happens to be proverbial for reticence, and is never known to speak except with deep significance.

It is, therefore, with no small degree of interest, and, we may add, with considerable satisfaction, that we read the report given in the Lewiston (Me.) Journal of a conversation, between Gen. Grant and its editor, which seems to have been less reserved on the part of the former than usual. It appears to be becoming the fashion for public men, not excepting Presidents, to take editors into their confidence, and make them their mediums of communication with the public. If less dignified and satisfactory than the traditional modes of communication between men in position and the world, namely, through speeches or letters, it may commend itself from the ease with which any ideas or expressions, deemed impolitic on second thought, may be repudiated: it is only necessary to say that the great man was not correctly reported!

What is especially interesting in the reported conversation is the view taken by Gen. Grant of what is called the "political situation." It seems that the General, although thoroughly satisfied of the ultimate suppression of the rebellion, nevertheless thought it would hold out another season; and he is by no means sure it would not have been better if it had, for reasons which we present in his own words:

"There were some parts of the country where our armies had never trod, particularly Texas, which needed to feel the blighting effects of war to bring their people to a realizing sense of the enormity of their crime, and the necessity of a thorough repentance. I find that those parts of the South which have not felt the war, and particularly those which have been within our lines and have therefore escaped the rebel conscription and taxes, are much less disposed to accept the situation in good faith than those portions which have been literally overrun with fire and sword."

Gen. Grant, in common with all really loyal men, is by no means satisfied with the temper of the lately rebellious States:

"A year ago, they were willing to do anything; now they regard themselves as masters of the situation. Some of the rebel Generals are behaving nobly, and doing all they can to induce the people to throw aside their old prejudices, and to conform their course to the changed condition of things. Johnson and Dick Taylor, particularly, are exercising a good influence; but Lee is behaving badly; he is conducting himself very differently from what I had reason, from what he said at the time of the surrender, to suppose he would. No man at the South is capable of exercising a tenth part of the influence for good that he is; but, instead of using it, he is setting an example of forced acquiescence, so grudging and pernicious in its effects as to be hardly realized. The men who were in the rebel armies acquiesce in the result much better than those who staid at home. The women are particularly bitter against the Union and Union men. Of course there is some bitterness of feeling among all classes; but I am satisfied it would soon die out if their leading men had not, somehow, got the idea that treason, after all, was not very bad, and that the 'Southern cause,' as they phrase it, will yet triumph—not in war, but in politics. In my judgment, the tone of certain men and certain papers in the North is such as to do incalculable mischief, in making the late rebels believe that they are just as much entitled to rule as ever, and that if they will only stand by what they are pleased to call their 'rights,' they will have help from the North. This is only playing over again the incipient stages of the rebellion."

The weight of these opinions is not to be lessened by the allegation of coming from a "radical." They come from a man of the utmost coolness and moderation, and who, perhaps, is in a better position than any man in the country to form just conclusions. He regards the notions that are taking new root in the Southern mind, and which are leading to "incipient rebellion," as in great degree fostered by Northern demagogues—the very same men who before betrayed the South into the fatal error of believing that its sympathizers in the North were strong enough to control the policy of the country.

"I am confident that the large majority of the Southern people would smother their resentments and become good citizens if these mischief-makers at the North would only let them alone. For myself, if I had the power, the first thing I would do would be to seize the New York News, and kindred sheets, which are giving the South so dangerous an idea of their own position and 'rights.' Dick Taylor told me that the great body of the South would settle down quietly and be satisfied with anything if it was not for the false idea of 'their rights' and so-called ill-treatment fostered by such sheets."

Here lies the real difficulty of "reconstruction," and hence follows the necessity, offensive, if you like, but real, of keeping an armed force in the Southern States. It is to keep in check that "incipient rebellion," which, although not general, still exists, and may become dangerous. On this point Gen. Grant says:

"Troops must be kept in all the principal points in the South for some time to come. This will be necessary to repress the turbulence of a class of the South very dangerous to all well-disposed persons, and also to protect the rights of the freedmen, who are looked upon with deep hatred by a very large proportion of the people."

These are the views of the first and most influential man in the nation, and as such, merit the highest consideration.

Closing the Bar-rooms on Sunday.

It appears, from the old records, that this city was much given to drink from the earliest period of its existence.

Old Peter Stuyvesant, the last of the Dutch Governors, soon after he was sworn in, in 1647, sallied forth, one fine Sunday morning, from Fort Amsterdam, to take a walk up the island. He found a great number of drunken men haunting the various taverns, some of whom, in his very presence, fell to fighting. Swords were drawn and blood was shed, he tells us, before the riot could be suppressed. Full of indignation at this affront, and scandalized at the disgrace thus put upon a Dutch province, he went back to Fort Amsterdam, and set about framing a decree, or ordinance, designed to prevent such abominable doings for the future. He ordained that, henceforth, no tavern should be open on Sunday until two o'clock in the afternoon; or, in case there was preaching, not until preaching was over; and that, on week-day evenings, every tavern should be closed at nine o'clock.

Here we have the action of our new Excise Commissioners anticipated. Good old Peter Stuyvesant gave them the hint at least. They have gone beyond him, in closing the drinking-places altogether on Sundays, but they come short of his system, in permitting them to remain open on week-nights until twelve o'clock.

Precisely 100 years after Governor Stuyvesant took that Sunday morning walk, a scene transpired in New York, which shows us that drinking was still one of the besetting sins of the town. It was in 1747, when France and England were at war, and the colonies were arming in self-defense, that Benj. Franklin, printer, came on from Philadelphia, to ask the Governor of New York to lend Pennsylvania a few of his superfluous cannon. "At first," says Franklin, "he refused us peremptorily; but at a dinner with his council, when there was great drinking of Madeira wine, as the custom of that place then was, he softened by degrees, until he said he would lend us six. After a few more bumpers, he advanced to 10; and at length he very good-naturedly conceded us 18."

Those words, so quietly thrown in by Franklin, "as the custom of that place then was," are full of meaning to those who know a little of the life led in America by the royal Governors sent over to us in colonial times. But the drinking of Madeira wine was far from being confined to them. The early commerce of this port made the Madeira bottle a familiar object upon the tables of merchants; while New England rum, distilled from West India molasses, furnished to the less opulent, the means of muddling their intellect. Adam Smith, in his "Wealth of Nations," mentions, that in the province of New York, in 1770, "ship-carpenters earned six shillings sterling a day, with a pint of rum worth sixpence."

Another century has rolled away, and still New York maintains a bad pre-eminence in drinking. It has grown to be an evil so great as to overwhelm the mind that attempts to grasp the facts. The mind, indeed, cannot grasp them. It is easy to say that there are ten thousand five hundred drinking places in the city of New York; that each of those sells, on an average, 120 drinks a day; that New York spends every week more money for liquor than for bread; and that fully seven-tenths of all the poverty and crime of the city are apparently traceable to this single cause. These would be appalling truths if the human mind was so constituted as to be able to comprehend at one view all the sorrow, the anguish and the shame which they include.

The only people who can be truly said to know anything about the evils of drinking are those who have had, in their own inner circle of relations and most intimate friends, a family, the father of which was a drunkard. It is not within the power of mortal pen to express this evil—the gradual descent, the brief reforms, the sure relapses, the growing hopelessness of the wife, her racking anxiety when he is absent, her alarm at his approach, her agony while he stays, the bitter, burning shame which she and her children feel, until in the callousness of habitual despair they are sensible only to physical pain—the pain of hunger, cold, and blows. There was never but one man who could bring all this home to the imagination of those who have never witnessed it. Nothing short of the splendid histrionic genius of Mr. Gough is equal to the task of making men and women feel and see what it is to have, and what it is to be, a drunken father, husband, brother or son.

It is known, probably, to all the readers of this paper, that a serious and resolute effort is now making in this city to lessen the evils of excessive drinking. The 1,200 lowest drinking places which have been selling liquor without any license have been closed. Those cellars of abomination in Broadway, and all other places where intoxicating drinks are sold, are to be shut at midnight. On Sundays nothing intoxicating is to be sold at all, except upon the prescription of a physician. For the space of four weeks these regulations have actually been enforced.

The opposition to these measures concentrates itself upon the Sunday prohibition. Many thousands of our German fellow-citizens, who have been accustomed to spend part of every Sunday in the beer gardens in the outskirts of the city, resent the prohibition as an infraction of the natural rights of man. On the other hand, a large number of dissolute men are prevented by this regulation from spending the Sunday in drinking, unless they invade adjacent villages and fill the neighborhood of the city with riot.

Our main objection to the Sunday rule is, that it cannot, in a city like this, be permanently enforced. The pressure of the opposition to it will be constant and strong; the means of evading it will multiply; the rigor of the official enforcers of the law will be insensibly relaxed; and long before this year closes, we shall probably see all the bar-rooms open again on Sunday. We question if there now is upon earth, or has ever been, a government powerful enough to enforce such a law in a community where there are sold every twenty-four hours in the year a million and a quarter of drinks.

There is more in this horrid and wide-spread propensity to drink stimulating liquors than we are apt to think. It is the symptom of deep disease in the body politic, as well as in the constitutions of the individuals addicted to the practice. There are some sores which, if you were to heal them up suddenly, would kill the patient; the sore, bad as it is, being a mitigating and relieving symptom of an internal disorder, which would be instantly fatal if it could not break its way to the surface. We are fully convinced that if, by the working of a miracle, the imbibing of intoxicating drinks in this city could be totally stopped, our most zealous tee-totalers would soon be in favor of reopening the bar-rooms. We should otherwise become a community of opium-eaters and tobacco sots.

We honor the motives of the humane and patriotic gentlemen who have been instrumental in setting on foot the new system. We wish them success in their endeavors to check an enormous evil which is but the outward sign of evil still more enormous. We only fear that, in this single feature of their plan, they are attempting something which is both impossible, not to say undesirable. Bad food, bad air, loathsome lodgings, excessive labor, vacancy of mind, despair—these are the real drunkard-makers.

We hope to live to see the day when the force of whatever benevolence there may be in New York will be chiefly expended in extirpating the causes, rather than legislating against the effects, of a morbid craving for strong drink.

There is a paper published daily in London, during the sessions of Parliament, called the Owl, conducted by a club of young men of good position and education, which takes off the follies and criticises the vices of the higher classes, social and political. It has no known publisher, and communications for it are received by an ordinary news-vender at the West End. Its squibs and parodies have gained for it a circulation of upward of 7,000. Like the Punch men, the Owls dine together once a week, when the contents of the forthcoming number are submitted and approved of, and when Parliament breaks up the profits are divided among the Birds, who disperse themselves until the ensuing February.

The Female Medical College of Pennsylvania has held its seventeenth annual session. When organized it was the only one in the world. Seventy-one students have received the diploma of the institution, and about four times that number have attended its lectures. Of the graduates, the larger number are in successful practice.

During the late grand Fenian invasion of Canada, via Eastport and the classic island of Campo Bello, some one stole an English flag that happened to be exposed somewhere, whether on a clothes-line or from a flag-staff we are uninformed. Whereupon the London Saturday Review waxes wroth, pronounces "the violation of neutrality undeniable," and characteristically pronounces that "no civilized government but that of America would tolerate such a proceeding." Yet this journal saw nothing censurable in the invasion of the United States from Canada, the robbery of banks, and the assassination of unarmed citizens, by men who were held guiltless by British courts, and fêted as heroes by British citizens!

TOWN GOSSIP.

Every one who has read the story of the heroic young Casabianca, has thrilled with admiration at the daring conduct and filial obedience of that noble boy, who could die, but not leave his post. A similar act of heroism was performed at the recent burning of the Academy of Music in this city. Last week we referred to the destruction of that edifice (of which, with all its faults, we were rather proud); but we did not tell how bravely those noble firemen who perished in the flames rushed to certain destruction in obedience to orders.

A regiment of veterans will charge a frowning battery though certain that numbers must fall before its murderous fire; discipline, the excitement of the hour, the spirit of the service, will move men to any pitch of daring, when the danger is equally shared; while, perhaps, not one in a hundred of those same veterans would face that battery individually and unsupported. But here we learn that these brave firemen, in simple obedience to orders, rushed into the burning building, and, though blinded and stifled with smoke, and stunned with falling fragments, heroically fought the mad and raging element until called away. Two, alas! could hear no call. They could die, but could not retreat, and only their charred remains told the tale of their nobility. All honor to the brave martyrs, and all honor to the heroic men of the department who are willing to interpose the shield of their own lives for our protection.

New York is not wholly given to gain; art has its admirers and patrons, and many of our citizens are disposed to consecrate their means for the promotion of the general good. We are led to this remark by an occurrence the other day, in which the Messrs. Steinway were the chief actors. They have begun the erection of a musical hall for oratorios, concerts, etc. Now, all large edifices have a firm corner-stone, and corner-stones must be properly laid, or they are worthless—at least the Messrs. Steinway are of this opinion—for they invited his Honor the Mayor and a number of musical and literary gentlemen to be present and witness the ceremony. The stone was properly adjusted, the Mayor made his little speech, and the company then separated—no, retired to a large hall in the warerooms, and were there provided with a collation. An hour was spent in discussing the good things, while speeches, toasts and songs enlivened the occasion. Altogether the affair was in the highest degree enjoyable.

The death of Gen. Scott has thrown a gloom over the public mind. Born as it were amid the birth-pangs of the republic, he lived to be a brilliant actor in its first two wars, and passed through a rebellion which has consolidated the nation. Let us be thankful that he lived long enough to see the great principles of liberty and Union triumphant. As we have treated this event in another column, and illustrated the last scene of his career, we refer our readers to those memorials of our respect and regard for the great soldier of the republic.

Head Centre Stephens, having confirmed the faithful here, has commenced a tour of the country in the hope of retrieving the waning fortunes of Fenianism; but they seem past resurrection; not even the grand C.O.I.R., charm he ever so wisely, can infuse life and vigor into this tottering, moribund giant. Amid the various excitements of the day, we have, in a measure, lost sight of another Head Centre, who is the Jupiter Tonans of a world by no means unimportant, and whose nod excites the highest hopes and the gravest fears; we refer to the quiet and amiable gentleman who presides at the Custom House. The demonstrations toward him were less marked, perhaps, but not less earnest, and as his functions were real, and not merely advisory, no inconsiderable number of people suddenly became hero-worshipers. The ins and outs are gradually exchanging places, and in a little while the whole machinery of the establishment will be so lubricated as to work smoothly.

For the last two or three Sundays the clerk of the weather has co-operated with the Excise Board in enforcing the anti-liquor law. With nothing to drink in New York, and no reaching New Jersey except through a drenching rain, the devotees of Bacchus have come to grief. Some solace their sorrows by providing an extra flask on Saturday, but the great mass are compelled, as never before, to observe at least a portion of the fourth command, though, doubtless, the rigor of Mr. Shultz is more potent than the authority of Moses.

The Sunday exodus of New York rowdies from New York to New Jersey has roused a strong feeling of indignation in that foreign State against "Whine and Water Acton," as one of their brightest orators, James Harvey Lyons, called him, the other night. A meeting was held on Tuesday in Odd Fellow's Hall, Hoboken, to urge the necessity of closing all the drinking-saloons on Sunday. It was attended by the leading respectabilities of the place, chief among whom was Mr. Charles Graham, the well-known banker of Wall street, who took the novel ground that a man has no more inherent right to sell liquor than he has to sell poison, the individual right of every citizen being subject to the general welfare. He put the principle so strongly, that it penetrated even the obtuse skulls of the Jerseymen. It is, however, pretty evident that the fear of losing "the rum and rowdy votes" will deter the Democratic Mayor and Council from putting in force any stringent Sunday law to protect the shores of Jersey from the hebdomadal and abominable invasion of the thirsty Gothamites.

The season of our out-door sports has fully commenced, and almost daily we have base-ball, boating, etc. The players are not the only ones benefited by these sports, for they attract thousands of spectators away from the dusty, festering city, to get a new lease of life and health in the pure air and invigorating breezes of the surburbs.

New England has contributed considerably during the week to the entertainment of Gothamites. The Harvard College Base Ball Club have played some handsome games at Brooklyn and Newark, and established their reputation as skillful, gentlemanly players. Their matches were closely contested, and with a little more practice the Harvard boys would prove formidable rivals.

The Beethoven Society of Yale College, numbering some 50 performers, gave a concert at Irving Hall, on Wednesday night, with great eclat. They sang a number of pieces with accuracy and spirit, and were heartily applauded. Their college songs were the grand feature of the occasion, and were repeatedly encored. If all Yankee boys can do as well, we shall welcome them to the metropolis most heartily.

Mr. Eichberg's opera has been presented at the French Theatre during the week, and, nothwithstanding some defects, has called out large and fashionable audiences. The "Doctor of Alcantara" is just light and pleasant enough for these summer evenings, and Miss Richings's reputation as a graceful artiste, sustained as she is by the other members of the troupe, is sufficient to draw good houses.

Barnum's has been crowded during the last week to witness the revival of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," in which Mrs. Howard assumes her original character of Topsy. She does it so well, that we "'spect it's growed with her." That excellent artiste, Mrs. Prior, also took her original character of Eliza Harris. The part of the Slave, George Harris, was filled by Daly very carefully and naturally. We do not like to advise one of the tender gender, but, if Mrs. Jameson would flavor her dialogue with a little more Yankee twang, and wear spectacles, it would vastly improve her "rendition" of the part she plays. Jameson's Uncle Tom is very good. Miss Prior does the part of Eva very well, and sings very sweetly and effectively.

We must not forget to mention that Mr. Frost, from Boston, has succeeded Mr. Hurd in the general management of the Museum. A somewhat difficult task, considering how popular the "son-in-law" was.

Mr. Brougham has commenced a brilliant engagement at the Winter Garden, substituting his own clever comedies for the whisky and shillalah dramas which have so long reigned there.

At Wallack's "Never Too Late to Mend" is the attraction. That most popular of amateur managers, Mr. Moss, has completed his arrangements for his summer campaign, and promises many novelties.

Miss Helen Western is at the Broadway, charming the lovers of the sensational drama by her beautiful physique.

Mr. Hopkins's Festival of the Orpheon Choral Schools was held on Friday and Saturday at the Cooper Institute, and was largely attended. The singing of the children was very good, while the assistance of the orchestra, conducted by Mr. Thomas, added to the attraction of the occasion. Every effort to cultivate a taste for music deserves encouragement, and Mr. Hopkins's laudable efforts to train the children will certainly meet its adequate reward.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

WEST ROOM.

No. 426. "Genesee Flats," by Mr. J. W. Casilear. This picture is very noticeable for the clever handling of the foliage, in which Mr. Casilear excels. It is also excellent in feeling.

No. 443. "Near Great Barrington, Mass.," by Mr A. D. Shattuck. There is some very sweet color in this picture; the trees on the left are particularly good. The effect of shadow among them is pleasant, but the foreground is weak.

No. 448. "Tortoise," by Mr. R. J. Pattison. Mr. Pattison sends several pictures to the Academy this year, which are, perhaps, unfortunate efforts, and the less said about them the better.

No. 449. "The Flight of the Birds," by Mr. J. E. McEntee, is fine in color, although in a very different key from that which Mr. McEntee usually affects. An ornithologist might possibly object to the birds he has introduced on more grounds than one.

No. 463. "A Summer Picture," by Mr. C. C. Griswold. A very careful and accurate study from nature, excellent in every point, and highly creditable to Mr. Griswold's skill.

No. 486. "Three Peaches," by Mr. W. T. Matthews. A very faithful study, and good in color.

No. 487. "Cordova, Spain," by Mr. S. Coleman. Mr. Coleman has become one of our best colorists, and this picture excels in that quality. No. 494, by the same artist, is noticeable for the same excellence.

No. 490. "Prisoners from the Front," by Mr. Winslow Homer. Mr. Homer's color is still immature. The figures in this picture are good in drawing and excellent in the rendering of expression. In the indication of character, Mr. Homer promises to stand very high among American artists.

No. 491. "In the Catskills—Portraits," by Mr. Geo. H. Hall. This picture is remarkable—containing one of the best portraits of an artist painted by himself that we have ever seen. It also has less of that obscurity of color which Mr. Hall has lately introduced in his pictures.

No. 504. "Saranac River," by Mr. Homer Martin. A very charming picture, in subject, handling and color.

There are a few pictures in the several rooms which we noted, but failed to include according to rotation of numbers. We notice them now, without reference to position.

No. 224. "The Bouquet Range of the Adirondacks." A Lawrie. The leaves in the foreground are like cakes of foliage—undergrowth on the rocks coarse and indefinite. The general effect is telling, but the color is raw.

No. 438. "St. Erasmé Gaeta." Mr. Edward L. Henry. This is good in all points. The architecture is sharp and well defined—groupings of character full of spirit and indicative of every-day life. The atmosphere is intensely southern, and the manifold details, which are very minute, are broadly touched in, with not too high a finish.

No. 424. "Roman Campagna," by Mr. W. W. Witherspoon. Well drawn, effectively colored, and fine in feeling.

No. 511. "Flowers." Miss S. W. Wenzler. A good study; colors strongly but, perhaps, hardly sufficiently blended. Form and texture well preserved.

No. 504. "Saranac River," by Mr. H. D. Martin. Misty effect, good and truthful. The shadows and reflections are clear, and the foliage details and character are excellent.

No. 480. This fruit is fine in color and texture; ripe, luscious and ready for eating.

No. 223. "Sunset," by Mr. S. P. Hodgdon. Landscape well drawn and composed. The sky is gorgeous in color, but the general color overhead is too darkly tinted for that hour. The road on the right, in half light, is an effective point.

No. 376. "Glimpse of Mount Blanc," by Mr. Regis Ginoux. As we remarked in the commencement of these articles, Mr. Ginoux's picture is unquestionably the finest landscape in the exhibition. The subject chosen is grand in itself, and is grandly treated. The glimpse of Mount Blanc is had through a vast and deep gorge in the lower mountains, and the effects aimed at and obtained are those of vast height without great distance and utter solitude. The contrasted misty depths, with the sun-tipped mountain snow peaks, conveys the artist's thought vividly to the spectators' eye, and that occult feeling which only the touch of a great artist can convey, gives even to that utter solitude a sentiment which connects it with humanity—with our sentient being. That sentiment which prompted the desire of the poet—

> To mingle with the universe, and feel
> What I can ne'er express, yet cannot all conceal."

The forms of the bold rocky outlines are boldly drawn, and even in the smaller details the marked character of the scene is perfectly preserved. In color it is fine, and the eye does not tire with gazing on this admirable transcription of nature.

No. 357. "Charcoal Wagon in the Alleghanies," by Mr. Peter Moran. The wagon overtaken by a sudden storm, just on the point of a descending road. The action of the wagoner and the horses is excellent. The whole group is boldly sketched in, and is well drawn.

No. 260. "Study of a Quail," by Mr. J. H. Cafferty. An excellent study, and handled freely and effectively.

No. 207, by the same artist, is equally faithful and excellent.

No. 306. "Moonlight," by Mr. Hermann Fuechsal, is a pleasant landscape, with a good diffused moonlight effect.

No. 222. "Little Ones in Trouble," by Mr. D. C. Fabrionnius. A winter scene, with a group of children in trouble about their sleds. The subject is effectively treated, the expression of the faces good, and the details well painted.

THE SCULPTURE ROOM.

The sculpture room is very meagre in subjects, but some few are well worthy of notice. A group of horses by Mr. W. M. Hunt, wonderfully spirited, although the drawing is not always correct. "The Falling Gladiator," by Mr. W. Rimmer, is remarkable for the boldness of its conception, and for its very careful anatomy. Mr. John Rogers has a most excellent characteristic group of intelligent contraband's, called "Uncle Ned's School." The grouping is good, the expression admirable; the drapery and, indeed, all the details are carefully and artistically designed and executed. It is one of Mr. Rogers's most characteristic groups. There are some very excellent busts, and two or three allegorical figures, which are worthy of much praise. Mr. Salathiel Ellis has several capital medallion portraits, which are faithful and well modeled. The Vanderbilt medal, presented by the Government of the United States to Commodore Vanderbilt, in acknowledgment for his princely liberality to his country during the war, and executed by Mr. Ellis, is also exhibited. It is a creditable work of art.

It is impossible, in a necessarily brief notice, to mention any great number of the pictures in the Academy Exhibition. Among those we have passed over, there are many which no man need be ashamed to buy and hang on his library walls, and there are very few that are entirely bad; in fact, the number of painters who show no talent whatever is very small, and does not constitute above 30 per cent. of the artists here represented. The exhibition, upon the whole, is neither better nor worse than those of the last three or four years; but when we remember the really great pictures that used to draw us to the Academy galleries eight or ten years ago, it becomes evident that this is not what an exhibition of the Academy of Design should be. The pictures, almost as a whole, fail in the matter of color; but this is to be expected so long as the American public, which seems to be color blind, will insist upon wagging its foolish head in an ecstasy of admiration over every fool's paradise of a landscape and leather-colored portrait that the Academy sees fit to hang in prominent places.

There seems also to be a great lack of earnestness on the part of our painters. In place of patient, honest and laborious study of nature, they depend for success, in very many instances, upon mere tricks and eccentricities. They are not trying to paint good pictures, but odd pictures; not to please the public, but to astonish it. And this is the more unfortunate, as many of these very pictures would have been really good if they had not been ruined by affectation. The general critics are very much to blame for this, because, instead of saying honestly and directly what is good or bad in a picture, they excuse the bad qualities with timid circumlocution, and obscure the good with transcendental vagueness, thus mystifying the public and misleading the painter. The elements of a picture are very simple and very few. If we say composition, drawing, light and shade and color, we exhaust the list. Every competent critic knows whether a picture is good or otherwise in either of these respects, and if he would frankly state the fact, it might result in doing much good. It is time that this course was adopted in art criticism.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The Portland Argus says that Capt. J. J. Boyd secured a patent which will make a complete revolution in applying buttons to garments. By this invention buttons can be attached to any part of wearing apparel without the use of thread. The invention consists solely in making the button with a spiral wire to be inserted into the cloth like a corkscrew, and then pressed down flat so as to form a ring to hold the button in place.

—— Mr. Disman, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, has discovered the process of hardening copper, and has secured a patent for it. The art is supposed to have been lost since the days of King Solomon. The material is properly called silicated copper, and can be worked without friction. All necessity for oiling machinery made from it is obviated.

—— It is projected in California to supply San Francisco and a dozen interior towns with water from Lake Tahoe, which lies in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, and is by 1,500 feet the highest body of water ever navigated by a steamboat. The length of the aqueduct, if it is extended to San Francisco, will be 200 miles.

—— A gigantic cotton factory, called the Manasses Manufactory, has been built at Carrollton, Miss. It contains 180,000 spindles, 1,300 looms, and goes into operation July 1. The stock now stands 15 per cent. above par. The company own 1,800 acres of land contiguous to the factory, all well wooded.

—— It is proposed in Charleston, S. C., to convert the square of the burnt district into a public garden. This will be inclosed by a fire-proof block of buildings, the lower stories to be used as stores, while the upper will contain cafés, an opera house, &c.

—— The San Jose (Cal.) Mercury reports that a great number of flowing artesian wells in and about San Jose have completely dried and rendered worthless hundreds of acres of laguna in the southern portion of the country.

—— It is the fashion with boys in the country to make collections of birds' eggs, and thousands of nests are robbed yearly and tens of thousands of birds are thus destroyed. The Legislature should amend the act for the preservation of birds, and include nests of said birds, with the same penalty for taking an egg or disturbing the nest as for killing the bird. The canker-worm is out in full force and is ready to destroy the first leaf. The birds are our only hope against these pests.

—— A writer in the New Orleans Christian Advocate says that, so far as he has ascertained, between 1,000 and 1,200 church-houses were burned during the war. These churches, he thinks, had cost the people not less than $5,000,000. In the loss the Methodists were the greatest sufferers, the Baptists next, then the Presbyterians, the Catholics least.

—— Gen. Van Cleve has just returned to St. Paul, Minn., from a tour of inspection through the Upper Minnesota Valley. He reports that the sufferings of the Indians during the last winter from cold and hunger, have taught them the extent of their dependence on the Government, and will tend to keep them on friendly terms with us.

—— The House of Representatives have passed a bill for the government of the Territories, of which one section, the ninth, secures equal rights in every respect, including the suffrage, to all citizens of the United States in every Territory. The section is in these words: "And be it further enacted, That within the Territories aforesaid there shall be no denial of the elective franchise to citizens of the United States because of race or color, and all persons shall be equal before the law; and all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or of the Legislative Assemblies of the Territories aforesaid, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void."

—— Mr. Brown, for many years interpreter to the American Embassy at Constantinople, and well-known to all English-speaking visitors to that port, has written "A History of Dervishes," which will shortly be published by Trübner, in London.

—— Samuel Downing, of Edinburgh, Saratoga county, is said to be the last of the Revolutionary soldiers belonging to this State. He was a private in the 2d New Hampshire, and served in the army under Generals Schuyler and Gates against Burgoyne.

—— It is an agreeable novelty to see in our city streets commodious drays loaded, not as once with heaps of prostrate, agonized calves, on their way to slaughter, but with the animals all standing and, as far as may be, enjoying themselves. The change, as every one knows, is due to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, whose very existence guarantees greater humanity in the transportation of stock.

—— Freedmen's schools are in successful operation in 15 large cities of Alabama, and in them more than 10,500 pupils are taught. In some of the white churches colored children are taught under the superintendency of the pastors. At Demopolis the citizens have contributed of their funds to aid in the erection of a school-house for colored people. At Tuskegee the Mayor has charge of a large colored Sunday-school.

—— At Newport, R. I., a few days ago, a soldier from the fort, about two-thirds drunk, was playing on the wharf with a large Newfoundland dog, noted for his sagacity and good nature. The animal seemed to like the sport as much as the man; but finally the contest became warm, and the dog, raising upon his hind legs, placed his fore paws upon the breast of the soldier. This threw the man off his balance, and the two fell into the dock together. The soldier, too much intoxicated to swim, was in danger of drowning, when the dog seized him, and keeping his head above water, paddled off with him to a boat near by, when both were rescued.

—— The Baptists of New Jersey are erecting a building to be used as a classical and scientific institute at Hightstown. It is to be 243 feet long, the main building 60 feet square, four stories high. The corner-stone of the building will be laid, with appropriate services on Thursday, the 14th of June. The building stands in the midst of a compass of eight acres, which is washed by a beautiful body of water.

—— Petroleum lubrications do not seem to be the right thing. It is said that a Massachusetts Company have had 6,000 cases of calicoes thrown back on their hands, damaged by petroleum oil, which was used as a lubricator on the looms and spattered on the cloth.

—— The editor of the Houma Guard, Louisiana, in a recent look along Bayou du Large, saw but few negroes. "We walked out into the fields and saw no laborers but the planters themselves, their sons, or, in a few instances, white assistants. All were in the fields plowing, hoeing, harrowing or planting—men, women and children. They are mostly educated gentlemen." The crops were generally in fine order.

—— At the time of the explosion of the nitro-glycerine in the yard of Wells, Fargo & Co., in San Francisco, a lad was sitting at his desk writing, while plastering and timber fell around, without so much as hurting a hair on his head. The same boy was sitting on the paddle-box of the steamer Yosemite, when she was blown up, on a trip to Sacramento, and was blown entirly across the river, when he coolly swam back to the wreck to offer assistance to the less fortunate passengers.

—— The Portland Argus says, that Capt. J. J. Boyd has secured a patent which will make a complete revolution in applying buttons to garments. By this invention, buttons can be attached to any part of wearing apparel without the use of thread. The invention consists solely in making the button with a spiral wire to be inserted into the cloth like a cork-screw, and then pressed down flat so as to form a ring to hold the button in place.

—— It is proposed in Charleston, S. C., to convert the square of the burnt district into a public garden. This will be inclosed by a fire-proof block of buildings, the lower stories to be used as stores, while the upper will contain cafés, an opera house, etc.

Foreign.—The British authorities in Calcutta have just completed a census of the city. The whole population, including the suburbs, is 1,000,000 souls.

—— A Chinese mission, numbering 15 persons, has arrived in Paris. They are said to be superior to any Chinamen ever before seen in France.

—— When on a full war footing, the Austrian army consists of 579,000; the Prussian army, including the Landwehr, or militia, is composed of 566,150 men. In case of extreme need, Bavaria can have an army of 90,000 men, but at present her whole available force is 59,948 men. The Hanoverian army is about 25,500 strong; and the Saxon is of the same strength. Wurtemburg can bring 28,800 men into the field, and Baden about 18,700. Hesse-Darmstadt and Hesse-Cassel have together about 24,000 men under their command, —— The loss in England by the cattle plague is estimated at $15,000,000. The cotton famine, in three years, caused a loss in the manufacturing districts to the employers of labor of $200,000,000, and the laborers suffered a loss of $165,000,000 of wages, to say nothing of the losses of shopkeepers and other classes.

—— France owes $2,000,000,000; Spain owes $725,000,000; Italy owes somewhat more, and is fast increasing her liability; Austria owes $1,580,000,000; Russia, $1,395,000,000, and smaller powers, in some cases, in proportion, in others out of all proportion. Nearly all these debts have been contracted within 20 years, and Holland is the only power in Europe, though one of the smallest and weakest, which has done anything within that period to diminish hers.

—— The present King of Bavaria, anxious to become a citizen of the Swiss republic, has presented his demand in due form to the councils of Schwytz, Uri and Unterwalden. But it seems that the laws of Switzerland do not permit the reception of a foreigner as a citizen without naturalization, to which King Louis could not submit without renouncing his public duties in Bavaria, and his demand is therefore withdrawn.

—— The value of London sewage is computed at one to two pence per tun. Compared with guano, it takes from 828 to 1,250 tuns to equal in fertilizing value one tun of guano.

—— The population of the chief cities of England is as follows: London, 3,067,536; Liverpool, 484,337; Manchester, 358,855; Salford, 112,904; Birmingham, 335,798; Leeds, 228,187; Sheffield, 218,257; Bristol, 163,680; Newcastle-on-Tyne, 122,277; Hull, 105,233. The estimate for Edinburgh is 175,128; for Glasgow, 432,265; for Dublin, the city and suburbs, 318,137.

—— In 1864 every inhabitant of the British Isles received 23 letters, while in 1863 the proportion was 22. The total postal delivery in 1864 was upward of 170,000,000.

—— A German professor has been trying to measure the "ultimate atoms." From certain theoretical data he finds the thickness of an atom of atmospheric air to be 3,937-100,000,000,000ths of an inch. This is the last degree of science.

—— There are eight portraits of Queen Elizabeth in the London National Picture Gallery. These represent her at all ages, from rosy maidenhood to shriveled age. They all represent her as blonde, slight, with a light shade of red hair, blue eyes, thin and finely set mouth, and nose somewhat aquiline. One of them, a Flemish portrait, depicts her in a black, jeweled and quilted gown, with the partlet shown at the throat. Another, painted after death, shows us the Queen seated at a table, her head upon one hand, the other holding a book; she is very old now, and she wears a sad, thoughtful expression. Allegorical figures surround her, and Death is whispering in her ear.

AN INVISIBLE PRINCE.

IT was one of the fancies of Joseph the II., Emperor of Austria, to travel about his dominions, as well as into foreign countries, in the garb of a private citizen, unattended by any suite. By so doing, he arrived at many facts regarding the condition of his subjects which otherwise might never have fallen under his observation. His love for adventure was also gratified, and he enjoyed greatly the luxury for doing good by surprise—an eccentricity of his out of which many anecdotes have arisen.

While traveling through a remote district, in the year 1781, he heard sounds of festivity proceeding from a roadside inn, entering which, he inquired of the landlord what the occasion of the revels might be?

"There is a wedding-party in the house, sir," replied the host.

"May I take the liberty of joining them?" asked the Emperor, whose personal appearance was unknown to the inhabitants of the place—for the modern carte de visite had not yet been dreamed of, and engravings but seldom found their way to the remoter villages.

The landlord obtained the necessary permission, and the distinguished stranger was introduced to the bridal party. Being a man of great social gifts, he quickly made himself very popular with them, drank the health of the happy couple in a bumper of wine, and made what the reporters call a "neat and appropriate speech" on the occasion. After some time he took leave of his new acquaintances, whose astonishment may be guessed at when they found, under a bottle on the table, a check for 600 florins, payable at sight, signed by the Emperor Joseph II., and endorsed, "A dower for the bride."

Traveling in a plain carriage on one occasion, upon the good old-fashioned principle called "posting"—that is, hiring fresh horses at certain stages by the way—the Emperor arrived at a station where no horses were to be had. The innkeeper excused himself by saying that his wife had lately presented him with a son, and that all the horses were employed in fetching friends and relatives of the family from all quarters to assist at the christening, which was to take place that afternoon. The royal visitor at once tendered his services to hold the infant at the sacred font, an offer which was gladly accepted by the innkeeper, who was quite flattered at the idea of a fine gentleman acting in that capacity for him, instead of a burly bumkin—a relative of the family—who had been already engaged to do so. When the proper time arrived, the priest asked the sponsor to state his name.

"Joseph," replied the Emperor.

"And your family name?"

"Well," said the Emperor, "you write me down Joseph Second."

"But it will be necessary to add your station in life and occupation."

"Ah, yes! my trade, you mean—say I am an Emperor, then."

There was instantly a sensation among the guests, and the poor innkeeper nearly went into a fit through fright; but the Emperor quickly reassured him, and left some substantial tokens of good will for his little godson before taking leave.

Once he was expected to pass through a small town in France, and the good people were on tiptoe to see the Emperor. It so happened that he arrived there alone, and before any of his suite. The landlady of the little hostelry where he put up, being a gossiping sort of old body, put all sorts of questions to him to find out whether he belonged to the Emperor's suite, and the way in which he parried convinced her that he did.

At last, she brought him some hot water for shaving; unable to control her curiosity any longer, she asked the stranger, boldly, what kind of situation he held about the Emperor.

"I sometimes shave him," he replied, lathering his chin with great composure.

When at Paris he once hired a carriage to take him to the Luxembourg Gardens. As he was on his way the driver expressed much satisfaction at being engaged to go there, saying that Emperor Joseph was expected to be at the gardens that very day, and that he should like, above all things, to see him, hoping that they might arrive in time. The stranger assured him that there was no fear of the Emperor arriving there before they did, and, on being set down at the gate, handed him a piece of money wrapped up in paper. On opening the wrapper the driver found that he had received a double louis, and running after the stranger, showed it to him, saying that he must have made a mistake. Pleased with this proof of honesty in a man whose calling is not usually named in connection with that of virtue, the Emperor desired him to keep the golden coin, and the man, struck with surprise, for many of the passers-by now recognized and saluted the stranger, went back to his carriage exclaiming:

"It's the Emperor himself—I have seen the Emperor!"

Wandering in the neighborhood of Rome, once, the Emperor stopped to refresh himself at an inn, and asked the landlord whether there was any traveler staying there at that time who would give him the pleasure of his company. There was a reverend bishop there, the landlord said, but he was fatigued with his journey, and had retired to rest. The secretary of the bishop was, however, awake. Would his company be acceptable to the stranger? Certainly it would; and so the secretary was introduced—a clever, witty man, who partook of a bottle of wine with the lonely stranger, and entertained him greatly with his talk. The Emperor, still preserving his incognito, sounded the good priest with regard to the object of the bishop's visit to the Holy See.

"He went there," said the secretary, "to apply for a vacant benefice, although a very aged man, and already in possession of numerous church preferments."

This gift he hoped soon to obtain through the good offices of the Austrian Ambassador, to whom he had letters of recommendation. The Emperor was so much pleased with the manners and conversation of the secretary, that he gave him a letter of introduction to the same Ambassador, who, he said, might be able to serve him one way or another.

Shortly after his arrival at Rome, the secretary bethought him of his letter, and presented it, without imagining, however, that it would be of immediate service to him. Great was his surprise, then, when informed by the Ambassador that the letter was an autograph one of Joseph II., desiring him to obtain for the secretary the benefice sought for by the avaricious bishop.

A rebuff, at which the Emperor was much amused, was once experienced by him in Holland. Having heard much of the extreme cleanliness of the villages in that country, he wished to see the interior of one of their houses, at the doors of several of which he knocked without seeming to arouse any of the inmates. At last a door was opened to him, and he requested permission of the master of the house to enter.

"I hear the Emperor Joseph is expected in town today," said the Dutchman, "but were you the Emperor himself, I could not let you inside this house without first obtaining leave from my wife."

"I am the Emperor, then," said the stranger, displaying the diamond star on the breast of his inner coat.

Thereupon the Dutchman went in great haste to his wife, and begged of her to admit the royal stranger to a view of the premises, but she only said:

"Being an Emperor as he is, we could not expect him to take off his shoes at the door, and into this house he doesn't come one step with them on, Emperor or not;" and the door was shut in his face.

LIFE AT HOME VS. LIFE IN HOTELS.

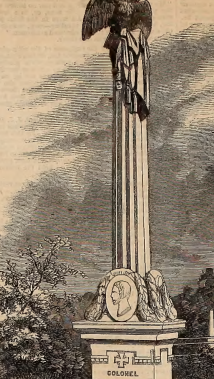
AMONG the novelties which have grown up of late years—and grown up very tall, too—are the great hotels. These places of residence, where you are undertaken—if the phrase may be allowed—on such a large scale, where everything is done for you, and all trouble taken off your hands, surely ought to meet the requirements of a great number of persons. The advantages of the system seem, at first sight, enormous. You pay no rent, you sign no leases or agreements, you have nothing to do with taxes, no servants' wages, no butcher's bills. You have no trouble in engaging servants, in drilling servants, in getting rid of servants. If the pipes be frozen in the course of a hard winter, or if they happen to burst when the said winter breaks up, they are no business of yours. The young man does not call to speak to you about the new kitchen range, nor does the gas man wish to see you in the hall "relative to the state of the meter." Then, what you want is always to be had. You want a bottle of soda water the last thing at night, you are not told there happens to be none in the house. You want a sandwich in the middle of the day; no uncompromising servant informs you that "there is no cold meat in the house." You want a basin of broth, and are not obliged to wait till the next day for it. You want to know where somebody lives. there is the last Directory to refer to; you want a messenger, he is ready in the hall; you have a telegram to send off, here is a form, and in another moment it is dispatched. For all these advantages you pay one weekly bill. When you think of the number of bills to be considered once a week by any ordinary housekeeper, the file of little red books to be gone through by some trustworthy person or other, this seems something more than a small advantage. A check is drawn once a week, and all is over. Rent, taxes, wages, housekeeping, are disposed of in five minutes. If the check in question do sometimes strike one as rather large, it is fair to consider how very much it represents.

GROTESQUE scarf pins are the "rage" for gentleman abroad. Dandies parade the street with a wonderfully life-like representation, in enamel, of a human eye an inch or two below the chin, or in place thereof a lighted cigar with a ruby at the end to indicate the fire or lucifer match, of precious metal, closely resembling the real article.



GEN. SCOTT.

A NATION mourns the death of a great man and honored son, and the pall of sadness has fallen upon us with the announcement that Winfield Scott has gone to his rest. True, he has been gathered, like a shock of corn, fully ripe, but we would fain have retained him a little longer, and cherished him as the man the people delighted to honor. To give more than a meagre sketch of Gen. Scott's career, would require a complete history of our country, for he has been so intimately identified with our national progress for half a century, and with all the great eras in our growth, that his life has been, in a sense, the nation's career, and filled up the measure of the nation's greatness.

Gen. Scott was born near Petersburg, Va., in 1786, was educated for the profession of the law, and admitted to the bar at the age of 20. About this time, however, political events were rapidly culminating in the dates of 1812, and blazing largely in the indignation which certain acts of Great Britain had created, and animated by a fervent patriotism, he applied for a commission in the army, and was appointed Captain of Artillery, thus beginning a military career unparalleled in brilliancy and success. When the war of 1812 was formally declared, Scott received the commission of Lieutenant-Colonel, and was sent to the Niagara frontier. His bravery and admirable conduct of the campaign are a part of history. Here he acquired the title of "The Hero of Lundy's Lane," by which he was afterward known to the civilized world, and for his gallant services was promoted to the rank of Major-General, the highest then known in the American army. Gen. Scott likewise rendered important services to his country as a diplomatist, maintaining the dignity of his Government in several delicate and difficult complications. His relations to Mexico, in our war with that country, are too familiar to need repetition. He marched triumphantly from the sea-coast, to the capital, and in six months ended his campaign and the war, eliciting from the veteran Wellington the declaration that this campaign was unsurpassed in military annals.

Gen. Scott's career during the recent rebellion was fully in keeping with his previous career. He recognized the great fact that his allegiance was due to his country, and that it could be neither a true patriot nor an honest man, should he allow any merely local considerations to divert his loyalty or weaken his devotion. He resisted all appeals of State pride, and gave his entire energies to the support of the Government in the hour of peril.

As director of military affairs, Gen. Scott first secured the protection of Washington, and next collected the men and materials necessary to put the success of the national arms beyond a doubt. During the whole summer of 1861, as Commander-in-Chief of the army, Gen. Scott continued at his post, consulting with the Executive and Cabinet, and forming the general plans of the campaign; and not till he saw the Border States firmly bound to the Union, the capital of the nation safe, and the immense army of the North formed and ready to take the field, did he feel that the duty of retirement had become imperative. Accordingly, in October, he addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, conveying his desire to be relieved from active service on account of his increasing infirmities. This request was granted, and the next day the President and Cabinet, in a body, waited on the veteran General to express their sympathy in his personal afflictions, and their profound sense of the important public services rendered by him to his country during his long and brilliant career. Since that occasion Gen. Scott has spent his winters in New York and his summers at West Point. For several weeks his health has been poor, but he was not considered in any immediate danger. Only two days before his death he rode out, but the next day he was confined to his bed; and at length, calmly and serenely, full of honors and full of years, he passed

On the reverse side are recorded the place and date of his birth and death.

THE VOSBURCH MONUMENT.

On Wednesday last a monument, erected to the memory of Col. Abraham S. Vosburgh, was inaugurated with imposing ceremonies at Greenwood Cemetery. The 71st Regiment, formerly under Col. Vosburgh's command, paraded on the occasion, the remains of their late commander were deposited in their final resting-place with military honors, and an address was delivered by Mayor Hoffman, commemorative of the virtues and character of the deceased. In obedience to orders, Col. Vosburgh accompanied the regiment to Washington in April, 1861, for the defense of the capital, and gave himself up with all the ardor of his nature to the discharge of his responsible duties. Being in very feeble health, his labors were too severe, and on the 30th May he died from hemorrhage of the lungs.

The monument stands on Battle Hill, near the main entrance of the cemetery, and consists of a Corinthian column broken at the summit. At the top of the shaft stands an eagle with out-spread wings, clasping in its talons the American colors, in the folds of which are

RABBI MORRIS JACOB RAPHALL.

DR. RAPHALL, whose portrait we give this week, occupies a prominent position among American Jews, and is well-known throughout our country as a gentleman of literary culture and attainments, liberal views and persuasive eloquence. He was born at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1798, and at an early age destined by his father for the Jewish ministry. He received his education at the Jewish College of Copenhagen, and was so precocious, that at the early age of 18 he was entitled to the honorable designation of Rabbi. He came to this country in 1849, and was immediately installed as Rabbi of the congregation Beal Jeshurun, with which he is still connected. Dr. Raphall has published several works of a devotional character, that possess great merit. He has likewise addressed himself as lecturer, orator and author to the Christian population of our land, and done much to remove the absurd prejudices that too long separated the believers in a common Bible. Dr. Raphall is a pleasing, forcible speaker, who always commands the attention of an audience, and instructs as well as pleases his hearers. Without being a bigoted sectarian, Rabbi Raphall devotes himself earnestly to the interests of his own people, while at the same time he commands the confidence and respect of other religious denominations. At the present time he is relieved from full service in his own synagogue, but retains his official connection with it. Dr. Raphall is an example of that liberality of feeling and courtesy of conduct that should ever mark the public teacher, and his influence will long be felt as salutary and well directed.

THE JEWISH SYNAGOGUE,

34th Street, N. Y.

WE give this week a fine view of the Synagogue of the Congregation Beal Jeshurun, situated on 34th street, in this city. The structure is an imposing one, in the Romanesque style of architecture. The front, which is built of light freestone, with granite dressings, consists of a central portion of two stories flanked at the angles by turreted buttresses. A court along each side of the building affords access to the basement, and insures ample light and air. The auditory is reached from the street by a flight of stone steps, through a vestibule with three large entrance doors. The auditory is divided into nave and aisles by columns with circular shafts, octagonal bases and enriched capitals, bronzed and embellished with high colors and gold. The entire interior of the auditory is decorated in polychrome, and the ornamentation of the clerestory and ark is particularly rich and elaborate. The building will accommodate about 800 persons, and its entire cost was $70,000. It is a beautiful structure, and in every way highly creditable to the taste and liberality of the congregation and the committee under whose supervision it has been erected. Rev. Dr. MORRIS J. Raphall is Rabbi, whose eloquence and devotion attract large crowds to his ministrations.

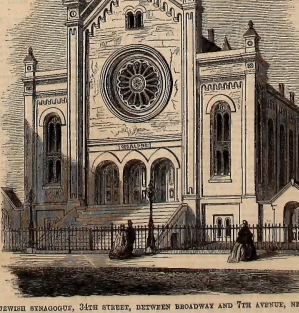
ST. PAUL'S BAY.

SUMMER tourists, who have traversed the great lakes, and their grand outlet, the St. Lawrence, have always been charmed with the variety and beauty of the scenery that invited every footstep of their progress and passed in review like a gorgeous panorama. The lower portions of the St. Lawrence are, however, comparatively unknown; yet few places possess more general interest and pleasing variety. Here, the picturesque, the beautiful, the wild and grand, present themselves at every point, in every possible combination. Here the invalid can find a safe retreat from chilling blasts, and in pure air and mineral springs find a specific for many human ills. Here the devotee of science may push his favorite researches among the mines that abound, and the sportsman can follow his game, with no fear of legislative enactments and no risk of failing to get on the scent.

St Paul's Bay, a sketch of which we give on page 197, is situated on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, about 60 miles from Quebec, and from the river presents a remarkable opening in the romantic chain of mountains that rise precipitously from the water. The mountain shown on the right of the sketch is particularly grand, its summit being clothed with pine, fir and pines, and its slopes variegated with rich cereal productions and white farm-houses, with graceful clumps of maple and elm.

The village seen in the distance contains a church, a nunnery, a school-house, a few stores, and the dwellings of the principal inhabitants. In front of the church there is a large number of short posts, placed in rows to which those who come in vehicles fasten their horses during the hours of divine service. These horses are the short, shaggy, but spirited and serviceable Canadian ponies, and as they are all tethered to the posts, to the number of a hundred or more, they present a unique appearance.

The people of this region are antiquated in their dress and primitive in their habits; the men wearing the huge collars of the last century, and braiding their hair in cues, and the women not considering modern fashion-plates for the style of their apparel.



The commerce of the village is conducted on the ancient and honorable principle of barter—eggs and other articles representing pennies; and it is not unusual for a dame, in purchasing a piece of tape or some trifle, to put down an egg or two in payment, as deliberately as we would a cent. Altogether, this is a delightful region for a brief visit, and tourists might safely put it down in their note-books as likely to repay exploration.

LEMUEL COOK.

IN our paper of the 26th May we gave the portrait and recorded the death of William Hutchings, one of the few surviving patriots of the Revolution. Since then another of those old heroes has slept his last sleep and gone to his reward. LEMUEL COOK, whose portrait, drawn from a photograph, is on page 197, was born in Northbury, Conn., in 1761. He entered the patriot army in 1777, served through the whole war, and at its close was honorably discharged. Some years since he removed to Western New York, and spent the last years of his life in a quiet, unostentatious manner, surrounded by his children and grandchildren to the fifth generation. He was lively and frugal in his habits, and, possessing an iron constitution, enjoyed good health until within a few months of his death, when he declined into helpless dotage. He died at Clarendon N. Y., on Monday, May 30, at the great age of 104 years

GEN. SCOTT'S REMAINS IN THE CHAPEL AT WEST POINT.

THE funeral of Gen. Scott was observed in a manner becoming the distinguished character and services of a nation's noble and honored son. The day was most propitious, and from an early hour in the morning large crowds from all directions poured into West Point, to witness the solemn rites testify their respect to the deceased. Gen. Cullum, the Superintendent of the Academy, was entrusted with the arduous task of carrying out the entire proceedings, and he succeeded in accomplishing the work, with the exception of a few subordinate officers, in the most prompt and satisfactory manner. At an early hour the remains of the departed hero were taken from the hotel, where they had lain since his death, to the chapel, accompanied by a guard of honor. Here it was placed on a catafalque, draped in black and white, and covered with blossoms of the lily of the valley. The lid of the coffin was then thrown open, and His pallid countenance of carrying out the entire proceedings, and he head was pure and free from wrinkles, the eyes seemed full, the mouth was natural, and the color that peculiar pale which, during the latter years of the General's life, characterized his face in repose. A large number of persons were availed themselves of the opportunity of gazing for the last time upon the calm features of the deceased, and among them several old soldiers who had erved under Gen. Scott years and years ago and who, as they stood by the side of their great leader, wiped away the tears that blinded their aged eyes and coursed down their furrowed cheeks. Afterward, the Cadet Corps entered at a quickstep in double file, marched up the broad slate, looked at the face of their late friend and general, and then dividing into two ranks, marched out, the one at the right side, the other at the left.

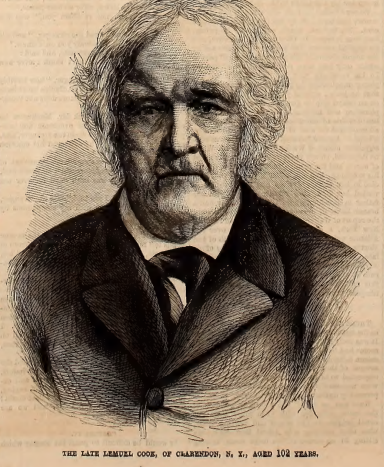
The chapel was neatly and appropriately adorned. Our engraving shows its appearance, with the coffin placed in position, and the crowd passing in and out to view the dead. The draperies consisted mainly of trophy flags. Over the chancel the United States flags, put up on the occasion of Mr. Lincoln's visit, surmounted with a blue silk pinion, richly trimmed, bearing the words, "God and Our Country," still remain. In a semicircular enclosure, near the ceiling, is the excellent fresco painting, by Weir, representing War and Peace, by a male and female figure, with the implements of war and the olive branch. The figures are leaning upon a monument, upon which are inscribed the words: "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." The pillars of the chapel were handsomely twined with the Mexican flags captured by Gen. Scott during the war. Similar trophies were hung from the front of the choir gallery. At the left side is a large glass case, containing several Mexican standards, too much worn to be displayed. At the right side of the church stands another case, enclosing flags taken from the English and the Hessians during the Revolution, together with some mountain howitzers. Trophies of various kinds adorn the walls between the black marble tablets, on which are inscribed the names of distinguished officers now deceased. All these trophies and decorations were draped in crape, the bases of the pillars being covered with black silk. Black and white ribbons were hung on each pew in the centre isle. The second pew from the chancel, on the right of the chapel, was the General's, and has his name on a silver plate. It is the only pew thus distinguished, and was draped with black.

At half-past twelve P.M. a procession was formed in front of the hotel, in the following order:

Mourners and Intimate Friends of the Deceased and Servants of the Family.
The Congressional Delegation, President of the Senate, and Speaker of the House of Representatives.
Officers of the Military Academy.
Officers of Volunteers and Militia.
Officers of the Regular Army.
Officers of the Navy and Marine Corps.
Officers of the General Staff of the Army.
His Honor Mayor Hoffman and the Committee of the Common Council of the City of New York.
Governors of the several States and their Staffs.
General-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States and Staff.
Veterans of the War of 1812.
Societies and Fraternities.
Citizens.

The line of march having been taken up, the mourners, pall-bearers and escort of honor marched in silence to the church, where the funeral services were to be held. Rev. Dr. French, Chaplain of the post, accompanied by Rev. Mr. Warren, of Elizabeth, N. J., and Rev. Mr. Hoffman, of Garrison, N. Y., met the procession at the door, and the services commenced with a solemn dirge from the organ.



In the meantime Bishop Potter entered and assisted Chaplain French in the service. Gen. Grant took a place in the fourth pew from the front, on the right side of the centre aisle, and leaned against a pillar draped in one of the captured Mexican flags. To the right and rear of him sat the Congressional delegations. The army officers and representatives of the National Guard sat further back. The committees of the Common Council, with Mayor Hoffman, occupied seats at the left side. The veterans of 1812, who numbered only a few venerable officers, entered the church late, and sat in the rear of the Common Council. The pall-bearers were placed to the right and left of the chancel, and the guard of honor stood at either side of the coffin, upon which was placed a beautiful laurel wreath, while the catafalque, the railings of the chancel and the baptismal font were profusely covered with hawthorn and lily of the valley. The coffin was a splendid piece of workmanship. It was built of solid mahogany, covered with fine black cloth, trimmed with silver fringe. Six silver handles—with appropriate designs on the plate, including cannon, flags, guns, bayonets, drums and swords, indicative of the military profession—were on the sides. But the simplest ornament of all was the inscription on the lid. A small silver plate of oval shape contained the words:

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT, and no more—no date, no age, no record—and yet it tells all the story that the grave cares to know of the inmate consigned to its keeping. All that lives of Winfield Scott will find a befitting shrine in the memory of the American people. The service was conducted strictly according to the ritual of the Episcopal Church, commencing with a hymn by the choir, which was composed mostly of ladies, including Mrs. Col. Black and Mrs. Grebel. Dr. French then read a portion of the first Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, commencing at the 15th chapter, verse 20, and read to the end. After the first half of the service was through, Bishop Potter authorized Dr. French to read a prayer for the President, Congress and people of the United States—a most impressive part of the service as read by the venerable chaplain in a clear and musical voice. The 140th hymn was then sung by the choir, the Lord's Prayer was recited by Dr. French—the responses being made by the Rev. Messrs. Warren and Hoffman, who knelt at the side of the sanctuary in full canonicals, as were also Dr. French and Bishop Potter. The ceremonies concluded by the celebrated soprano solo, "Angels Ever Bright and Fair," by a lady in the choir, during the rendering of which the coffin was removed on the shoulders of the escort detailed for that purpose. The clergy preceded the coffin, the congregation slowly following, and the brief but solemn ceremony was at an end.

The coffin was then conveyed to the hearse, which was a gun-carriage, draped with black, and festooned with evergreens and flowers, and garnished with the American flag. It was drawn by six artillery horses, and so constructed that the coffin would be in view of all.

As the procession moved toward the cemetery minute guns were fired and the Dead March played. Here an open grave, near the resting-place of Gen. Buford, was ready to receive all that was mortal of Gen. Scott. As the coffin was conveyed from the hearse and placed in the box prepared for it, Bishop Potter read the first portion of the grave-service, and Chaplain French conducted the exercises at the close. The box was then lowered into the ground, a little earth thrown upon it, three volleys fired by the Cadets, detailed for that purpose, and the sad ceremonies of the day were ended. Thus simply and fittingly, amid scenes and associations he loved in life, Gen. Scott was peacefully laid to rest.

Our illustration shows the fine monument to Gen Buford, Cozzens's Hotel in the distance, the noble trees and grassy watch and ward over the graves of heroes, and gives a distinct view of the scenes at the burial.

THE LATE LEMUEL COOK, OF CLARENDON, N. Y., AGED 102 YEARS.

FEMALE FASHIONS AMONG THE HINDOOS.

THE female dress, too, has undergone some slight change. In addition to the wrapper, it is not unusual in the present day for Hindoo women of the higher ranks to wear a petticoat and bodice, in imitation of the Mahomedan female dress. These form no part of the ancient Hindoo costume.

Hindoo parents take a foolish pride in loading their children with ornaments. You will often see a young boy with massive silver rings round his ankles, so heavy that he can scarcely walk. When they grow, these ornaments are generally laid aside. But it is not so with the females. Hindoo women wear massive rings on their fingers, arms and ankles. Rings on the toes are not uncommon, and gold coins worn in the hair, or round the waist. And more remarkable still, almost every woman, rich or poor, has a gold ring in her nose. It is a much prized ornament. To be without it is regarded by some castes as a sign of widowhood; and married women, it is said, have a superstitious dread of removing it from its place, even for a single instant.

The proverb holds good in India, that "all is not gold that glitters." Not a strapwork brass and pewter are made to do duty for gold and silver, and glass for precious stones. There is an odd kind of ornament which many of the poorest women wear on their wrists, consisting of a number of painted rings, made of a resinous substance, called shellac, which in appearance resembles sealing-wax. These ornaments bear about the same relation to gold bracelets that paste diamonds do to real diamonds. They are, however, showy, and please the wearers.

Shells and flowers are also worn as ornaments. You sometimes see young Hindoo women wear sweet-scented flowers (such as the Indian jessamine) as an ornament in the hair. I am told that flowers which have been presented to an offering to some deity, are most prized for this purpose.

It is a common practice for Hindoo women to paint the eyelids and round the eyes, with lamp-black, and the tips of the fingers and nails with the red henna plant. You frequently see young children also, both boys and girls, painted in this fashion.

A SINGLE grain of barley was planted by an agriculturist in the Isle of Man in 1872, and the same year produced 300 grains. These were sown, and the second year's produce was about half a peck. These were again sown, and the third year's produce was 14 pounds, which being again sown, have realized this year about seven bushels, covering a space of one hundred yards by five. Thus there have been produced in four years seven bushels of barley from a single grain.

THE LOON.

BY ALFRED B. STREET.

On! the lonely loon, how he peals his tune
As he rides on the lovely lake!
He rides all day, and the ripples play
And sparkle around him and break;
Oh, he rides all day, and none says nay—
Not even the hunter's bold!
For "Ah!" says he, "you and I don't agree!"
And pealeth the louder his call.
Oh! the lonely loon! oh! the dreary old loon!
He rideth and pealeth his quavering croon.

Not only all day, but he's up and away
When the night comes frowning amain,
For his deep sea nook, and he's over a rover
From daybreak to daybreak again.
He chooses some isle where the broad waves smile,
Where his mate lays her eggs of green,
And he watches the while around many a mile,
That no foe should break in on the scene!
Oh! the mated loon! oh! the watchful loon!
He watcheth and watcheth in closest commune.

And when the young into life have sprung,
Like little round balls in the nest,
More closely he watcheles, all danger he catches,
And he meets it with dauntless breast.
Oh! all danger he scorns, and full loudly he warns,
For a loving old size is he!
The hunter he flouts, with ironical shouts,
For you know that they cannot agree!
Oh! the old size loon! oh! the doting old loon!
He would rule full well his young callow boon.

But when they are grown, once more he's alone;
And he calls up the echoes again;
And his kindled breast finds but little rest,
As he once more resumes his reign.
Round points all is one he roves and he roves,
And dives and darts up with a gleam;
He loves his broad lake, where the broad swells shake,
But he holds in disdain the stream.
Oh! the wild loon! oh! the sly old loon!
With his feathers of mail and his wide-webbed shoon.

Oh! the bullet it bites, but it harmless smites
On his feathers of armor-proof;
Oh! how he chuckles! how the hunter he foutls!
Nor deigns he to keep far aloof;
He dives at the shot, and it is not forgot
That he's a most genius hurtleseary!
And "Ah!" sounds his strain; "now try it again!"
And he's off like the dart of a ray!
Oh! the brave old loon! oh! the daring old loon!
He's at us as the fisher, and cute as the 'coon!

But sometimes the ball makes a deadly call,
And his quaver is choked in death;
Oh! the hunter he laughs, and a dram he quaffs
As he sees the striking breath;
For no more will he warn the deer with his horn
And he nails him, with joyful blow,
On the weather-beat hull of his rough log-hut
With the father and hawk in a row.
Oh! the sly old loon! oh! the cute old loon!
There he is now in the sunshine and blinks in the moon!

Oh! he comrades the deer, and his note of fear
Makes his comrade look up with a start!
The hunter he sees in runaway trees,
And is aware of a foe at a dart.
And "Aha!" says he, and he quavers in glee,
"I have spoiled this one your sport!
Brother hunter he off! don't you hear me scoff!
Be off to some other resort!"
Oh! the scornful old loon! the sneering old loon!
How he scorns and sneers like a shrill bassoon.

In the earliest spring are the wild birds sing,
And the lake from the ice is set free,
For will ever his throat in its sauey note,
And he rides and he dives in his glee.
In the latest fall, when the wild winds call,
And the anchor-ice skims the lake,
You will still see him there, but at morn he is—where?
No more the totes echo and shake!
Oh! the weather-wise loon! oh! the fore-thoughtful loon!
He is shouting far south, under skies of June.

The Mortimores.

CHAPTER I.

"BUT if Walter Stanley should return?"

"What nonsense you talk, Mr. Mortimore," replied the handsome woman, somewhere over the middle age. "If Walter Stanley should return? Why, my dear husband, you are growing positively childish! Poor Walter has been in his grave these ten years!"

"We cannot be sure of that, my love," replied her husband; "he was always of an adventurous nature, and although we saw his name as having been killed by the Indians, on his way across the plains, he many one of these days, come back and claim his own. Heaven knows how my son should be to see him again; but it would beggar us all if a long lost beggar as all!"

A deep sigh escaped from Mrs. Mortimore, as she replied:

"That is true, Mr. Mortimore; and so true, that it is impossible ever to happen!"

"Rather a paradox," said her husband, with a sigh; "and I must say, although I ought not to avow it, I hope Walter Stanley never will return: it would make one man rich, and all of us wretched and ruined. And yet my heart often rebukes me for having touched his money."

"Nonsense," replied his wife; "it was to save yourself from ruin, and there is not a merchant living but would have done the same! But, really," she continued, after a pause, "is all your own capital gone? Is there none of my fortune left?"

Mr. Mortimore shook his head mournfully, and said, with a sigh:

"Not a dollar. I tell you, that, if I had to refund Walter's trust-money, I should not have a dollar left, and that leaves no margin for interest."

"Well," said the lady, "I have no new gowns over imaginary troubles; Walter has long been in his quiet grave. Poor fellow! He was a noble boy, too fond of reading Robinson Crusoe and adventures, which really was the cause of his death. The idea of traveling in the far West to hunt the buffalo! Well, we have the consolation, we both did our best to prevent his going; but he would, and he was of age and his own master. I had hoped to have seen him Mrs. Lucy's bonnet; but we cannot have everything our own way, and God's will be done!"

For a few minutes Mr. and Mrs. Mortimore sat with downcast eyes in a perfect silence. The lady was, after all a woman's prerogative, the first to break it:

"You sent the order to Delmonico's?"

"I did, my dear wife."

"You must not begrudge the cost," observed his wife. "No; you do not often give a reception. Mortimore," said the lady, "don't you think that Alfred Berthesan would be a good match for our Lucy?"

Mr. Mortimore raised his eyes, as he said:

"Yes; but do you think he inclines toward our daughter?"

"He comes very often; he invariably manages to find us when driving in the Park; he seems always to know when we are going to the opera; and, in a word, if that will be encouraged prosperity, it may be brought about."

"Has he said anything to Lucy?"

"I rather think he has; but, you know, she is a very reticent girl."

"Well, we shall see."

Let us pause a few minutes to inform the reader that the gentlemen belonged to the upper ten. The family consisted of the two whose conversation we have already narrated and Lucy, their only child. At the minute our story opens, there was also a niece, Kate, a brilliant Boston belle, was on a visit, and, by her sprightly manners, varied accomplishments, and dashing conversation, quite threw her sedate cousin Lucy into the shade. Indeed, judging from the commanding role she played while on her occasional visits to the mansion, she naturally have concluded she was the mistress of the establishment, and that her uncle, aunt and cousin occupied the position of butler, housekeeper and humble companion. And yet the interpretation so charming that the whole household, including her relatives, were in love with the brilliant and wealthy Kate Mortimore, of Boston. The death of her parents, and a large fortune, had left her entirely her own mistress and in possession of a very handsome fortune.

She had come for many days to get of her uncle and aunt, for while they loved their daughter Lucy fondly, they looked with proud and admiring eyes on their brilliant and fascinating niece. She was well-deserving all they felt for her, being at once refined, affable and good-tempered, with a dash of that imperiousness which is so fascinating in a lovely and virtuous girl. Although a universal favorite, she had a few detractors; but the bitterest criticisms they could make on her was that she was a girl, which in her case meant that she was perfection. Such was the case with men, and that she treated all with that empressement so inexpressibly attractive to the sterner sex.

Walter Stanley, who alluded to by Mr. Mortimores, had been left by his dying father to their care. His fortune, which was a very large one, had been invested in Government securities, and his original amount had been greatly increased by the accumulation of the dividends, a small part of which only had been required to his education. In his twentieth year he had so inflamed his young imagination by reading prairie adventures that he joined several young gentlemen's parties on an inland trip to Oregon, for purposes of exploration and hunting. The last account ever heard of this adventurous youth was that every all murdered far west of the Rocky Mountains by a band of Indians. Mr. and Mrs. Mortimore consequently mourned Walter Stanley as dead, when he departed, seven years before, Lucy was a girl of seven, and the recollections of one who, during his vacations, had made her a kind of pet, soon died in her memory. Kate had not at that time visited her New York relatives, living with her father in London, where the Mortimores had a branch house of business. About five years after the report of Walter's melancholy fate had reached New York, a commercial crisis swept over the Atlantic cities, and with it went the wealth of the Mortimores. It was then, in the midst of their ruin, that Mr. Mortimore, who considered his fortune forfeit, because his own, saved himself from utter ruin by appropriating it to his own use. Indeed, this enabled him to ride through the financial tempest, which had overwhelmed so many others.

CHAPTER II.

THERE was a gay and brilliant throng assembled in the spacious drawing-rooms of Mr. Mortimore. It was truly a splendid sight. The entire suite of rooms had been thrown open, and in the middle saloon dancing was kept up with great spirit. As several of their most intimate friends had been requested to bring any friend they chose, there were necessarily many guests there who were personally unknown to the Mortimores.

Kate was, as usual, the presiding goddess of the scene, eclipsing with even more than her usual brightness the placid and retiring Lucy, who, after waltzing with Alfred Berthesan, was sitting in an alcove of the large room, talking with him those sender nothings which pave the way for more passionate outpourings, which culminate in that frantic leap in the dark—Popping the question.

It was at this minute, when Lucy and Alfred were talking over the last new opera, that Kate, who had been receiving the homage of the guests, approached where the two lovers were seated, and said:

"Lucy, who is that pale, oarworn gentleman, now looking at the pictures?"

"Well," said the lady, "I do not know. I have also noticed him. I do not like him, he seems so gloomy."

"He is!" observed Lucy's lover, "he puts me in mind of the skeleton at the Egyptian feast; there is not one bit of gayety in his whole being."

"At all events," said Kate, "I will engage my new ear-rings against Lucy's brooch that he is a gentleman. I can don't like his looks, Lucy: now, I'll be equally candid—I do."

Alfred gave a merry laugh, and Lucy smiled with her usual placid composure.

"Why," said Alfred, "I declare the mysterious stranger is really coming this way."

"Lucy, and all!" said Kate; "Suppose, Alfred, we leave Kate to entertain him, since she is so favorably impressed with his appearance?"

As Alfred and Lucy arose from the alcove, the stranger came up, and bowing to Kate, said:

"A pleasant sight, Miss Mortimore."

"What is?" said Kate, with one of her sweetest smiles.

"To see such a goodly collection of happy faces."

"Are happy faces such a rare thing, then?"

"To me, Miss Mortimore."

Kate gave another of her beaming looks, as she said:

"Oh, then's always happiness to be found even in this world if we only seek it, and in the world to come without seeking."

As she said this, she gave the stranger one of her most winning looks, and advanced to her cousin and aunt, who were seated on the other side of the room.

"My dear uncle, as I am a woman, I have, of course, no curiosity," said Kate; "but still I must say that I should like a little of information, who is that gentleman with the long beard, now leaning against the pillar?"

Mr. Mortimore looked as his lively niece had directed, and said:

"I cannot tell you, dearest Kate. I have never seen him before. He has come, I presume, with some of our friends."

Kate took her seat close to Mr. and Mrs. Mortimore, and began to talk to herself: "I am strangely interested in that pale gentleman; what a very noble figure! and his face is the saddest, and yet the handsomest I ever saw."

As these thoughts were passing through her mind, the stranger advanced to where they were seated, and, bowing to Mr. Mortimore, said:

"May I venture to ask the favor of one minute's conversation in your library?"

Mr. Mortimore looked gravely, as he rose, and left the room with the gentleman.

"Very strange," said Mrs. Mortimore. "What can he have to say to you uncle? I do not like his manners or his looks."

"Nor I, aunt," said Kate. "Don't be alarmed, aunt—he'll not eat my uncle!"

CHAPTER III.

WITH his usual composure, Mr. Mortimore led the stranger across the hall to what was termed the library, and, motioning him to a chair, took one opposite to that which he had pointed out for his unknown guest.

"You seem to have forgotten me, Mr. Mortimore?" said the latter, after a short pause.

"I certainly do not recollect you," was the others reply.

"Look again," observed the stranger, "and see if you cannot recall somebody you once knew."

Mr. Mortimore looked earnestly, and said:

"I must confess that I don't think I ever saw your face before."

"Alas!" continued the stranger, "how terribly a few years' misfortunes and hardships must have changed me, when Mr. Mortimore does not recognize Walter Stanley!"

Had a thunderbolt struck Mr. Mortimore he could not have been more overcome and surprised. He fell back upon the stranger, and, after an eager scrutiny, he mastered his emotion sufficiently to articulate:

"Your voice and eyes remind me somewhat of Walter; but the resemblance must be accidental, since Walter Stanley has been dead for over ten years."

"It was reported, I am told," said the stranger, "but I was murdered with my companions by the Indians."

"It was."

"I was the only one who escaped; the savage fiends left me for dead. Next morning, a train of emigrants, on their way to the mines, found me, and acted toward me the part of the good Samaritan."

"Rather a strange story," observed Mr. Mortimore.

"True for all that," said the other, his face flushing with suppressed indignation at the implied suspicion. "But I must crave your pardon for interrupting you at such an unseemly time. I will now leave these papers with you, and call on you to-morrow." So saying, the stranger rose, bowed, and left the library.

As he closed the door Mr. Mortimore opened the packet that the stranger had placed in his hands, and after perusing them with eagerness and excitement, threw himself back in the chair, saying, in a voice tremulous with anguish, "Past doubt! past doubt, it is Walter Stanley, and we are beggars!"

CHAPTER IV.

It would be difficult to paint the dismay which fell upon them, when Mrs. Mortimore announced next morning to Lucy and Kate the reappearance of Walter Stanley, and that his coming had rendered her husband to poverty. It was while the family were seated, discussing their unwelcome position, that a servant announced this unwelcome stranger.

"Show him into the library," said Mr. Mortimore, "and I will go to him immediately."

When the gentleman had closed the door, he rose, with a heavy sigh, and, kissing his wife with a grave tenderness, murmured, "Now to the most painful duty of my life."

On entering the library where Walter Stanley was seated, Mr. Mortimore advanced toward him with great cordiality, and, taking his hand, exclaimed: "My dear Walter, you must excuse my want of reception last night, but the news was so startling, and so unexpected, that I could not realize the fact. Now, indeed, I am angry with myself that I did not at once recognize you."

Walter returned his guardian's warmth with equal cordiality, and then, after some interesting conversation, Mr. Mortimore informed him that in a few days he would be prepared to give him an account of his stewardship and pay over to him the full amount of his fortune.

Walter begged Mr. Mortimore to consult his own convenience in the matter, and, after an apology for the suddenness of his arrival, in a few manly words expressed his admiration of his daughter; and, after ascertaining from her father that her affections were not engaged, he proposed for her hand.

As a drowning man catches at a straw, Mr. Mortimore grasped this proposition, and promised to consult his wife and daughter without delay. Walter postponed being formally introduced to his wife and family till the next day, when he should learn how his proposal had been received by Lucy.

Mrs. Mortimore, who was far more worldly-minded than her husband, was delighted at the favorable impression presented thus providentially to them, and after urging upon Lucy that her duty demanded her acquiescence, wrung from her husband a very reluctant assent to receive Walter as her future husband.

Kate's surprise and indignation at Walter's proposals were unbounded, for, knowing the attachment existing between Lucy and Alfred, she saw that she was sacrificing herself for the sake of her family. But Lucy's despondency in the matter was too rooted to allow her to follow her brilliant cousin's advice, and assert her own dignity and independence.

Next morning, as Lucy was sitting alone in the music-room, Mr. Mortimore suddenly entered, leading Walter.

"Now, Walter, there is Lucy, and I leave you to plead your own cause. It was always your father's wish that your two families should be united, and I need not add it is also mine."

With these words Mr. Mortimore left the room, not observing Walter's look of wild astonishment as he gazed upon the fair girl before him. Bowing to Lucy, he commenced a desultory conversation, asking, among other questions, if the lady was whom he had conversed with the previous evening, at the steamer.

"That, Mr. Stanley, is my cousin Kate."

Walter bit his lips; and having thanked Lucy for the honor she had done in entertaining his suit, took his leave, observing that, as he was engaged to dine there that day, he should have the pleasure of seeing her again. Scarcely had he gone, Lucy rushed to Kate's room and confided to her sympathizing bosom all her sorrow.

"Do you love him?" said Kate, "that is a very wicked thing to! one man and marry another?"

"I know it, dearest Kate," was Lucy's heartbroken response; "but what can I do? Can I see my dear parents beggared? No; I will do a daughter's duty, and I hope that death will soon release me from the trouble of life."

"You talk like a silly child," returned her cousin, "and not as a woman. If I had a hundred fathers and mothers they never should make me the base bale of cotton to any man breathing! Why don't you frankly inform Mr. Stanley that your heart is another?" Throw yourself upon his generosity; and if there is any truth in the human countenance, I will forfeit my diamonds that he'll not only release you, but help your father to extricate himself from his painful dilemma."

The two cousins were discussing the subject, Lucy's maid announced that Mr. Stanley was in the drawing-room, and that her mother wished her to entertain him till she was ready to receive him.

"Lucy," said Kate, "I will go. Leave the matter in my hands, and I shall make either marry the man myself than see you sacrifice your happiness. Now, can a woman do more for a friend than that?"

With one of her merry laughs, Kate left her sorrowful cousin, and went to the drawing-room. Her face was beamed with pleasure as he advanced to meet her.

"Mr. Stanley," commenced Kate, "I have come, on behalf of a lady, to appeal to your magnanimity."

"If I never possessed that virtue before," was Walter's gallant reply, "your voice would call it into life."

Kate gave him one of her archest looks, as she answered:

"Don't be too sure of that; the most generous of men do not find it an easy thing to give up a charming girl."

"You puzzle me," said Walter, taking her hand.

"I will be plain, then. My cousin has yielded to the importunities of her parents, and promised to receive you as her affianced husband?"

"She has done me that honor."

"Now, Mr. Stanley, I want you to release her from that promise."

"Indeed!" observed Walter, his face assuming a serious aspect.

"Oh, please don't look so despairing about it; you can't be so desperately in love with her, after only one short meeting—oh, I beg pardon, two You saw my cousin last night, but did not speak a word to her, for I watched you."

"You watched me!" replied Walter, with a pleasant smile.

"Yes—that is it is for a lady to be a spy, I confess you raised my curiosity, and I watched you; but, oh! I see it required no words—it was love at first sight. You think with Marlowe, 'He never loved who loved not at first sight.'"

"Indeed you are wrong," observed Walter, still holding Kate's hand, which, strange to say, she made no effort to withdraw; "but it is not so light a thing to relinquish so charming a person as your cousin."

"You think her charming?" asked Kate.

"Well, do not you?—does not everybody?"

"Oh, certainly; but she would not suit everybody, and, if I have any skill in judging character, she would not suit you."

"Why?" said Walter, with a smile.

"Because she loves another," answered Kate, seriously.

"Well, I will relinquish her on one condition."

"What is that?" eagerly asked Kate.

"That you will find me another wife!"

"Oh! you are asking too much now, really, Why don't you advertise in the Herald?"

"Well, I will also do more, if you accept my commission," resumed Walter; "I will take upon myself the responsibility of declining Miss Lindy's and."

"Good gracious, Mr. Stanley," replied Kate, with much theatrical gravity: "find you a wife! Why, I shall have enough to do, in these degenerate days, to find myself a husband."

"Perhaps," remarked Walter, "the same task might accomplish both objects."

"Oh, dear!" laughed Kate, "what a saving of trouble that would be. But, really, I am wasting time. I now candidly tell you that, although my poor, sensible, weak-minded cousin cannot succeed to marry you, the consent has been wrung from her by her parents, who have a special reason for it. Now, Lucy loves another, and, although she may marry you, she can never love you."

Walter pondered for a few moments, and said: "I strongly suspect, Miss Morbrissac, that you know more than I was dead, my dear old guardian has considered, very naturally, I admit, that my name was his. In short, it would be difficult to refund it."

Kate pressed Walter's hand, as she said, "Now you want to marry me, if I tell you a secret—you have guessed the truth."

"And," returned Walter, "you won't betray me if I know another secret? When I proposed for Mr. Mortimore's daughter, I made a slight mistake. I was under the full belief that you were the lady I was proposing for."

Kate's eyes fairly gleamed with pleasure, but her natural vivacity came to her rescue, and she said:

"What a very slight mistake, to ask for one lady, and get another; and the bashful gentleman feared to correct the mistake, that he never said anything about it!"

Kate gave one of her merry laughs as she said this.

"Pray, be serious," said Walter, "and listen with patience to what I have to say. I believe in love at first sight, for I felt last night, when I saw you, that on you my future welfare depended. I have made a fortune in Australia and California, but far away than the one entrusted to your uncle. I now honestly and frankly tell you that, if you reject me, I shall at once return to Australia, and endeavor to forget, in that rich and new land, the great disappointment of my life. I implore you to pardon the apparent haste of my declaration. Will you accept the hand and life-long love of Walter Stanley?"

"Well," said Kate, with a very grave air, "and you will then relinquish all right and title to my cousin Lucy?"

Walter laughed as he replied: "Of course; I thought you would take that for granted."

"Well, Mr. Stanley, I will not say no to such a request, but to oblige my cousin Lucy, who hasn't the courage to say her soul's her own, I hereby accept your proposal; and, now you are, I should like to see you hasty in giving my answer, I wish you most distinctly to understand that it is entirely to oblige my cousin Lucy."

Kate said this with so mischievous an air, that Walter raised her hand to his lips and kissed it with a fervent gallantry which Kate could not help feeling was natural in so serious a man. We need not linger over the dénouement. In less than a month there was a double wedding in the house of Mr. Mortimore; the result of that trifling ceremony being, that Kate became Mrs. Walter Stanley, and Lucy, Mrs. Alfred Berthesen.

Dr. Darwin, in his "Zoonomia," relates an anecdote of apparent ratiocination in a wasp, which has sagnish a fly nearly as big as itself. Soon after, the doctor saw the wasp discover the head and tail from the trunk of the fly, and attempt to soar with the latter; but finding, when about two feet from the ground, that the wings of the fly carried too much salt, and crossed its paths and would be wrested above its head, a circle that had arisen, it dropped upon the ground with the prey, and so calmly sawed off with its sharp jaws the one wing and then the other. Having thus removed those impediments to its progress, the insect flew away with its booty and experienced no further molestation from the wind.

IN MEMORIAM OF WINFIELD SCOTT.

MAY 29, 1866.

BY ERNEST TRYFON.

Let the bell toll.
The warrior's gone to rest,
For Death has touched,
What fear ne'er did, his breast.
Let the bell toll.

Let the bell toll.
The war of life is o'er,
He hears the welcome
Of the other shore.
Let the bell toll.

Let the bell toll.
He on our glory rise,
Joyed at its noon, and
Died 'mid sunny skies.
Let the bell toll.

Let the bell toll.
We give him to the earth—
A sacred trust—to wait
The second birth.
Let the bell toll.

The Zingari.

A strange nomadic race, scattered up and down throughout the world—wandering, ever wandering to and fro, from place to place—homeless, if not homeless—surely descendants of him of old, of whom it was said: "He will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him:" even so is it with the Zingari and gipsies of the present day as with Ishmael of old. Possessing a language peculiar to themselves, in whatever part of Europe or the East you may find them (and they are to be found throughout the continent of the Old World), if you know this strange dialect, you can make your way among them and receive proof of it in the most generous of hospitality rarely found among civilized brethren of mankind. I have seen them over and again in the great streets of Paris, and in the Italian army south of France, the little-known and seldom-traveled provinces of Spain, which border the Bay of Biscay; up the far-off regions of the muddy Nile—in the jungles of India and the sandy deserts of Africa, again and again have I found them. Their encampments, all holding the same customs, speaking the same language, and having almost the same morals and observances.

In the course of my many travels I have been more or less thrown amongst them, and ever received at their hands the most cheerful kindness and the best hospitality their means could afford. To one of them I owe my life, and that merely from being able to speak a few of their language, called Romny.

Any one who has traveled in Portugal and visited Lisbon—that city of palaces and poverty; fine squares and pragas, and narrow, garbage-filled streets; churches and monasteries and buildings still unfinished; a city many a crack and rent of the noted earthquake of well-nigh a hundred years ago—such an one will be landed in the Quay and made his way up the street leading to Black Horse Square, would see at the corners of the streets several groups of men, standing idly, awaiting any chance job that might offer; speaking a strange jargon of their own in an excited, eager manner; making remarks on each passer-by, and very ready in their proffers of assistance, very apt to avail themselves of any and every opportunity to cheat you. Such is not place impolicit confidence in them and rely on their word if once fairly given to you—these men, with a strange, wild cast of features, are clearly marked as the Jewish type is, are Zingari—cosmopolitans.

I had come to Lisbon from Madeira on board one of Her British Majesty's men-of-war, which happened to touch at Funchal whilst the vessel I had taken my passage in for Lisbon, who asked me to take a cruise with him, I went on board, and, after touching at Magador, the Canary Isles, the Vagus, and arrived in eight days at Lisbon.

I had with me several letters of introduction to families in that city from their friends in Funchal. On my arrival at Lisbon, as I was quietly sauntering along the Rua do Ouro (a large street the centre above-mentioned), one of these men I have described accosted me and asked me if I had any luggage. I wished certainly to have a boat to him to go on board the ship and take my portmanteau thence to the Braganza Hotel, and there wait until I came. He said he knew the captain, and as I saw his eyes glisten and heard his answer in the same language, I knew he was to be trusted, and this hereafter he might be, as he eventually proved to be, of service to me.

After walking an hour or two with a friend (one of the officers of the ship I had just left), up and down the Praça, we made our way to the hotel, and there I found the man waiting and quietly waiting for me with the portmanteau. It was with no small difficulty I prevailed on him to accept something for the trouble he had had; and before leaving me, he asked permission to come every morning to see whether I wanted anything he could do for me during my stay in Lisbon.

Among my letters was one of introduction (as I had unsecreted in Madeira), to a young lady in the neighborhood of Mafra, some thirty or forty miles from Lisbon. As I found I could not leave Lisbon so soon as I at first intended, and deemed personally this letter, which contained some important political news as well, I resolved at length to send it with José. He took it and delivered it safely, bringing me back an answer that it had been received, and that the Senora de Oliveira would be glad to see me whenever I could make it convenient to visit her.

A week passed over in Lisbon before I could do so; at the end of the week I found I should be able to start for Mafra the beginning of the following one, and I asked José if he would accompany me. To this he readily agreed, and accordingly, the next week, providing two mules, we both started, I resigning myself entirely to José's care and guidance.

After the first four hours' pleasant ride, during which I noticed that José was in a constant state of excitement, and which could not account, beyond his delight at leaving the town and getting into the country, we arrived at Cintra. I would fain linger here for a few hours there amidst its world-famed scenery and old Moorish remains of castles and towers, but José would not hear of it, and urged me most piteously to hasten on to Mafra as fast as we could. Not understanding the need of such haste, I nevertheless yielded to his solicitations and pushed on. It was nearly nightfall before we reached our destination—a beautiful Quinta—not very far from the King of Portugal's palace at Mafra.

We met with but one incident on our journey, and that was from meeting three wolves on a hillside. I had discontinued to walk, as the path was both narrow and steep, and my legs were tired. Just as I had half mounted the ascent, on rounding a corner, I came suddenly—all unprepared as I was, having left my pistols on the mule José was leading some way behind me—upon three wolves: a she-wolf and two dog-wolves behind her. There was no room to spare on the path for turning them, and they rose almost perpendicularly above me, whilst below was a precipice far too deep to descend, or rather leap down with safety. Over the edge I sprang, as I had not yet come round the sharp turn of the hill, and there I was, all unarmed, and the three wolves in front of me. I turned round involuntarily in my pocket for my pocket-knife, too small, however, to be of much use, even if I could get at it but one of the brutes dashed by which I much doubted. I looked up the side of the hill to see if there were any bush growing, or tree, but I could spring up, and cling until the wolves had passed me, which I thought they seemed inclined to do without attacking me. Nothing but a few patches of stunted growing out of a crevice of the rocks over my head. I made a spring and caught hold of it; it was strong enough, though I was saved; the wolves came straight on, seemingly inclined to proceed quietly on their way without attempting, unprovoked, any violence within six feet of them where I was clinging to the shrub, when suddenly it gave way, and with a shower of small stones and broken fragments of rocks, I, the bush with the debris, rolled down to the very feet of the foremost wolf—the she-wolf. With an angry growl she turned, and, with her hideous fangs and teeth, while its hot breath came over my face. I held up my hands before my eyes, and thought I succeeded with the bush, and I have a faint recollection of hearing the report of a pistol just as all seemed to swim darkly from me, and I lost all consciousness of what followed.

I had fainted away.

Slowly consciousness returned to me, and as it came back, the last few moments seemed to me a hideous dream. I found myself seated on a stone by the roadside, and José standing over me, attempting to pour a little wine down my throat from a bottle held in his hand.

"Do not be alarmed," the first words I could understand. "I have killed two of the wolves, and the third one turned and fled. You have had a narrow escape, but you are as good as a mule. I would recommend you, however, for the future, to keep your pistols about your person."

After a few moments' rest I once more mounted, and we proceeded on our journey, and without any more adventures reached the Quinta long before night.

The señora was at home, and gave me a hearty welcome. She was a fine specimen of a Portuguese lady, about forty years old, and somewhat inclined to obesity; a fine figure, however, and dark, liquid eyes, full of kind passion, and very handsome, but for her countenance. I spent a very pleasant evening, and enjoyed it all the more from my recent narrow escape, for which I gave her a history of my adventure as we had dinner. She invited me to stay some days with her, and I agreed to do so.

In the middle of the night, after I had retired to bed, I was awoke from my sleep by hearing a stealthy footstep near me. Starting up I saw a great affright, I seized my pistol, which I had taken the precaution of placing under my pillow, and said in a low voice:

"It is I, señor," answered the voice of José. "You must get up immediately. The police are after you. The Senora de Oliveira and her brother are well-known Carlists, and your letter for them has been discovered, as well as your intended visit to Madeira. How it has been found out I do not know; but I feared so before we left Lisbon, which made me uneasy on our journey here.

I hesitated for a moment, and tried my best to think what was best to do.

"You are not all thought on the matter. Seizing hold of me, he pulled me out of bed, and then hurriedly helped me to dress, and before I had gathered together my wandering senses, he had me out of doors, where I found the two mules already saddled. Making me mount, he quickly did the same, and then starting first, bade me follow him, and galloped off toward a forest some short distance behind the Quinta. It all seemed a dream to me, so quickly had it all passed. We had scarcely reached the edge of the forest when, looking around, I saw lights flashing about from window to window of the Quinta behind us.

"We were just in time," said José. "I do not think you would have much liked the interior of a Portuguese prison. They cannot find you now, for in an hour or two I hope to place you beyond all fear of pursuit."

Exceedingly perplexed at all that had taken place, and cursing my friends in Madeira for the predicament they had placed me in, I unhesitatingly followed José. After two or three hours' hard riding, we came to some rocks piled up in a wild spot on the edge of the forest. Making out of these with his heavy whip, the echo of the stroke had scarce died away when I saw other two mules from another open space coming forward. José bade me dismount and follow them, whilst he himself went off with the mules to a place of safety. I did so, and they led me into a sort of cave, partly natural, and evidently enlarged by human means. Here I found a warm fire and breakfast awaiting me.

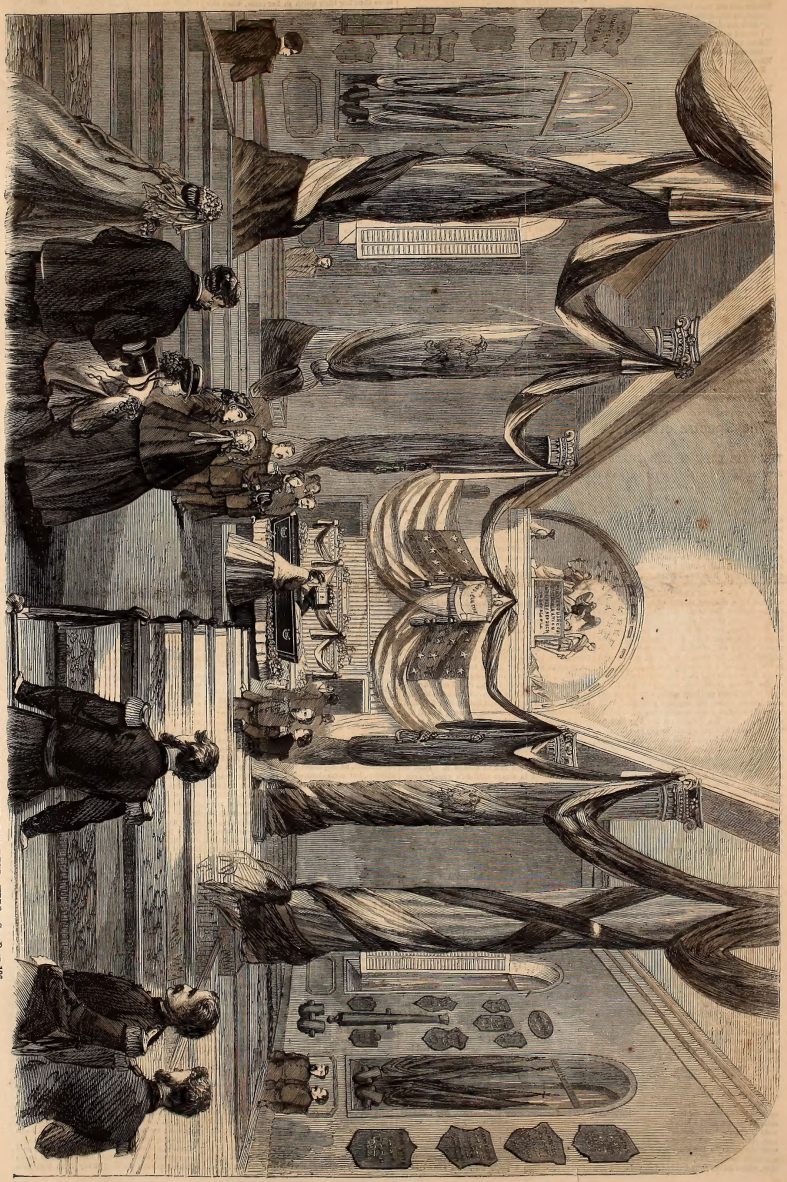
José soon rejoined us, and there, in the heart of a cork forest, well cared for, well fed, and safely housed among a half civilized tribe of these outcast, wandering Zingari, for a fortnight I dwelt safely and securely.

At the end of that time José, after staining my skin with walnut juice, and dressing me in one of their gipsy dresses, carried me safely to Lisbon, whence, embarking on an English steamer, I arrived—thankful for my escape, and ever grateful for the kindness of a gipsy's heart and fidelity—after a few days' steaming, safe on English ground at Gibraltar.

SNIPE SHOOTING.

This summum bonum of aiming in a cross shot like this is "the sight covering the tip of the bird's bill." If you can do that, you will hear of your bird as sure as eye of your gun, but of course, practice makes perfect. A bird flying straight away from you is comparatively dead, but may be missed by one of the rules in snipe shooting, viz., long aiming. There must be a good deal of lead, or fall over the bird, no wobbling from side to side, no attempts, in fact, to make sure of him, as snipe jink under a hedge in the first dozen of times to fix your eye on the bird, give him his time to get well ahead, and then fire. Snipe are fond of getting cover and fire. It should be done as quickly as possible, but not hurriedly, and precisely in fact the raising of the gun and the aiming becomes the classical moment, as it is the assistance, and the judgment of distance and flight which do the business. Many people shoot at snipe as if they had no chance to drop your birds; nothing less than fifteen are certain to fall, and if you are hurried, but remember to fire at thirty or forty; for a single grain will bring a snipe down, and a snipe hedge under a thousand shot at forty yards, is one of the prettiest sights in nature. These birds are not to be taken unawares, but during their flight; in fact, though they appear to a novice to disappear for miles, they are not, but merely fly a zeal-low, yet, in fact, their fly consists entirely of a straight-forward flight, with this trick of the zigzag. In the turn they afford the fairest mark possible, and a very little practice soon enables you to hit the moment to fire. Five or ten yards after rising, they are certain to descend. Once a bird has got all his speed, his flight becomes regular, and that the opportunity should be taken. A bird flying straight away requires time for firing too soon; next to that, delay in aiming. I have heard of the best shots being confounded, if not nonplussed, by shooting a bird, used to take a pinch of snuff with much nonchalance, and then fire at it as it flew away at a long distance afterward. I cannot vouch for this, but would say the best shots were those who fired the least as a rule, and were when the birds rose unexpectedly, and the gun had to be cocked previous to aiming and firing.

SCARCITY OF MONEY IN UTAH.



A correspondent from Salt Lake City, Utah, says:

"You have tight money markets sometimes in the East, but I have read of no more semi-annual crash than I saw it cited, as a curious fact, in the newspapers, that the Mormons had a surplus of specie. Such a thing as that I see around me a people, a prosperous people, doing business on a specie basis, and that basis is gold. In Salt Lake City itself, right in the line of travel, there is no paper money. The only currency is coin, and the rattle thence into every valley and by every water course for miles in the mountains. There is no bank, no circulating medium. What is the usual legal tender? Gold dust, bullion, Mexican dollars, Spanish doubloons and bar, ore cash; eggs, butter, pistols, knives, stockings, and every article of merchandise, potatoes, wheat, bran, molasses and calves are 'shinplasters,' which are taken in exchange for goods, but with the salute that is to pay their debts if it is ever a delight to pay debts. Everything is transacted on a cash basis, and that is very curious and amusing pastime. A peddler, for instance, will drive his pack mule from door to door. He would need a 'bull' train to freight back his money if he took it in exchange for goods. If a pair of boots sell at $20 a month, because he would need to pay $20 in gold for them, and he can't get more than one week's wages to the whisky shop, theatre, or to the grocery. And yet the farmers in the country towns are not poor. They have their farms, their cattle, their horses. They cannot keep their big sons from sneaking into the grocery, or the whisky shop, or the theatre, or the gambling hell, preferring it to the drowsy shop and having a 'high' time of it, and they cannot keep their daughters from the finery of vanity fair. Whether a man is rich or poor, he has to economize to get money. Every man, rich or poor, has to work. The rich man first came into the valley, had no intention of settling more than a short time, but soon got so enamored that he could never get away without making a fortune. Then he settled down to the business of money getting. He must continue to grip firmly, notwithstanding his immense wealth, until he has got a few millions more—how you have him as a fine horse and carriage, a splendid team of oxen, and lots of land, and thus is he about to slip from you at last in the form of bad debts."

Messages are transmitted by telegraph between London and Paris in two minutes. The post is, however, the only little used by commercial men, except to follow an order. Telegrams have been generally of full 2½ air a tube is made to carry a slow current of hydrogen. This tube enters at the bottom, and is carried nearly to the cone of the bell glass. Electric sparks are passed through the glass at the end of the tube. The hydrogen immediately ignites, and in the bell glass a continuous sphere darts all about the bell glass. In a short time the electric sparks are discontinued, and the air is forced into the inside of the jar, but without ever coming in contact with each other.

THE OLD VAGRANT.

WEARY and old, here let me die—
Here, in this ditch—I care not how.
"He's drunk!" the passing crowd may cry;
I do not want their pity now.

'Tis so, save when, with shudd'ring glance
And scarce a pause, their sons are thrown.
Why stop to lose the play, the dance?
Pass on! for I can die alone.

Yes, here to Time I yield at last,
Since hunger can no longer kill.
I once did hope, when youth was past,
My age some shelter'd nook might fill;
But in no Refuge was there room,
So many wretches homeless roam!
The streets through life have been my doom;
So, after all, I die at home.

When young, to those who earned their bread
"Throw your own trade," I used to say.
"We cannot find work ourselves," they said;
"Go beg, my lad,"—and turned away.
Yet rich, who found the work, nor saw
How hard I strove, ye gave, 'tis true,
My crust of bread, my couch of straw:
I dare not lay my curse on you.

I might have robbed—I begged instead:
The generous theft I can recall
Was but an apple o'er my head
That overhung some garden wall.
Yet want has made an evil look,
That into jail I oft was thrown;
The only wealth I had they took:
At least the sunshine was my own.

If we, indeed, were vermin are,
'Twere wise to crush us ere we sting:
If men, oh! teach us—wiser far—
How from our lives some good may spring.
Worm that I am, and human aid
Or guidance reached me, even I
Might here have labored, loved, and prayed,
Where now I leave my curse, and die.

The Spectre of Cliffe;

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c. &c.

CHAPTER XIII.—THE CLOUD IN THE SUNSHINE.

Two years have passed since the events recorded in the last chapter. Our scene is no longer laid at Cliffe Hall, but far away in the south country; while the change which is occupied by our dramatis personæ is very unpretending. A little low-roofed cottage, set in a garden growing early spring flowers, such as only flourish so early in a genial climate. The two French windows open on a tiny verandah, on which a boy's cricket bat, a belt of finches, beyond which lies the garden, not for show alone, but rich in vegetables and savory herbs; while beyond all this fairy demesne there runs a waving wall of odorous tamarisk. A waving wall, I say, for though the cottage is nestled in the hollow of a chalk-hill, and the boisterous winds from north and east, which roar and revel on the Downs above, can never reach it, it lies open to the south and west winds, whose soothing song scarce ceases the summer through. With them the swallow comes to nestle neath the eaves, with them the rose (whom on the tiny lattice to their violence will not permit to ply this thievish trade) to rob the flowers; but on a ledge of chalk, full in the noonday sun, stand three stout hives, for which the rent is paid in glittering comb, so that the winged thief is rifled in his turn—as the frail trees, warped by the windy years to grow askant, keep off the westering sun; but all the south is open. To those who sit within, the cottage, the sloping garden, and the sloping down beyond, are seen, and then the sea; but to one who, from the window, withdraws a pace or two, or lies upon his bed up-stairs, the eye looks straight down on the boundless blue of ocean. All, precious to sickness, to watch the ever changing shadows of the clouds, the swirling eddies, the daily battles of the wind and tide; to mark the sea-gull or heron about her fishing or her quests; to see the glorious company of white-robed ships, which this or that fair wind has just set free, pass in their due distant order, and to gaze upon the more homely toil which, in the little bay, the fishermen are plying; to contemplate the great waters, and those who make their business thereon. Then at night, how the sharp pain is lulled by the sea's monotonous undertone, that lullaby of unending roar, or overwhelmed and deadened by the majestic music of the storm!

But there is more sickness in this story now; the tall man sitting in the little balcony above the doorway, whose uncovered head almost touches the green roof, is not bowed by it; nor is the graceful form of his young wife, although a year ago or so she blessed the sea, slept time, after her blissful trouble, she lay awake long at night with her sweet babe beside her, sleepless, but in rest unspeakable. The baby-girl, too, clinging to her mother's skirt, is well and blooming, and yet there is a shadow upon the young wife's brow, which even the sunshine of that tiny presence cannot erase, nor the blithe and ringing tones of her husband's voice.

"What, my pretty one!" quoth he, "a cloud upon thy brow upon our marriage morning? Fie, shame! Come, let me kiss it away, love. Not a word of quarrel have we had yet, though we be such old married folks; but I shall quarrel, and spoil our claim to the Dunmow flitch, if you do not smile to-day. No, not an April shower is what that, which leaves your heaven the darker, but a July brightness, that must last all day. Come, smile like my own Mildred."

"My dear, dear husband," answered Mildred, tenderly, "I know I am very foolish, very wrong. There cannot be, of course—there cannot be any real danger to us. Has stooped down to the child, and drew her to her bosom, and held her there, and kissed and rocked her to and fro. "I is so long ago, and as he says, we have braved it yet, and we have taken no one into our confidence, so that neither by design nor carelessness can we ever be betrayed; and then, I am so far away from her, and under another name, we cannot but be safe—I have said to myself all this a dozen times, and yet, and yet, I fear."

"Yet what, Mildred?"

"Well, nothing; you would only laugh at me. But to-day, of all the days in the year—the day when I would wish to feel no touch of gloom—a sickening, supreme presentiment of evil seems to cast its threatening shadow upon my soul. She will never cease to seek us out, Raymond, while life is in the power of either of us. A selfish blood-hound could not be more staunch, more persistent for ill. When I think of her, I always think of her as that creature, Mary Clare's foe, which pursues the helpless hare whole days and nights, and at the last—no matter when that is—"

"My dear wife," interrupted Raymond, impatiently, "you are not complimentary to your aunt Grace at all! She is only your foe because I am a creature of evil odor called a stout; moreover, you do not take a high view of my own courage and ability to defend you and little Milly is called me a helpless hare. If I be so, and this vermin comes within kicking distance, I know that I will find me uncommonly strong in the hinder-legs."

"Nay, dearest, while you are with us, I rarely have any fear, but when you leave the cottage even for an hour; and now you are going away tomorrow for two whole nights—ah, me, that will be terrible!"

"Why, what a coward has my Mildred become, who used to be so brave."

"That was when I had only myself to take care of; but this little one, Raymond—what would my aunt say if I were to get her poor child into a baby-heiress of Cliffe! I would that we were what we seem to be here, and she but Milly Heyburn, with nothing to inherit save a little cottage and ground. We have been happier here than ever we were elsewhere."

"That very true, love; and I for my part should be well content to pass all my days here. But if poor Rupert dies—or—or, worse, I will not even say it—but that would be very right, that I, as my child's. No, that I will not. I know, love, why you shudder. You deem that she would murder me, and then, in time, marry Rupert's widow, and gain the golden piece. But this poisoning is not so easy as one reads of in the story-books. Mary Clare, indeed, she would, for she is a wicked will without much hindrance, or perhaps encouragement, but not she. Rupert, if he lives over, she is not above the law. Her unscrupulous fingers cannot clutch what that bids her to deliver it, and would tell me with his own mouth to betake myself, thy child, nor me. I tell you we are safe, Mildred; and if there is a fear on either side, it should be upon Grace Clifford's. She is stormy and rave forever, and we to listen, shuddering, because we two have chosen to marry? Have I not the curse to call me to my duties? Here is my home, and forced to keep in-doors, like one escaped from prison? I think that I am doing ill in this, wife. If there were any danger, I swear there would be no tyrants in the world. The sum my poor father gave me is nigh spent; I need the skill to toil me with the sun, and I will be no more in his will. Why should I not claim my own?"

"Raymond, Raymond!" cried the young wife, passionately, "I am wearying you with my fancies. Let us not bring the thunderbolt upon ourselves, even if we are fated to be its victims. Gold is indeed precious in Grace Clifford's greedy eyes, and power and the pride of station; but revenge is sweeter than all. Think of the day and the hour when we fled from Cliffe together; upon its very marriage morn, she registered a vow to pay us back."

"I should have thought my lady would have had enough of vows," returned Raymond, grimly, "for the first upon kept that she herself had contorted to the letter—married her stepson within thirty days! Sweet perjurer! I can forgive poor Rupert's wrath at being cheated of his bride so narrowly, since he was but her tool, and never knew how cruelly she urged you; but as for myself—well, let her do her worst. She will find I think that, after two long years of absence, the memory of this kite should still flutter over dove, through us by very arms! Your dread is chill, Mildred; are you cold?"

"Yes, a little cold, dear husband. The wind is rising in the west, as though for tempest. We shall have rough weather to-night."

"Ha! that is the sickness in that weather sole in after this long calm, it will last, I fear. Come, let my love a walk together, while walk we may. Upon over a wedding-day, as upon the eve of the Derby and Joan-like, is only fitting. Let us pay a visit to the good lieutenant and his wife."

"Ay, and take the dear child with us; to see her good-parents," exclaimed Mildred, joyfully.

"You—deceitful—wicked—gipsy," returned her husband, shaking her by the ear, "to pretend to love her god-parents, indeed! You want to have her with us—that is all. I do believe you never feel your little treasure is safe unless beneath our eye. However, just as you like, love; tell Jane, then, to put her bonnet on."

"I had rather carry Milly myself, Ray; Jane is rather busy, and it's such a very little way to the coast-guard station."

"Another white one! It is three miles, if it is a yard! But, then, the walk is upon the cliff-top, is it not? A most delightful walk, by the way in and Jane is such a giddy girl, and can never be brought to understand that she carries so much more than her life's worth in her arms, when she has the baby precious child."

"Nay, Raymond, dear, I know you love it just as much as I do. How thankful you seemed to be when you were told it was a girl!"

"Ay, true," interrupted Raymond, hastily; "but that was very foolish of me. If he had chanced to be a boy, would you have thought me? He would have had a very different bringing-up to that which has ruined so many a Clifford. He would have been sent to Eton and Oxford, and so on, down the eldest-born of us for so many generations."

"And how glad you were that it was a girl, Raymond."

"Was I? Well, perhaps I was; at all events, I love our Milly. Come, button-mouth, give papa a kiss. Don't you get your own way, and your mother, too, and wrap yourselves up warm, lest the rain should catch us before we can get home again."

With which words, he dismissed them both; then, left alone in the verandah, he leaned upon the rail, and looked that down the lawn, and drew a letter from his pocket. The address ran thus: "Hy. J. Hepburn, Pumps Cottage, by Westportwell, Kent," and was written a cramped and vulgar hand, and in one corner was scrawled "Immediate," underlined three times.

"How fortunate I was," soliloquized Raymond, "that I chanced to meet the postman in my walk this morning; otherwise this letter would have perhaps lain there many days. She would neither have eaten nor slept till she had compelled me to flee once more from the wrath of this she-devil to the Continent, and Mildred, poor wife, have got reconciled to our little cottage here, and have begun to feel at home. I will burrow no more, but will turn this love-affair over. The threatened peril is mysterious enough, but the warning puzzles me even more. What a hand my anonymous friend writes! Certainly all these wrong way, like those blown-backward saplings yonder. It may be disguised, of course; but, at the best, I should say that writing was not much of a critic, but the spelling, too, let alone the composition, appears rather faulty:

"'Pumps, Raymond Clifford. The cat's eyes have found you out at last; find another local for a little, and at once. There is danger lurking at your very door.'

"It is certainly very strange, and stranger that it comes when my poor wife has this nameless dread upon her. 'It can be only,' for nobody save those we have most cause to fear, could have supplied the materials for it. The postmark is Westportwell, therefore Mary Clare's retainer cannot be very far off. But, except the simple folks whom we are about to visit, what 'Well-wisher' have I about me, Milly, Jane, Mildred? We are compelled to impose even upon these good people; to lead a life of deception, to exist humbly, furtively, that we may be safe—and we need to Mildred this! It should always be so until Rupert—"

Here, Milly, who had been quiet, said he. "What, Milly want a toss before she starts? Give her to me, then, mamma. Nay, now I've got her, I shall keep her myself. Her daughter are fair in love, as in war—she is my lawful prize."

"It was a fair picture, that stalwart father with his child in his arms, and the young mother near, and the other thrown around his wife protectingly; and yet there was something in his eyes beside love and pride, as he looked, like the eagle's or orbs that time she sees the fowler, inch by inch descending from the crag upon her eyrie, ay in hand, to bear away her young."

CHAPTER XIV.—THE PREVENTIVE STATION.

Pumps Cottage and Pumps Coastguard station lay westward along the shore, and for a little distance after passing by the fishermen's cottages, a path, which ran at the foot of the cliff-top, but soon descended, not to the beach, but through the intermediate belt of rock and undergrowth, which lay between it and the sea. Here, sheltered from the rising wind, and amid a verdant wilderness of thorn and hazel, it was easy to walk in single file, and Jane, with the baby-girl, ran on before, the children from the cliff; the wood-lark hanging in the sheltered air poured forth his love; the sea-gull, from upon kept the wing above the warm bank, and flitting from shrub to shrub, the tiny wren twittered his note of thanks in God's own air. At length Jane's mirth at being her self free, and in a trance, stood out from the white cliff, a hawk would shoot forth, noiseless and swift as light, and pass above the heads of the scout like flash, watching our blameless parents in their sleep; then, descending upon them, would glide and pass again opposite the wind, and yet again would rise for broader view, to fall—a malignant star—upon the innocent prey in some seeming sheltered homestead.

No homestead is, however, visible to human eye in this region of desolation of man. The broken rocks, indeed, resemble ten human architecture—here a fluted shaft, and there a column with its capital—but they are natural—but some great throe of nature has so strewed them there, who, in her young, can fashion things more beautiful than art can mould in years of patient toil. The sea is sullen, save for one speck of white, which, like a pure soul passing to eternity, goes suddenly out into the boundless blue of heaven.

"Is not this a very paradise, my Mildred?" exclaimed Raymond, enthusiastically.

"It is indeed, dear Ray. May heaven's angels guard us while we tarry in it."

"Amen," answered Raymond, gravely. "Not, however," added he, more cheerfully, "that I am aware of our needing any special guardian, other than what all mortals need against their spiritual foe. As for mortal enemies, never, surely, was a little household so set about with defenders as is this. Not a cottage in the village would fight for you as resolutely as ever they fought for an anker of rum; while the good lieutenant and his twenty men here would draw their cutlasses in your defense as gallantly as though you were the Island Empress herself. What a simple home they have yonder! Of all the comfortable-looking, shipshape, spick-and-span residences and nests to dwell in, I do think the preventive Station is the most enviable.

The path has gradually risen until it brought them in sight of the tenement in question, a long low line of building, with a veranda in front of it, and a flagstaff, from which extended the nearer bay, with the coast-guard boat high on the shining sand, but ready to be launched at a minute's notice; while the open sea could be seen for scores of miles. But by far the most noticeable feature of the Look-out were certain carved wooden images stuck up on end, which gave to it the appearance of a spot dedicated to heathen rites. The figures, though representing the softer sex as often as the masculine, were by no means remarkable for personal beauty. Not one had been completed with the entire complement of limbs, and if a lady had managed to preserve the squillinky of her nose, she might consider herself a fortunate creature. These wooden effigies, many of vessels which the cruel waves had mutilated, when they cast the ships to which they belonged upon the rocks, had long lost every vestige of anything far out to sea. Already, with the growing wind, the waters churned and foamed there in white horses, and in that which comprised all that was possible to picture what wild work they made there during a storm. What hours of human agony had been caused by those grinning figures, when, scudding before the gale, the helpless ships came on to their doom among the hissing breakers! What vain resolutions of repentance had they beheld in the white scared faces to which they were opposed—what dumb resolve to meet the worst like men!

From Deadman's Reef no living man or woman had ever escaped with a hand; nay, bodies of the drowned which strewed the coast for days after a wreck could scarcely be called human, so bruised and mauled were they by the sharp and jagged rocks; but at very low tide the Reef was not without its attractions. Gold had been found there, and doubtless there still existed crowds of alien coins, guineas, moidores, dollars, and doubloons; while it was even said that on a time when the Spanish Armada was first descried, the silver sand of Lucky Bay (so called in consequence) had been mingled with sparkling gold, and that the ivory keel of the Invincible glistened upon the bare brown beach. The little churchyard, some four miles away, was three parts filled with the bones found on the shore where most of them nameless and unknown, and buried, as a matter of charity, in consecrated ground.

"Sacred to the Memory of the Crew of this or that vessel, who perished in a storm off Deadman's Reef." Then the date, and the inscription the very ship was nameless; her home-port and her destination alike unknown; and the part of the Book of Judgment which was opened to her scattered and ownerless cargo. And yet those who perished in her had relatives, and friends, and kindred, and the hearts of us, all of whom were watched for, doubtless, and heaven importuned for them—not altogether, let us hope, in vain.

But it is an ill wind that blows no one any good, and the coast population thereabouts were by no means averse to a south-west gale, and what it brought them. "Death is king, and vicar and lord," was their motto; and many a cottage in the neighborhood of Lucky Bay was indebted for its most ambitious piece of furniture to the fury of the Atlantic waves. Even those were reckoned as the gifts of Providence, and accepted by the simple folk with genuine thankfulness, which the rich and harvest might be considered by the pious elsewhere. In old times, there had been ugly stories afloat of ships having been lured to their destruction by false lights, proving to be safety-beacons; but whether true or false, such matters belonged to the past only, and the Preventive Watch looked down on the reef there was now a little light-house, which shot a fiery warning far out to sea; and this was served by a keeper and his wife, who resided in it with the coast-guard, there being only room for one lodger in the Look-out House. Thus, Lucky Bay was dedicated, as it were, to the protection of life as well as property, and seemed, at least to one of the living persons who now looked down upon it, as the most desirable of human homes.

If how I wished that we lived here, dear Raymond, wish Dan and Carey, who are delightful and day by trusty guardians, instead of in our lonely cottage, where, whenever you are absent, I feel such a terrible responsibility!" said Jane, as the lieutenant himself, and with a stranger, too, as it seems; at least, I never saw him about the station before.

"Perhaps he is some official visitor or superintendent," Carey told me the other day that he was very much interested in the Look-out. Look how he is pointing out to him the vegetable-locks! I think I can hear him telling about those potatoes having been dibbled in by old Jacob, the lantern-keeper, with his own wooden leg; that's one of the old gentleman's stock stories. Ah, now he sees us. Look how he interrupts his talk, and breaks away from his visitor at once to come and bid you welcome; we may be sure, therefore, that he is not the inspector."

Certainly, if such he was, Lieutenant Carey paid no attention to the fact, but, on the arrival of the official superior, striding away from him with rapid steps to meet the new-comers, and pouring forth a rain of welcomes as he came, in a rich and powerful voice.

"This is charming, of you, Mrs. Hepburn; this is very friendly to walk so far to our poor home: and to bring your treasure with you, too—my little godchild. Marion, Marion!" (here he raised his voice, as through contending with some fancied strife of the elements;) "come out, wife, here are the Hepburns." Then, as he and his visitors approached one another, he went on in what he honestly considered to be confidential tones, but which could be heard in a favorable wind about half a mile.

"I am so delighted to see you, Hepburn; always delighted, of course, but particularly so to-day. Here's a strange lubber come to stay with me from the 'Queen' of Westporton, recommended by the landlord as a man whom one respects, and to whom I am under obligations, but—just as though I knew whom like himself." My friend, Mr. Stevens,' writes he, 'is exceedingly anxious to see the coast near Lucky Bay, and especially the Mermaid Cavern, during those spring-tides, and there being no accommodation for himself nearer than this, and much more for his man (who remains below), I have ventured to ask you to give him a shake-down for a night or two.' That's just what the fellow writes, and here is this Mr. Stevens—a stranger, a lubber—upon my hands. I have not an hour's time to spare, in expectation of this inspection. You must show him the Mermaid Cavern, Hepburn; you must show him the coast."

A stout, florid, and notwithstanding his present trouble, a very cheerful-looking man, was Lieutenant Carey, though he had been pitted by the smoke-box in a manner which he was wont himself to say, when severe steaming. Though it was his way to be eloquent upon whatever annoyed him, he was the reverse of a repining character; otherwise finding himself a lieutenant still, after some forty years of sea-service, he might, perhaps, have considered his own case a hard one, and Lucky Bay, rather a misnomer as his place of residence. But, on the contrary, not only did he make the best of his position, but extracted from the visionary idea that it would be improved some day; that to have a post in the coast-guard was not another name for being put on the shelf, and that a day would come when he would sniff the incense of official favor, and be rear-admiral of half the colors of the rainbow before he died. It was a happy faith, and must have been shared in those early days of favoritism by many another gallant seaman, or surely the Lords of Admiralty would have all met their doom at the hands of naval Brutus's; gray-headed mates must have hung themselves from the yard-arm, and captains commanders taken to fresh water in despair from the top of Waterloo Bridge. It was Lieutenant Carey's belief, in spite of some adverse criticism, that the Admiralty kept a favorable eye upon him. It was true, indeed, that there had been no decent haste in promoting their protegé, but what they had said to themselves, was this: 'Whatever happens, we have John Carey to marry—we know where to find him—we know where to lay our hand upon him; and by——' (here they swore a little, as is the fashion to do in those days, particularly when under the influence of friendly emotion,) 'and by the Lord Harry, but some day we'll do it." That day was still distant, and is being so, why it might be any day. Therefore, Lieutenant Carey held himself constantly in readiness for promotion, kept his preventive station on an absolutely flawless state of discipline and perfection; and would have exchanged his post of stern-cabin of any vessel suitable for a young commander of four-and-fifty at a moment's notice, and with a good conscience. In the meantime, he indulged his imagination by putting much superior ships in commission than were likely to fall to his share at first, and in reading the daily appointment thereto upon the quarter-deck to a crew that had flocked in hundreds to serve under his supposed command. He had even composed a little speech, very short, and very pithy, to deliver under those precise circumstances; and pending their occurrence, had repeated it to Marion, his wife, about one hundred and forty times.

"Don't you think it will be the right sort of thing to say, Marion?" he would inquire, after every repetition. Mrs. Carey would gravely reply: "I think it will be better, John." She took an immense interest in the alterations which he had determined to make in the cabin arrangements, which was the less to be wondered at since they had nothing but her wife convenience and comfort in view—for in those days a woman in his Majesty's service was not permitted to have his wife on board with him—and had it not been so, good John Carey's dream would have been robbed of half its charm. Marion had been the only daughter of his friend and co-religionist—for Carey was a Catholic, a circumstance which perhaps did not militate in professional prospects in those days—Lieutenant Henry Lisle Lisgar, who was struck down by his side at the battle of Aboukir, by a spar from the French ship L'Orient, when that great vessel was blown to fragments with a thousand men in her, and with his last words he had recommended the friendless girl to Carey's protection. No bequest, made up and sealed with whatever formalities, could have been obeyed with more dutcous care; the idea of failing in such a sacred duty never entered into his thoughts; and that the execution of it was not easy. Little Marion, at a girls' school at Hammersmith, had first to be written to by the bluff sailor, who was hopefully put to it how to break such bad news by letter; then the scanty pension the child received from Government had to be supplemented from the lieutenant's own purse, in order that the substantial advantages should be still continued to her, and this necessitated a different system in his own expenditure, which for his means had been hitherto profuse, and to say prodigal. Then, when on shore, those interviews with Miss Blackboard, the schoolmistress—who nearly had a fit upon his happening, in the ordinary course of conversation, to mention the Lord Harry—were very trying; and more embarrassing yet did matters become, when Miss Marion, grown to womanhood, seemed to have a difficulty in calling him papa, which she had done for the last half-dozen years, and could not kiss his weather-beaten cheek as usual without a blush upon her own pretty face.

Then with a delicacy of expression such as my Lord Chesterfield could not have achieved, although he had sat up half the night racking his brain for exactly the right phrase, the lieutenant, just appointed to Lucky Bay, had offered his horny hand to the friendless girl, to have and to hold in honorable wedlock—an unequal match could really be contemplated by her with few; in truth, indeed, the hand was here still, so long as life was in him, dedicated to her service by her defences and succor always. But Marion Linton accepted her benefactor as her husband, and had never had any serious cause to regret having done so. No kinder heart ever beat beneath a blue jacket, nor were its noble simplicity and unselfishness lost upon her. Each, as they journeyed on the great debt of gratitude to the other, and every day, strange as it sounds, that debt increased by mutual repayment. Without consciousness, which was foreign to his bluff and healthy nature, he was as devoted to her as he had promised to be if he had not become her husband; and her defences and anchored to him fast by that trustiest cable whose strands are reverence and esteem as well as love. Had Mrs. Carey had a child of her own, she could no way at last, and, as it was his delight to boast, with small thanks to the Admiralty. Their fear had not been groundless, and a child was expected to come; and how so likely to come as through the fair or official visitor, at present expected? This it was that had put the finishing touches to charity of his hospitality at this particular juncture, and so anxious to shirk the burden of entertaining his strange guest upon Mermaid's shoulders.

CHAPTER IV.—MR. STEVENS.

"Mr. Stevens," said the lieutenant, as he and the visitors from Pampas Cottage came up with the final gentleman, "I've the pleasure to make you and Mrs. Hepburn. Although a comparative newcomer into the neighborhood, Mr. Hepburn knows more about the Mermaid Cavern than the mermaids themselves. There could not have been a more fortunate meeting for those who desire to see it. I could not have found you so good a guide had I pounded half the county. Sandy—smugglers, mostly, by-the-by, whom that Cavern was a harbor-mess, and encouragee by every means in her power; but Sandy's wife and his dog, Hepburn. No inspection to attend to, no superior to stand in awe of."

"With the exception, I am sure our gallant friend will except me, Hepburn," said the stranger, with a smileless bow.

"Very good; very true; bravo!" responded the lieutenant, with the same gravity. "Mrs. Hepburn, Marion, you should have been here to have heard what Mr. Stevens says."

"Oh, my dear John, I am here now. Perhaps Mr. Stevens will be kind enough to say it again," said the lady in question, emerging from the little garden porch, almost hidden by decorations, by which the lieutenant's residence was distinguished from those of the men under his command. Then, instead waiting to listen to Mr. Stevens' quotation, she greeted Raymond and his wife, and began to earnestly inquire, with much more fervor of affection than is usual with women who are not kin but mothers. Mrs. Carey was very comely, and very motherly. But then, she was June, indeed, which does not lose its youth even amid grief, care, and wrinkles, and both these were a score of years ahead of her. Her voice was sweet, and her voice, so gentle, so tender, so confidence-inviting in all who seemed to be worthy of her esteem, and she seemed to esteem almost everybody with the gentleness, and yet so dignified, so calmly courteous, distant as a star when addressing those who repelled the trusty nobility of her nature, and made a flock of rough fellows beneath the lieutenant's command, most of them would have laid down their lives for her cheerfully, as for her black sheep, conscious that she knew their characters far better than the simple lieutenant did, heartily loved him nevertheless.

"Now, pray come within doors, my dear Mrs. Hepburn," cried she; "and if you and your husband will share with us our mid-day meal, it will be very kind of you."

"Well, the fact is, I am afraid of a storm," replied Raymond. "I observe that my wife and child to be caught in one of your sou'westers. Perhaps you say, oh most weather-wise mariner? Come, tell us the truth; though I am very brave I would give us greater pleasure than to dine with you and friends, and especially to-day."

"There, if we didn't clean forget it, Marion!" exclaimed the lieutenant. "Upon my word, this will be bad. And to call ourselves old friends, too!"

"Nay, Mr. Carey, your wife didn't forget it," observed Mrs. Hepburn, reproachfully; while she peered to me her congratulations when she kissed me.

"I assure you, my dear Carey, nothing of that sort happened to me," remarked Raymond with mock gravity. I have received no congratulations; but brought it in a piece of great unfriendliness and neglect on your part."

"Pooh, pooh!" observed the lieutenant merrily. "I don't care about you at all; I was only thinking of your dear wife."

"Upon my word!" ejaculated Raymond; "but this is very pretty."

"She is not only very pretty, but very good," continued the lieutenant, enthusiastically; "and I was a stupid old sea-monster not to remember it. My dear Mrs. Hepburn, I wish you many happy returns of the day."

"You hear that, Mrs. Carey?" cried Raymond d. "He wishes my wife a widow, and more than once. Because he is married himself, and cannot have her, he maliciously desires the death, not only of myself, but of any person who may happen to take Mrs. Hepburn's fancy after my decease."

"Is it possible?" asked Mr. Stevens, blandly, while the laughter still rang from the running fire from Raymond and the two ladies: and the lieutenant stood smiling, but shaking his head, as though he disapproved of such hard upon him. "Is it possible that Mr. Carey has wished this lady many happy returns of her wedding-day?"

"That's the worst of it, Mr. Lieutenant; but then, I own always to forgetting that Mrs. Hepburn is married at all. I thought that I was speaking to the good-girl like Marion who used to be, and wishing her joy of her birthday. They do like more like boy and girl, the pair of them, do they not?"

"Mr. and Mrs. Hepburn are very young," returned the stranger, coldly; "the happy day, of which this is the anniversary, cannot have been very far distant. Two years ago, I should say, at least."

"By the Lord Harry!" cried the lieutenant, slapping his leg, "but Mr. Stevens has guessed it—guessed the very time that you two were made one. Now, I should never have guessed it—never. Indeed, my private opinion is, that it's all nonsense still. Come, Mrs. Hepburn, bless you, they're only children playing at being married—although, jo be sure, there's Milly—"

Mr. Lieutenant!" having said something indecorous, here struck the lieutenant dumb; like the statue-head of the good ship Fame, which reposed in the hall, which, his shades grew pale and swollen, while, for want of a trumpet to blow, stood mute for a loud and prolonged whistle.

"Milly is rather an uncommon name," observed the stranger, breaking the somewhat embarrassing silence: "it is the short, I conclude, for Melissa."

"For Mildred, sir," replied Mrs. Hepburn, curtly. "Miss is the usual abbreviation for Miss Mildred Hepburn here set up such a wall of dissatisfaction as caused her removal within doors, which, of course, completely changed the subject of conversation.

"I am extremely sorry, Mr. Hepburn," observed the stranger, apologetically: "I ought to have remembered that wives and children are sacred things, although within, I trust, I am not less well-meaning than other people."

"Mr. Stevens," replied Raymond, much distressed, "there is no need for such contrition. No one is responsible upon a baby's whims and fancies. Carey was saying you wished to see the coast-line hereabouts. Now, if you are going to that direction, I shall be delighted to be your guide. But, the fact is, I shall be from home the next two days; I have to go to Marchmont Bay about engaging a sailing-boat for the summer."

"And those are the only two days I have at my disposal," replied the stranger, impressively.

"I tell you what," exclaimed the lieutenant; "you could walk with Hepburn as far as you please upon his way, and see along the most magnificent part of the coast, over the East Cliffs, and round. And then—if you didn't mind—you could walk back again."

"Thank you," returned Mr. Stevens, dryly; "and perhaps I should be an encumbrance to Mr. Hepburn."

"Far from it, my dear sir," returned Raymond, politely; "I shall be delighted to have such good company. I am quite grieved that you have come at so unpropitious a time; for the fact is, I have business which I must do; and, indeed, I am your friend here—when he does not happen to be expecting a visit from his superior—is not overwhelmed with visitors."

"Don't say that, Hepburn—don't say that," broke in the lieutenant; "I have plenty to do, and I'm glad of it, although it is a bore; but it's agreeable to me as that which would fall to my lot if I were afloat. Ahem! ahem!"

"What on earth Carey mean?" thought Raymond. "Why does the good soul boast himself after this fashion, and then cough as if he was ashamed of it? It is evident, however, that he wants to get this follow off his hands. With regard to the lieutenant's hint," added he, aloud, "I have thought how an opportunity may be afforded, Mr. Stevens of seeing that. Is it not the fact that a steamer passes your promontory-head comes in from Marmouth? Well, why should it not drop this gentleman at the cavern on its return-voyage?"

"A capital idea!" quoth the lieutenant, thoughtfully. "But, then, it's a weary way round the cliff after the cavern, and there is somebody to show him the short cut over the Downs."

"Well, I dare say my wife will show him," answered Raymond, good-naturedly. "I am sure enough to think that time will hang heavy on her hands in my absence. She and the nurse might just as well walk to the Mermaid's Cavern as anywhere else; while I know little Milly will be delighted with the sea-excursion."

"I cannot venture to ask such a favor as that," observed Mr. Stevens, gravely.

"I will ask it myself, my dear sir," returned Raymond, with cheerfulness, "and let you know to-morrow."

"Thank you very much," cried the stranger.

"And I thank you, too," quoth the lieutenant, slapping his young friend on the back. "But let's have you one night more, Hepburn, although it may seem somewhat inhospitable: you have only half an hour or so to get home with a dry jacket. The storm is brewing space yonder. One of my men shall go with you with a couple of boat-cloaks, and an umbrella also, if you please; although I doubt whether an umbrella can live in such weather as is promised by those clouds."

"Permit me to carry the boat-cloaks," entreated the stranger, earnestly: "let me do something in return for the trouble I am about to give, and in reparation for the mischief I have involuntarily committed. Moreover, by that means I shall learn to have your house is, at which I conclude I am to call to-morrow morning, in order to accompany you in your journey."

"I am sure you are very polite," returned Raymond, frigidly, not altogether relishing perhaps, the addition of the self-invited stranger to their quiet party for a day, but that particular day.

"Here is my wife, I see, all ready, instead of her danger by prudent Mrs. Carey, I do not doubt."

Right enough she was out of course, looking very good lady, as she followed her guest into the garden; "for it is not right that either she or the child should be caught in the coming storm. If she could have dined and slept here—and we have such bed and board to spare, although of the humblest—that would have been an excellent plan; but she said, very rudely, that she would rather be at home, alone with you."

"Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest," is a motto that we think highly of in the days of Queen Anne. Mr. Stevens, gathering the boat-cloaks, which the lieutenant had brought out in the meantime, under his arm, "I believe that Hepburn is a northern name, by-the-by, is it not?"

"I dare say it is," answered Raymond, dryly; "but as Hepburn's ancestors folks cannot know, Mr. Mrs. Carey; good-by, my dear lieutenant."

"Good-by, Hepburn; and God bless you," whispered the kind-hearted fellow, as he turned to that lubber. He has taken quite a fancy to you, it seems, and declines to let me accompany you with the boat-cloaks. Mrs. Carey, I wish you would give a man a round dozen on board ship. Good-bye—that's a matter of opinion. When the Admiralty has one good lie after another, they by him in all sorts of ways, to be quite sure that it is good, and there is certainly something underhand in this Stevens's looks. Carey will only struck me for the first time when I introduced him to myself. I am pretty confident he is the Inspector."

Without much belief in the surmise of the good lieutenant, the suspicion of his wish was quite sufficient to make Raymond more than commonly attentive to his new companion. He walked a little in advance of him, and had Mr. Stevens, as he was carried in his arms was still curiously impatient of the latter's presence; but while he did so, he observed him with more than usual heed. And his wonders in manner that seemed to interest the stranger chiefly—so much so, indeed, that he rarely interrupted him, except with a quick dejection of admiration or agreement; nay, even when he commented upon some object of interest within view, Mr. Stevens would bend a keen searching glance upon it, and then his keen gray eyes would turn upon the speaker, and be riveted upon him as fixedly as before. When he parted, it was quite settled by the two gentlemen that Raymond was calling for them before Marmouth the next morning was to hold good, no matter what should be the weather; while Mildred, upon the same occasion, was to take her walk on the day after in the direction of the Mermaid's Cavern, if the expected storm should abate sufficiently to make such an expedition feasible.

"I suppose Mr. Stevens knows," said she to her husband, "that the cavern is only open for two hours, even in the calmest day, spring tide."

"Yes, I have been informed of that," returned the stranger. "The tide will leave it free on Thursday morning at nine, and by that time I shall be fine, I shall stay there to the last moment, in order to avoid the coming; so I hope she will not leave me to drown."

"I am afraid you will be well-nigh drowned this afternoon, before you get home to the station," observed Raymond. "The rain is coming already; see how the mist comes on like a wall. Here are the little cottages. Well, good-night, sir, quite safe now; but you, sir—will you not step in and rest a little?"

But the invitation was not given very sordially; at all events, the reply was in the negative.

"Not to-day, Mr. Hepburn. I will do myself the pleasure of calling for you to-morrow, however, at the hour you mentioned. I wish you a very good evening, sir, and adieu."

He did not offer to shake hands, and as if to prevent their doing so, stepped backward as he spoke, and turned away.

"Good-by, sir," replied the Hepburns, bowing in their turn; "good-by, until to-morrow."

At, good-by, until to-morrow," they said, muttered the stranger, as he set his face against the pitiless storm, "good-by, until the day after, for the other. If this be not killing my two birds with one shot, it is bringing them down with a double barrel."

A young fellow of our acquaintance, whose better half had just presented him with a pair of bouncing twins, attended Rev. Mr. ——'s church lately. During the discourse, the clergyman looked right at the unexpectant father, and in a tone of thrilling solemnness, "Young man, you have an important responsibility resting upon you." The new father, supposing that the preacher alluded to his peculiar home circumstances, electrified the audience by replying, "Yes, I have two of them."

THE MATATA PAH, NEW ZEALAND, THE REFUGE OF THE MURDERERS OF THE REV. MR. VOLKNER.

THE MATATA PAH.

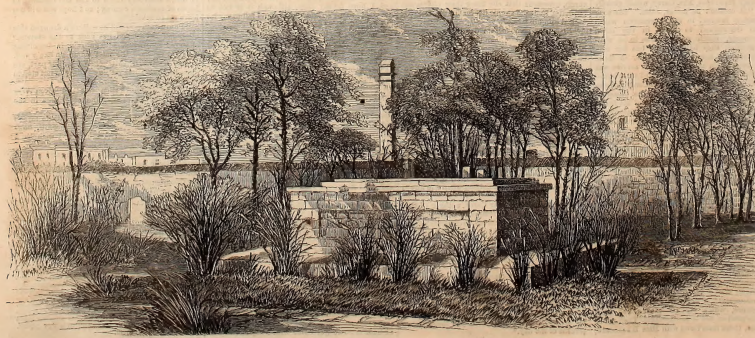
LAST September we published an account of the murder of Rev. Mr. Volkner, a missionary in New Zealand, by one of the wild tribes of the island, and gave an illustration of the bloody and fearful orgies the wretches indulged in when the fearful tragedy was over. Not content with one victim, and, like wild beasts, infuriated by the taste of blood, they shortly afterward killed Mr. Fulicon, the interpreter, and the crew of a coasting vessel. It became necessary for the Government to adopt prompt measures for bringing these cannibals to justice; so, having subsidized some friendly Maoris, a pursuit of the murderers was at once commenced. They were driven from shelter to shelter, until they were finally surrounded and captured in a pah, or native fort, the interior of which is shown in our illustration. The flagstaff is surmounted with a dove, and around this staff they performed their bloody cannibal rites. The large part, ornamented with a carved idol, belonged to the ring leader of the outrage, who formerly owned a coasting-vessel, and held the office of assessor under the Government. He and 17 of his companions have been tried and convicted, and are now awaiting the execution of their sentence in expiation of their unnatural crimes.

GRAVE OF JOHN. C. CALHOUN.

NO MAN was ever more successful in shaping the course and molding the opinions of a large portion of the American people, on important political subjects, than John C. Calhoun. His connection with nullification was consummated in secession; his views of State rights culminated in the attempt to dissever the Union, and the various theories he cherished and opinions he entertained were put into practical form and carried to their logical sequence in the late movement of the cotton States to establish an independent government.

Aside from these peculiarities, Mr. Calhoun was a great statesman and a great man. He was born in South Carolina in 1782. He graduated with distinction at Yale College, and received his legal education in Connecticut, when he returned to his native State, and shortly after commenced his political career as a member of the Legislature. In 1811 he was elected to Congress; served as Secretary of War under President Monroe, and was chosen Vice-President in 1825. Mr. Calhoun spent most of his life at Washington, in the service of his State and country, after his first election to Congress, and in the various positions he occupied, left the imprint of his master mind and inflexible will. He died at Washington, in 1850, leaving behind him the reputation of one of the greatest and purest American statesmen. His remains were subsequently taken to Charleston, and deposited in the graveyard of St. Philip's church.

His grave is simple and unadorned. It consists simply of an oblong pile of coarse brick, surmounted by two broad slabs of white marble, the upper one of which bears the brief inscription—



CALHOUN.

The grave is surrounded by shrubs and a few flowers, with no attempt at ornamentation, and little to distinguish it from the resting-place of many others, who, while living, were comparatively obscure and unknown.

Our illustration gives a correct view of the grave and its surroundings.

DRIVING HORSES OUT OF A LEECH SWAMP.

A CURIOUS branch of industry is followed by certain inhabitants of the marsh lands in the neighborhood of Bordeaux, France. Some years ago a farmer observed that the leeches native to these marshes attained a great size where cattle were turned out to pasture, and this suggested to him the idea of making leech-culture a speciality. He therefore rented a tract of marsh, which he divided into ponds, with the water sufficiently deep, so that the mud at the bottom might afford safe winter quarters for the leeches. To supply their natural aliment—blood—he purchased a drove of old horses, which he drove into the ponds, and which were instantly fastened upon by the leeches, whose voracious instincts were aroused the moment the water became agitated. But the poor horse is not allowed to become a victim to his tormentors at once. The affair is so managed as to furnish three repasts to the leeches, which are too fastidious to draw blood from the same spot a second time. On his first introduction, the horse is driven in only to his girth. The venom-ons leeches fasten themselves on their prey instantly, and the poor animal is so covered that his strength soon fails from loss of blood. Before he is entirely exhausted, however, he is driven from the marsh by dint of blows, and food placed before him to restore his failing powers.

When he is somewhat recruited, he is again driven into the marsh, until his back is covered. The hungry leeches now fasten themselves on every part of his body not previously touched, and when they are gorged, or the horse nearly exhausted, he is a second time driven out and put into good pasturage, to recover his vitality. After a time he is once more forced into the marsh being allowed to have only his nostrils out of the water. The leeches now prey upon him until the last drop of blood is drawn and the poor victim expires in fearful agony. Our illustration shows the manner of driving the wretched, half-dead creatures out of the swamp, that, with a refinement of cruelty, they may again be subjected to torture. It may be that the interests of the healing art require such appliances, but one could hardly look upon a leech without abhorrence if aware that it had been grown by this process.

THE DISHONEST ELEPHANT KEEPER.

THE instincts of some animals seem so nearly allied to reason, that we could accord to them almost a human intelligence; in fact, without exaggeration, we may say, in a modified sense they do reason. The following anecdote told of an elephant, illustrates this point quite forcibly: An officer in the Bengal army had a favorite elephant, which was supplied daily in his presence with a certain amount of food, but being compelled to absent himself on a journey, the keeper of the beast diminished the ration, and the animal became daily thinner and weaker. When its master returned, the elephant exhibited the greatest signs of pleasure: the feeding-time came, and the keeper laid before it the former full allowance of food, which it divided into two parts, consuming one immediately, and leaving the other untouched. The officer, knowing the sagacity of his favorite, saw immediately the fraud that had been practiced, and made the man confess his crime.

THE DISHONEST ELEPHANT KEEPER.

It is eight feet high, and is said to be the same in shape as the throne of Queen Victoria. Most persons visiting Richmond make it a point to see fine chance lost. However, we'll see if that fellow hadn't a companion."

Silence was resumed, and the two continued creeping along the bean-field as quietly as possible on all-fours.

Presently the overseer jogged the black upon the shoulder with his heel, and both stopped still. Fifty paces off, in the full light of the fire, was a stag quite as big as the other, standing as still as Albert Durer's stag in "The Vision of St. Hubert."

It would have been highly imprudent to advance another step, so Slouch raised his rifle, and, taking careful aim, pulled the trigger.

The stag gave a tremendous bound, and fell dead.

The report woke up all the echoes of the neighborhood, and the owls which were perched up among the trees fled, alarmed at the unaccustomed noise.

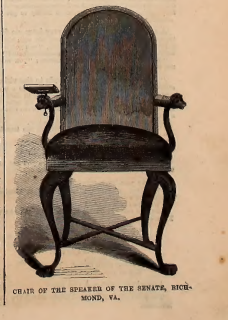
To disembowel the creature, fasten it by the four feet, and throw it over the cropper, was the business of a quarter of an hour. This operation took place in silence, and when it was finished, Pompey took the horse by the bridle, and led the way back again to the house.

Suddenly a noise made them both stop, and Slouch, who had reloaded his rifle, saw the form of an animal and two bright eyes running from the opposite direction. He presented and fired, when Pompey, rushing forward, exclaimed:

"Oh! what hab you done? You shot Mr. Benson's pet colt."

"In fact, Slouch had killed a magnificent two-year-old stone dead. The ball had struck it full in the middle of the neck.

"What shall we do?" cried Slouch. "If we bury the brute, the smell will soon betray us, and if we throw it in the pond, it will be exactly the same thing. Ah! I know. You lend me a hand, Pompey, and no one will be a bit the wiser."



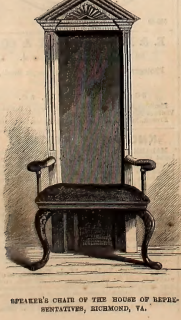
The two poachers dragged the carcass toward a dense thicket, and hoisted the colt upon it, impaling it by the wound which the ball had made upon a sharp spike of wood.

"To-morrow," said Slouch, "the eagles and buzzards will have had their share, and by night no one will be a bit the wiser how the colt died. Everybody will think that he was staked in trying to jump the hedge. Now you take the deer to Jack the coachman, and tell him to hook it on to Charleston, to the address you know of. Be off with you: there'll be a dollar and two pound of 'bacca for your share. Take Mr. Benson's mare with you, and then she can't go hunting after her colt."

The two poachers separated, and whilst Slouch, the dishonest overseer, was sleeping quietly, Pompey, obeying orders, was mounted on the mare, taking the venison on its way to Charleston Market. That done, Pompey was on his way back again toward his master's house, when, suddenly, the mare shied and threw him. There was an explosion of a gun, and then fearful groans disturbed the stillness of the night.

To jump upon his feet, and run in the direction of the noise, was immediately the instinct of Pompey.

There, before him, at the foot of a tree, lay a man on the point of death, and in him Pompey recognized his brother Cæsar, mortally wounded



CHAIR OF THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE, RICHMOND, VA.

CHAIRS OF THE SPEAKERS,

In the Capitol at Richmond.

IN No. 555 we gave an illustration and history of the stove now in use in the capitol at Richmond; in this week we append a sketch of the chairs used by the Speakers of the two Houses of the Virginia Legislature. These chairs were made in England, and sent over, with the stove, as a present to the House of Burgesses at Williamsburg. They are made of mahogany, the arms terminating in a lion's head, and the feet resembling the feet of that animal. The seat and back are lined with red. In 1787 they were conveyed to Richmond, and have been in constant use ever since.

When the ordinance of secession was passed by the Virginia Convention, the chair in the House was occupied by the presiding officer of that body.

these relics, which possess the double interest of antiquity and association.

A Deer Hunt.

THE following story of forest sports carries us back to the old plantation times when Southern life abounded in such incidents as are here related. It is told by one of large experience in the woods, and savors of the sportsman's spirit:

One autumn evening, about ten years ago, the air was fresh even to coldness, and although the stars were shining brightly enough, there was a penetrating dampness which condensed into fog, and fell in thick drops upon the trees which were planted thickly around the country mansion of my friend Benson, the richest planter in South Carolina, and who is well known to all this company. My friend's overseer was talking in the front of the house to a black who had just brought a letter.

"So you've come from Charleston, and went to see the massa. Why did you tell him, you little rascal, that it was the deer that came every night to eat his beans?"

"Massa Slouch," cried the young rogue, showing his teeth, "I no tell massa dat."

"Don't you tell a lie, Cæsar. You wanted to get a shilling, although I told you not to tell anybody. I'll make you pay for it. Be off and send Pompey here."

The fellow did not wait to be ordered off a second time, but bounded off toward the cottages of the blacks, built at the upper end of a green meadow toward the north of the plantation.

A few minutes afterward Pompey appeared before the overseer, who ordered him to go and pick up some fir-cones, and prepare everything for hunting deer by torchlight that night.

"What's that to you? You say you know nothing about it. If you don't, I'll tell the master of those four deer you killed and sold at Charleston. So you just hold your tongue, my lad."

Pompey hadn't a word to say to that, for he was an arrant poacher, and he very soon promised to have everything ready for the evening's sport.

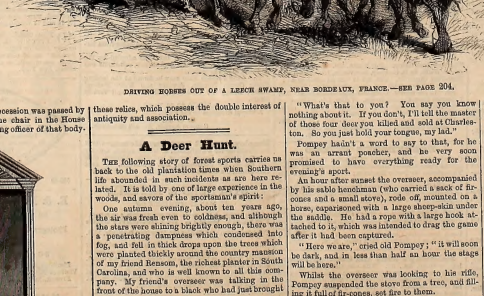
An hour after sunset the overseer, accompanied by his sable henchman (who carried a sack of fir-cones and a small store), rode off, mounted on a horse, caparisoned with a large sheep-skin under the saddle. He had a rope with a large hook attached to it, which was intended to drag the game after it had been captured.

"Here we are," cried old Pompey; "it will soon be dark, and in less than half an hour the stags will be here."

Whilst the overseer was looking to his rifle, Pompey suspended the stove from a tree, and filling it full of fir-cones, set fire to them.

"Now gib me de gun, Massa Slouch, and I'll show you how kill de stag."

"No, I shan't," replied the overseer; "I shall shoot the deer myself. I can't trust you."



"As you please, massa; only Pompey clubberer dan you tink for. However, let us keep quiet, or we shall frighten de deer."

Without further delay, the two poachers concealed themselves in the shade, carefully keeping out of the bright rays which the fire in the stove threw around.

Presently, at about fifty paces off, they could see a fine stag quietly browsing among Mr. Benson's beans.

Slouch had, however, no time to take aim, before the animal made a tremendous bound, and disappeared.

"Turnation!" roared the overseer, "There's a by a rifle ball, and bathed in his own blood. In broken words, Cæsar told his brother that, having occasion to seek the aid of a doctor for his wife, he had started off for that purpose. On arriving close to the bean-field, he had found the fire still burning. Curiously had attracted him toward the spot, and when, in spite of the resistance of his horse, he got up to the hedge, a gun went off, and he felt that he was hit by a bullet. In reply to his cry of agony, a poacher rushed forward to help him, and entreated him, on his knees, to pardon the fatal mistake. He had taken the mule for a stag; but, as he was in the midst of his explanations, Pompey and his mare came up, and the poacher had fled.

The accident proved fatal to Cæsar, and it had such an effect upon Pompey, that he made a full confession to Mr. Benson, when that gentleman arrived next day, of everything that had happened.

Slouch was dismissed, and as he could get no satisfactory character, soon embarked for California. Pompey promoted to succeed him, by no means to Mr. Benson's disadvantage.

COING! COING!! GONE!!!

A FRIEND of ours, under the impression that it was a good time to get rid of real estate, sold his residence recently, but on looking about for a place to store his household fixings, furniture and mummies, made the perplexing discovery that no such place was to be found. In this dilemma, he decided to obtain a temporary place for himself and family, and did so—when he made another discovery, almost as perplexing, that his furniture was in a row, and to settle that difficulty, he decided to have an auction sale, and thus get rid of it.

What is the solution of such a sale?

We can understand the presence of the beetle-browed, shabby-dressed and coarse-looking dealers in second-hand furniture. We suppose that here are some ironcast people, who fancy they can secure an economical purchase of what would be handy to have in the new house—for the Mrs. Toodles are not all dead yet. We know that a few, understanding what they are about, go in for the chances that an auction sale might offer; but what brings together so many really decent-looking individuals, male and female, who are to be found on such occasions, it is difficult to conjecture.

There were present at the sale of our friend's effects the representatives of all these classes, and by special invitations we joined them, and, being in no hurry, enjoyed the contests between rival bidders for the possession of the various articles that were put up regardless of the risk of being fleeced—hence the performance was both animated and comic.

The auctioneer was a sharp-looking, elderly individual, whose supercilious frankness of manner had its effect upon most of his miscellaneous audience, but it did not seem to have the slightest in second-hand babies, beds and kitchen utensils—for he was an old acquaintance of theirs, and they understood that, as he was working for his per-centage, they were not to take all he said personal truth.

The sale commenced on the third floor. A feather mattress, after a fierce struggle between two bids, was knocked down at just $18 50 cents excess over its original cost. A bedstead followed, that had been given away the day previous, but not taken away, was unwillingly sold, it brought $4 50. An enamelled cradle went, that cost seven years previously $25, and the heroes of which had been irretrievably destroyed by a burglar's "jimmy," was knocked down for $21. An armchair, that had done out-lived the days of romance, cost its purchaser $15, and the poor fellow who was engaged in rocking it a broken arm, as he left the room carrying it down stairs.

There was a persistent bidder. He had purchased the house, and wanted most of the furniture. He would have succeeded in all by his audacious—who would circulary and energetically bid against everybody, but he bought so much that he really ceased to be a customer. A bedstead was sold. It was a fruit piece—peaches and pears—and enclosed in a handsome frame. Similar articles are frequently offered in the vicinity of the Fulton Ferry, and in public bar-rooms, at about $10 a piece. This human lover bought it, but he was sold, as well as the picture, for he paid for it just $30 per cent. advance on its original cost.

A handsome parlor-suit, and stagers of black walnut, a half-length cheval-glass, lounges, ottomans, rose curtains, mantel-ornaments, etc., all actually brought more than the furniture-dealer was paid for them, which convince us that this auction sale did not prove a bad thing for our friend. We don't wonder at the financial success of such swindlers as Zeno Burnham, whom so legitimate a sale thus proves so profitable in its results; but we learned this lesson: that those in want of cheap furniture should not seek for it at this season of the year at an auction sale.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A GENTLEMAN, speaking of the married state before his daughter, whom he wished to dissuade from matrimony, said: "Those who marries, does well; those who does not marry, does better."

"Well," said the young lady, "I will do well; but those who choose do better."

MRS. PARTINGTON remarked the other day that "she had a presentiment that she should eventually die in a prance," adding "that the resentment troubled her a good deal, but she expected finally to get used to it."

A LADY who laid claim to very humane feelings went to the butcher to remonstrate with him on his cruel practices. "How," said she, "can you be so barbarous as to put little innocent lambs to death?"

"Why not, ma'am?" said the butcher; "you would not eat them alive, would you?"

"WHICH of these roads leads to the village of W——?" inquired a traveler, as he came to a place where the road in front of him was traveling from different directions, of an urchin who sat upon a log near by, and whose appearance indicated that he was evidently a specimen.

"Any one on 'em, sir," answered the boy.

"Which is the best, my lad?" inquired the traveler.

"I don't only see one 'em the best."

"Which is the nearest?"

"Don't know nothin' about it."

"Which of them is the best better like?"

"You may take any one 'em and store you get half-way that you'll, unless you had took t'other one."

"Have you been to church at sea?"

"Why, no, not exactly; but my brother married a commodore's daughter."

"How are you over aloyed?"

"No, not exactly; but my mother's maiden name was French."

Still to laugh by far the best is;
Then laugh on as I do now.

THE AMERICAN PATENT WATCH SAFE.

PROTECTION AGAINST PICKPOCKETS!!!

For years past the depredations of pickpockets and sneak-thieves have been a daily occurrence and continual dread. No man was safe in any crowded assembly, and no other public conveyance was safe to render oneself to the mercies of the thieves who infested them, and pictures of assassination and of public meeting were the scenes of their spoliation.

To the Gold Watch and Chain, and all metal protection is offered to the public.

THE AMERICAN PATENT WATCH SAFE presents a complete defense against the efforts of Pickpockets, Burglars, and Sneak-thieves, when held and worn as directed. It combines in an unobtrusive manner all the requisites, and can be adjusted to any garment.

It is at once a guard against the depredations of the latter, and the ingenious resource of detectives.

It saves crystals from breakage, and cases from fastening.

Having been modeled on the sizes adopted by the celebrated American Watch Company, watches can be made to fit any watch.

The Patent Watch Safe may be found at the leading Fancy Goods Houses, Jewelry and Watch Makers Stores, Druggists, Banks, Saloons, and Variety Shops.

THE GREAT NEW ENGLAND REMEDY

DR. J. W POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

"It was early in the spring of 1858 that the compound was originated. A number of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for the first time become thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, might be used successfully. It was my usual custom to make use of the throat and lungs. To test the matter, I made a decoction of it. Contemporaneously a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough ceased, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Massachusetts. A few days afterwards I received some weeks from a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden change in the temperature. I sent her some extract, the soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about one pint and a half, and was cured. Dr. Child, formerly of the Manchester Daily Mirror, made a trial of the same preparation in the case of a severe cold, and was cured immediately. He was so highly pleased with the preparation that he wished me to manufacture it. Seeing it placed before the public, that he finally persuaded me to give it a name, and used it abroad to effect the same thing. In November, 1858, I first advertised it under the name of White Pine Compound. It has continued to the present time, and thousands have been cured by the same compound, and have been completely cured."

The above is written by Dr. Poland, of Poland, Maine Oxen, as in Manchester, the White Pine Compound has been the test of all Cough remedies, and the preparations for the cure of Kidney difficulties, in every city, town, village and hamlet throughout the New England States.

The past year has given great opportunity to test the virtues of the White Pine Compound. It has been an active, faithful friend in the midst of the many large quantities of the White Pine Compound have been sold during the past year. Its wonderful virtues in all the medicines and the people where it is prepared are high in its praise.

One bottle of this Compound is generally sufficient to remove a bad cough, and several frequently in severe cases to have a cold entirely removed in two days by using less than a bottle. From one to two teaspoonfuls is a large dose. I sometimes put a little white sugar and loaf sugar in it, which makes it pleasant to take.

The limits to which I purposely confine myself in this advertisement will not allow of that full explanation which I would like to give in favor of the White Pine Compound. Its wonderful properties will be manifested by all who are induced to such a popularity among those whose opinion is worthy of regard. It will warrant and possibly, in part, prompt me to record more here than hurried people will have patience to read in a first notice. Persons recommending to all who need a Cough or Kidney remedy to test the virtues of the WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

TESTIMONIALS.

A very large number of unquestioned testimonials have already been received from Physicians, Clergymen, Merchants, Lawyers, Mechanics, and all classes of society, speaking in the most flattering terms of the White Pine Compound.

Dr. Smith, of Northfield, Vt., says:

"I find the White Pine Compound to be very effective in relieving Coughs, Colds and other pulmonary troubles, but also in affections of the kidneys, debility of the stomach, and other complaints."

Rev. J. E. Chase, of Bunney, N. H., writes:

"I have for years regarded your White Pine Compound as an excellent remedy. I can truly say that I regard it as the most efficacious and valuable I have ever. I have given it in numerous instances, and in it works charmingly."

Rev. H. D. Donoe,

of West Bandolph, Vt., who is a practicing physician, also highly recommends it in a letter to Dr. Poland, Jan. 1863, says: "I find it an excellent medicine in kidney disease."

The White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, is not only as to its name inviting, but is a most valuable remedy, as Dr. J. W. Poland, the inventor, has the confidence of the many who know him, and the success of his medicine. It has been for nearly many years as a highly popular. His experience as a physician has led him to the expectation of its value in his medical discovery.—Boston Methodist and Religion.

Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised at length in a leader of the daily, thus speaks of the Compound: "Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised at length in our columns, and we are happy to learn that the sales of this valuable remedy are far beyond our expectations. It is the very best medicine for coughs and colds we ever used, and we have used them since we can remember. We speak from our own knowledge; it is a sure remedy, and we know it from sure. The greatest inventions come by accident, and it is singular that Dr. Poland should discover this cough and cough, should prove to be the greatest remedy for kidney disease ever known. But so it is. We cannot doubt it, so many testimonials come to us from well-known men. Dr. Poland, the character of his medicine is such that we know he will not countenance that what is wrong. We have used it ourselves, and we know it to be what it is represented. We know Dr. Poland for years, and have known a more conscientious, honest, upright man, and we are sure he will not believe whatever he says about his White Pine Compound."

Should you think favorably of this medicine, be careful, when purchasing, that it is the WHITE PINE COMPOUND that is offered to you, as we know that other worthless articles have been palmed off for it by unprincipled dealers.

THE

UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT

TO HAVE BEEN GIVEN AT

Crosby's Opera House,

On MONDAY, MAY 28th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 9th, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES will be presented to the ticket-holders, including

$100,000 IN GREENBACKS.

The postponement is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet unsold, as the positive assurance there is for a proper repetition of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns. We advise all parties wanting tickets to send for them without delay, as we have but a limited number yet on hand. We wish most particularly to impress upon the minds of our Agents the importance of their making their returns at once, and of reciting whatever errors may have crept into their former returns. We will say to those sending for tickets, that if they should not be sold at the time their orders are received, the money will be returned, or the tickets applied on any other Concert they may order, as we have no more than sufficient tickets for those Agents who have already applied. Tickets are for sale at the principal Music Book and Music Store in the city, at the Office, 439 Dearborn street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage. We invite the particular attention of persons wishing to order tickets by mail to the following

SPECIAL TERMS, OR CLUB RATES.—Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission viz.: We will send—

Retributive Justice.

Two years have not yet passed since Prussia and Austria combined to rob Denmark of a portion of her territory. They are now in arms, and ready to fly at each other's throats, on the question of what shall be done with their spoil! Their quarrel seems likely to involve all Europe and lead to a general war, which can only result in the spoiling of the spoilers. Austria can hardly fail to lose Venetia to Italy, and Prussia her provinces this side the Rhine to France; while it is more than likely that Schleswig-Holstein, which Austria and Prussia wrested from Denmark, will be permitted to determine its own political relationship through the suffrage of its people. This means reannexation to Denmark.

THE FENIAN DEMONSTRATION—"EMIGRANTS FOR THE CANADIAN FRONTIER" ARRANGING FOR THEIR DEPARTURE, AT TAMMANY HALL, NEW YORK CITY.

Such can scarcely fail to be the direct result of the impending European war; but there are possible and incidental results of equal, if not greater moment, and which will punish Great Britain for her sins of omission and commission. She had it in her power, and it was her duty, under treaty stipulations—in fact, her word and honor were plighted — to protect Denmark from dismemberment. Had she done so, the war which now threatens to desolate the Continent would have been averted, and the opportunity which it will be sure to give to Russia to plant her power in Constantinople would not have been afforded. The disturbances in the Principalities have already brought about a joint occupation of Moldavia by the Russians and Turks. How long before that occupation will change into an exclusively Russian one will depend precisely on the time that may elapse before the exchange of blows between Prussia and Austria. Russia once on the Bosphorus, and what becomes of the blood and treasure, and exertions in cabinet and field, which Great Britain has expended to keep open her passage to the Indies? She will be called on to protect this passage, or meekly give up her traditional policy—to go to ruin, or surrender all that she fought for on the Nile, in Syria, and in the Crimea. Nemesis is on her track as surely as on that of the despoilers of Denmark. Punishment and treachery, as well as robbery, will meet a just retribution.

Completely master of the situation, able and ready to act as the arbiter of Europe on the banks of the Seine. Out of all these complications will come to him expansion and aggrandizement on the south and north. Italy will join Venetia at the cost of another body; Belgium will become a department of France, whose boundaries will be pushed to the Rhine. The treaty of 1815, through which it was sought to direct and control the destinies of Providence, and drive posterity through grooves ordained in Vienna, will disappear and become obsolete in name as it already is in fact, and the traditional and constant enemy of Great Britain, reinforced in power and wealth, will throw off his dissembling smile and hypocritical alliance, and drag down that power, which has now no friend on earth, to the very dust of humiliation. Waterloo will be avenged, England's boasted power disappear amid the jeers of Italy and Denmark betrayed, and under the pity and contempt of that other power in America which she so cruelly wronged, and which alone could have saved her from disgrace and ruin.

These are not fanciful speculations, but possibilities obvious and near. As humanitarians, we may shrink from the contemplation of the waste and bloodshed which a general European war must involve; but in its political results we have little interest. Regarding with European powers as individuals, we know well enough that they are either open enemies, like England, France, Austria, and Spain, or mere negative entities, like Italy and Russia. We may cut and carve their territories, "adjust boundaries," and "amend the map of Europe" to their liking, and imagine they are molding the destinies to their will. The doctrine of Republicanism, the believers in the rights and capacities of man, will and in all this turmoil, and the struggle of petty ambitions, have another motive for abandoning the irreclaimable Old World for the free soil and stimulating atmosphere of the New, where the great problem of human freedom is working out, under God's guidance, its own happy solution. The complications to which we refer will send to us unemployed accumulated wealth, industry and skill capable of creating wealth, but the best blood and brains of Europe. They may create some financial fluctuations in our capitals among foreign Jews and gambling brokers, but they will also create an increased demand for our products, and in every sense enhance our interests.

We await the coming storm, therefore, under easy sail and with perfect composure, and shall witness the humiliation of Great Britain, and the dismemberment of Austria and Prussia, with complete satisfaction, as the just punishment of crime.

Appointments to Office.

THE President lately issued the following circular to heads of departments in reference to appointments to office:

"It is eminently right and proper that the Government of the United States should give assistance and substantial evidence of its just appreciation of the services of the patriotic men, who, when the life of the nation was imperiled, entered the army and navy to preserve the integrity of the Union, defend the Government and maintain and perpetuate unimpaired its free institutions.

"It is therefore directed: First, That in appointments to office in the several executive departments of the General Government and the various branches of the public service connected with and dependent upon preference shall be given to such meritorious and honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, particularly those who have been disabled by wounds received or diseases contracted in the line of duty, as may possess the proper qualifications.

"Second—That in all promotions in said departments and the several branches of the public service connected therewith, such persons shall have preference, when equally suitable and qualified, over those who have not faithfully and honorably served in the land or naval forces of the United States.

"ANDREW JOHNSON."

It is nothing new in ethics for overstrained virtues to become vices. "Extremes meet;" and while we are practicing our greatest benevolence, there is often only a thin crust separating us from gross injustice. It is in legislation especially that this antagonism of principles is most apt to arise. Let it be proved by every form of logic, and confirmed by appeal to the highest impulses of our nature, that a class is oppressed, or that some principle ought to be enforced, and straightway men will be found to clamor for the strict and instant enforcement of their so-called right. It seems to be forgotten that this right cannot be carried out without some accompanying wrong; that Government is the balancing of the interests of classes; and that though it is right one should be elevated, it is wrong another should be depressed. That principle is liable, also, to be carried to extreme lengths, and to take no account of the influences which ought to modify its application. Many perhaps from the inevitable accompaniments of times of great political excitement, like the present, but this is no reason why we should not endeavor to guard against the pernicious effects.

It is because we are so well aware of the abuse to which the recommendations contained in the circular of President Johnson of April 7th is liable, that we think a few thought careless of the claims which it was the object of the circular to enforce, we venture to comment upon the limitations which ought obviously to attend it. One of these limitations is stated in express terms, "that in all promotions in said departments, . . . preference," meaning by this word the service of the army or navy during the war, "shall have preference, when equally eligible and qualified, over those who have not faithfully and honorably served in the land or naval forces of the United States." It might be presumed that those who had not served "faithfully and honorably" ought to be discharged, rather than in any manner promoted; but passing by the ambiguity of the phrase, we come to the limitation, "when equally eligible and qualified." One would think that imagine that there existed in the departments of Government a system of competitive examination, and that, all other things being equal, those who had served their country in the field of office, especially if wounded or diseased, should be preferred over those who had not so served, just as sound in mind, limb or eyesight. Now it is plain that this is very far from being the case. Appointment to office, even to exoneration of a good principle shows itself, and almost neutralizes the benevolent intention of the President. It may be argued, if preference to office is to be given to the wounded, and so on, those now in office ought to be displaced, to make room for more worthy even if less able men. Such an opinion not in the least warranted by the terms of the circular itself. Again, how easy it is, in finding that wounds and diseases contracted in the service of your country, to make the sufferers to a preference, to slide into the belief that these disabilities, in spite of which appointments are made, are in themselves, incompetencies. Now it is not meant that, having lost your arm, you are therefore entitled to a clerkship, but only that, if you are as honest, sober, and capable as others who are seeking an appointment, you will be entitled to a preference by reason of your wounds, and otherwise not.

There is, besides, in this circular, an assumption which we think not only dangerous and false: It is that none have served their country except those who were in actual conflict. Far be it from us to dim for one instant the lustre of the deeds of those who fought and bled; but as there were strong men before Agamemnon, so there were other patriots besides those who entered the field, and who have deserved well of the flag of the country. Another assumption is, and though not so apparent, has been more practically acted upon: that a man entering as a warrior must be equally successful in all other positions. It is but the counterpart of the error with which we began the war. Then, any bawling lawyer or loud-mouthed politician was thought to put on an uniform, and it was supposed his energy would supply the place of talent, and his patriotism compensate for the absence of military knowledge. Are we much wiser now that all that is over? Is there not a lingering belief that a gallant cabreur must make a good Minister-Plenipotentiary? That a wounded general is necessarily our best representative abroad? How many more failures like that of Kilpatrick in Chile are we to have before we learn the true qualifications of our public men?

But the fact is, that the circular of the President we have alluded to is so full of kind and humane feeling, and struck so tender a chord of deep public gratitude, that we have not been content to have allowed the errors it by implication sanctioned to have passed without comment, only that we see in many quarters the gross injustice which a strict application of its doctrine involves. "In the meantime we may depend upon it for our comfort," said my Uncle Toby, "that God Almighty is so good and just a governor of the world, that if we have but done our duties in it, it will never be inquired into whether we have done them in a red coat or a black one."

Close of the War in the South Pacific.

THE full details of the recent attempt on Callao by the Spanish fleet show that the repulse of the latter was a signal defeat. Several vessels of the squadron were completely disabled, and had the attack been renewed with a crippled force, a number of vessels would inevitably have been sacrificed. Instead of renewing the attack, however, the Spanish Admiral was obliged to take his departure from the bay blowing up by torpedoes. In his note to the British Minister announcing his departure, and the raising of the blockade (which had lasted a week), he could not, being a Spaniard, refrain from indulging in a little of what the English call "bounce." Having "chastised" Peru, he says, he takes his leave. We reproduce his manifesto as a laughable curiosity:

FRIGATE NUMANCIA, BAY OF CALLAO, May 5, 1866.

The naval forces under my command having chastised the unjust provocation of the Government of Peru by the bombardment of Callao and an attack upon their fortifications, of whose numerous and heavy guns I have destroyed a large number; and as for the rest at the time of its withdrawal to the anchorage, the undersigned has no longer to announce that the blockade of Callao is raised, the squadron leaving the waters of Peru. And, consequently, that of the Government of the Republic evacuates or tolerates outrages against the persons and property within it, the naval force of her Catholic Majesty will return to avenge them.

MANUEL PAREJA Y SERRADA, MEDIZ CAMPO.

In response to the threat contained in the last paragraph, the Peruvian Government two days after, issued a decree prohibiting all Spanish subjects from residing in the country under penalty of being treated as spies, and obliging all those who have come into the country since 1850, or who have ever made reclamations against it, to leave within twenty days, while those who entered before 1850 have the alternative of becoming naturalized or leaving. So Admiral Nunez, if he ever again acts as a "conqueror," is loudly called on to again "face the music" of the Callao batteries.

It is said by the organ of the French Government in this country that Spain is equally a Spanish stipendiary, that the Spanish squadron will undertake no more this season, but separate, one part going to the Philippines and the other to Mexico—from which, the view, after repairing and receiving reinforcements, of renewing the "chastisement" of the allies at some future day. This is interpreted in English, means that Spain has given up the contest in the Pacific. Her vessels, when they leave the coasts of Peru and Chile, will do so never to return.

But the war is not over, nor can if be closed by being abandoned by Spain. The probable speedy admission of Venezuela and New Granada to the existing alliance, will transfer the theatre of operations to the Atlantic; and in spite of Mr. Seward's post-prandial aspiration at Havana, that Spain might maintain her "American possessions," this transfer can hardly fail of securing the independence of Cuba. There would be a stern justice in this retribution which would at last restore the waning belief that Heaven interferes among nations now, as of old, to protect the injured and punish the guilty. At any rate, Spain will only have to reproach herself, if, by her own conduct, she has called into existence those "heaviest battalions" which Bonaparte averred always received the support of the supernal powers.

THE wisdom of Rowland Hill's system of cheap postage, and the largest accommodation for the largest number, is receiving a fuller realization in England every year. The revenue from the post-office is increasing so rapidly, as to give reason for believing that it will soon overthe country from that most offensive of all imposts, the income tax. The surplus revenue, last year, from this source, was $7,500,000. The previous surplus increase at the rate of $1,500,000. The secret of the profit has been discovered. It lies in the establishment of frequent deliveries of letters in large towns, with no extra charge for delivery. Two cents will send a letter to all parts of the United Kingdom, and put it in the hands of its correspondent as it is addressed. Nobody thinks much of two cents, and will pay it on a letter containing the most trivial inquiry, when he knows that it will bring him an answer in less than two hours. People invite each other to dinner in London by the penny post, and send for whatever comes uppermost, by letter. The transaction costs the Government less than half a cent, leaving three hundred per cent. profit.

PRECISELY the oldest of living travelers is Frederick Waldeck, author of "Picturesque and Archeological Travels in Yucatan," and "Ancient Monuments of Mexico and Yucatan," the latter lately published by the Peabody Institute. Dr. Melchoir Vischer's Palenque and Mexico long before Stephens and Catherwood, and made numerous and elaborate drawings of the interesting ruins and objects of interest. Although now over one hundred years old, he proposes to bring out, in London, another book, entitled "Archeological Encyclopedia," in which he will give plates of "more than two thousand subjects," illustrating the monuments of America and its early history. It will be published by subscription—a volume of text and another of plates—price ten pounds sterling, payable on delivery. Mr. R. A. Henwood, 99 Engifield road, West, London, is agent to receive subscriptions.

We hope the venerable traveler may secure good encouragement from this people of the continent he has done so much to illustrate.

The London Spectator ventures to tell the truth of those great gambling matches, "The Races." Of the last "Derby," the greatest of the turf demonstrations and the most respectable, it says:

"The truth is, that the crowd on Epsom Downs is a crowd of gamblers, and has the code, the manners, the dress, the expressions, and the self-control of gamblers. Of the twenty thousand people who it is calculated, were present on Epsom Downs, we should say that at least nineteen thousand bet the course more or less the worse for liquor. According to a phrase much affected by policemen who have to give evidence in court, the majority of the people present 'had been drinking, but had been drinking.' To this state of well-nigh universal semi-drunkenness the crowd owed the almost entirely coarseness of language and gesture which characterized it. The dresses, the cries, the jokes, the very horses' character were stung before the carriages of the 'aristocracy and gentry' were pelted and mobbed with coarse jokes, whose humor, if humor there was, was entirely Bacchanalian. Never was a crowded treety to such an one the occupants of draws and mud-splashes and the tramps and gipsies who swarmed around it within the enclosure proved to be set apart for the Upper Ten Thousand, and the great amusement of the day consisted of an interchange of chaff and a volley of dried peas fired from pop-guns and tubes. The fast men of both town and the Anonymous Mangoritics, who formed the greater portion of the intimate spectators."

MR. LAYARD made himself absurd on the interpellation about the Valparaiso bombardment. In excusing the British Admiral for not co-operating with Commodore Rodgers, he declared that it makes the silly observation that the Spaniards could have destroyed the combined English and American squadrons. Nothing of the Spanish articles on the allied Chilean and Peruvian fleets, and on Callao, have probably disturbed the mind of the Archæological Diplomatist more than this. We are no admirers of Commodore Rodgers, but we believe him when he says he could have destroyed the Spanish fleet with the Wampanoag. The attack of the Spanish fleet, in from thirty seconds to thirty minutes. That gone, the remaining vessels would have been quickly drenched in red-hot eggshells. If the stupidity of the British Government is fairly reflected by Mr. Layard, it would "pay" it to make a friendly match between the Monadnock, or any of her class, and the most powerful of the European armored ships. The result might open the eyes of Great Britain to facts, upon which her naval existence—not her supremacy, that is gone—may depend. "Destroyed by the Spaniards!" Why, if Spain had fired a shot against Commodore Rodgers, her only answer, by a shrug, nothing of the sort, would have been worth to her an hour's purchase!

At the outbreak of the war, there were 169 free negroes in South Carolina, owning among them 278 slaves.

The battle of Stone River, fought and won by Gen. Rosecrans, was very bloody. The national loss was one-fifth of the force engaged. Here a cemetery for the Union dead has been laid out. It covers sixteen acres, and is to be enclosed with a substantial wall, 42 feet high. Over 5,000 are now interred there, of whom the largest number from any one State, over 1,200, are Ohioans. But three or four are from Massachusetts. Where the friends do not furnish a stone, the Government will erect one of Georgia white marble, 3 feet high (one-half the length being above ground), 1 foot wide, 5 inches thick, rounded at the top, with the name and regiment of the soldier on the face.

Two hundred and ninety-seven thousand five hundred watches, under the value of $100 each, paid taxes last year, and 43,800 of higher value paid $3 each. In 1865, 317,957 paid taxes, amounting in the aggregate to $367,770. New Jersey returns more watches in proportion to her population than any other State, with the single exception of Massachusetts, having a gold watch for every 35 of her people—no record being made of silver watches. In pianos and other parlor musical instruments, Massachusetts ranks first in proportion to population, New York second, and New Jersey third—possessing an instrument for almost each 180 of her inhabitants. The Territories are quite destitute of these bulky evidences of civilization and refinement—Nevada returning but 9, Dakota but 20, Arizona but 36, New Mexico, 14; Nebraska, 45; Washington, 55; and Arizona, Dakota and Montana, none. No returns have been made of slaves or watches in the States of South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas and Arkansas, but one of each from Georgia, have been returned.

TOWN COSSIP.

WE really wish that superb specimen of a Cockney, the author of "Mutual Friend," now performing at the Olympic, would revisit the Rialto. He wrote in his slip-slop style so pleasantly about Broadway as it appeared in 1851, that we should like to read what he would say about its appearance in 1866. We remember that it was fine, and could not be more so; but like all gradual changes, however rapidly made when they take place before our daily eyes, we are not so impressed by them as we could be by a view of the progress across by quicken every day. The avenues of Continental cities, from Broadway, the most central little interior to those of the fashionable promenade of the Empire city. In a word, the metropolis of America is tropical in its growth. The vertical sun is stimulative and the equinoctial drenches are equally lost in nourishment when they fall. Look up a street in New York and contrast its condition in 1866 with its appearance in 1855. Only twenty years! and yet, abundant as many sound, two decades of the most splendid thoroughfares of wealth and glorious city have been rebuilt. Where is there another place in the world, from the day when Adam founded Eden to the present time, of which the same thing can be said? Our readers may perhaps expect a moral to this very ultra comparative exordium, and we cheerfully give it—architectural rapidity reaches its ultimate in a republic.

The conversational epidemic of the past week has been the sayings and doings of Fenianism.

Some very critical native-born citizens shake their heads, and say that in a few years we shall have as much trouble with the Irish element as the English have; while others spitefully declare that nothing can more thoroughly demonstrate the utter unfitness of the Celtic race to make good citizens than their disobedience to the laws of a country which has so nobly sheltered them. The fact is, that an Irishman seldom can become a safe member of our Republic for, to carry out his insane hatred of England, he would sacrifice the best interests of the United States. Col. O'Neil, the hero of the Fort Erie fiasco, is aided by the New York Irish Times to be one of the wise men, and the identical rebel who last filled seven hundred Irishmen, imprisoned in Andersonville, with, he knows, their allegiance to the Republic as familiar in the rebel army. If this be true, he ought to be tried for rebellion, and if guilty, as I believe, he should be associated with him again. President Johnson has ordered the arrest of the leading wearers of the Green, whose treason is thus disproved beyond a shadow of doubt, by the dignity of his brother President, Drypoodle Nicholson.

But however the bigoted and malignant Brithers may wish the fact, the patriotic movement is here. No doubt that it is the shorting question of the day, and our shoulders can pay 50 per ct. for the privilege of it. Although two wrongs never make a right, it is impossible not to look at an American, half pity, half scorn, as he and we speak as antichrism, two-thirds amusement—at the very name of the Fenian or the Orangeman, and when the latter chalks out to his own lips, and forced to swallow a little of the pepper so plentifully mixed in it.

As the English pretend greatly to admire their hero-worship, Sunday, we remark in passing, is their only sensible passage in his writings which addresses our sympathies. It is then proper being indulged with some recreation. Nevertheless, despite our sympathy with their revenge, we think it ought to be postponed upon that day, for, as a correspondent justly tells Lucy, Verdict, of England and Sunday Observance.

As we are not Irish by our birth, the rank and freely democrats of New Jersey have refused to close the drinking-saloons on the Sunday. We must admit that the house has not been broken—as the rowdies of New York have a whole week—but New Jersey has, nevertheless, severely lashed disgraced towards the ruffians who assaulted Mr. Bird. Here and the indictment is found, rifle, has had a good effect. The miscreants who get drunk and raise a row on the Sunday do not last for a week years' hard labor in jail, which they may be sure they will get if they use their practical jokes on the Republic. The only result is that somewhere about a hundred special policemen are sworn in and armed—not to fire, but to keep the peace, and the ruffians know that these vigilant gentlemen of the peace do not go to bed with a head when it runs assist his club, visits at every saloon-house in the city, and Shillelaghanism kills itself in fine and impotent, as the police hand them over to their tender mercies.

The theatres present merely the unnatural attractions of the summer state. Wheatley has the Varieties, who are performing in the very same pieces that delighted our grandfathers.

Dickens, like every one else, is growing obtuse in his old age, and unfortunately Mr. Howe, with all his second-hand cleverness, has not been able to make anything out of the last of several novels by "Boz's Best Friend." It was a most miserable failure, and could only be excused in the fag-end of a season. We are glad that Mrs. Wood's poky reign is approaching its end, and we can say of it, as we do of the last of Dickens's able things, that we are sorry for it.

Although it is not opened, the American Museum remains under the influences of Frost, which, tempered by the cooling season, makes very pleasant visiting.

Uncle Tom's Cabin" is the attraction.

More has occurred in this summer campaign in his natual gallant manner, Dan Bryant and Miss Cooke being his chief attractions. As a general thing, we prefer the whisky and shillelah dramas, but Dan Bryant is the best solution of that terrible form of sensation, and as such, can be tolerated.

Miss Cooke has been making a very profitable tour in the Jerseys, Carlotta de Barge's reputation performing much personal interest. Long may she be spared to the stage, and to her admirers. Let us hope that the plates or a piece of mourners on the part of the management, which we wish to see in the future, will be the performance begun, a scene of mind busy part of the last drama, and a lighted scene and a wife, mother and children, that they ran out. When the damage was repaired, the audience per very unduly refused to let them in, although they had paid only a few minutes previously.

Domestic.—The Department of State learns from the United States Minister at Paris, that if naturalized citizens of the United States, take to emigration to France but for their naturalization, will go at once upon their arrival in France, and report at the office of the district in which their names are enrolled, produce their evidence of naturalization as citizens of the United States, and ask to have their names erased from the conscription list, they will probably be relieved from all difficulties or apprehensions in that respect.

—The horse of commerce has hitherto been mostly manufactured from bones acid, obtained by boiling. The acid and soda, congealed and crystallized, has been found in the form of deposits in Tahiti and Java, and in the deposit at Clear Lake, in California, is much more abundant, and of remarkable purity. It is taken direct from the earth, it is pronounced superior to the best English muriatic acid." Borax Lake," as the deposit is about two miles in circumference, surrounded by high hills, and in winter is a reservoir for the surplus water of the rainy season. In summer the lake is quite shallow, and lumps of soda and borax are taken out of the mud and, after the crystals are extracted, the mud itself is found, on analysis, to be rich in soda, and is therefore given per cent. of borax. It is also said that experiment, that when all articles are boiled in the water of Clear Lake, the wash will remain in the mud even at that depth.

Western States	11.4
Southern States	4.5

As regards fevers, the following is the ratio:

—Seventy men are now employed on the Hoosic Tunnel, and the work is being carried forward successfully. Two engines are at work, one of forty and one of one hundred horse-power. They have already gone over eight hundred feet into the mountain. The workmen use the drill in getting out the rock. They sometimes send up from twenty-five to one hundred pounds. The tunnel is seven feet wide, and seven feet high. Thirty feet have been made on both sides of the mountain, it will take eight years to complete the tunnel.

About twenty thousand are there, chiefly Sioux, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Crows and Sioux. Their destitution makes them anxious for peace, but the treaty commissioners think the terms demanding the Smoky Hill route must be left to them for consideration before they can be concluded. This is done, they will continue to be troublesome. Their condition at this point is said to be very destitute.

—A reception was given to Gen. T. W. Sherman at St. Paul, on the 13th ult., by the citizens, which was very numerously present. Gen. Sherman, in reply to a complimentary address, said he considered the immigration to the Southern coast. He said Fort Royal had been decreased as a depot, and that Port Pulaski, which was fortified, he would say it was not a failure. No expedition, he said, was ever planned by the War Department one-half the results.

—Arrangements are being made to hold a grand convention of soldiers and their friends at Indianapolis, on the 4th of July next, at which the soldiers' orphans' and the various regiments will be formally presented to Gov. Morton, as the representative of the State. Suitable arrangements will be made with the various railroads centering in the city.

—It is boring for coal at St. Joseph, Mo., a depth of 360 feet has been reached. Two veins of coal have been passed through, measuring three feet and four feet. Below the second vein a brine has been reached. It is said to yield water, when boiled down, as fine as the very best manufactured in the city as if oil had been struck.

—Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was on the 11th ult. elected President and General Manager of the Alabama and Tennessee River Railroad. There was no opposed on to his election, and the unanimous vote was complimentary. He was elected not less than six thousand dollars a year. The board of Trustees of the road have also decided that he will accept the position.

—The Democrats at Nashville that the body of a noted guerilla, named Tom Morrow, a leading member of the Ku Klux organization, was found in the woods, by a road in the woods near Gallatin, Tenn. His bones were found galloping over the country. It is unknown who killed him.

—Miss Evans, the authoress, has purchased a marble monument to be erected in the cemetery of the whole soldiers who fell in the war.

—Gov. Brownlow writes to the Nashville Press the people have determined to have no more war, but the question of a few brawlers, are quiet and peaceable. In some localities there are a few disturbances, caused by the bushwhackers, who are believed to be returned rebel soldiers. Gov. Brownlow says that the number of murders done by them have been exaggerated, and that the reports have been sent to Washington are not according to the facts. Among these reports is one that the Governor of the State says that nine-tenths of the people are for the Franchise law, and will see that it is enforced.

—Napoleon's proposition for a congress of the European Powers was to meet in Paris on the 5th of June; but, growing from the debates in the British Parliament, that much reliance was placed on its being able to arrange the differences between Austria and Prussia, the rest of Europe. England had plainly declared the, although she was willing to see the Congress meet this year, yet she would not be bound to observe any conclusion the Congress might come to. The Emperor Napoleon, in a usual agrandizement, as well as the safety of his dynasty, regard the proposed congress as a favorable event to favor peace, but it is a foregone conclusion with all that it is a delay at its call for the 5th of June. Hence, Napoleon will yet compel the Great Powers to form a coalition, and compel them to fight for the Congress.

—Those miserable men called Sports are very indignant in England, in consequence of the fight for the championship of the world not having come to an issue. The men spared no expense, and each engaged to bleed the other for eight hours, and during that time declared a draw. As the public were to pound one another to death, their cowardly patrons were disappointed at not having to stand the brunt of the manly art of fighting for money.

—An English writer, well-known for the accuracy of his statistics, has published, in one of the London papers the amount of the private property left by Queen Victoria, whom he declares to be the richest sovereign in the world. He says that the Queen has made the exclusive of this fact to reflect upon the Queen's meanness in begging Parliament to give her children something to live on, and when any of the royal brats are married, a fresh donation is asked for, besides the money for the purchase of cradles, etc.

—Baron Rothschild, City of Cambridge is, at last, going to be married to a Prince Tuck, a Colonel in the Austrian Service.

—The Princess Helena is to be married on the 5th of July, to Prince Christian, of Holstein. The Princess has an admirable mother for marrying off her girls. She seems to consider a husband as necessary to a young lady as a new hat and an opera box.

THE HORSE AT HOME.

FROM the earliest ages of civilization the horse has received the pride and attention of the race. Possessing strength, fleetness and courage, no domestic animal has shared so much with man, and no animal can expect a master given to a favorite, and none has been more closely identified with all our ideas of nobility and heroism. Even in the present day, when some of the sublimest strains of both prophet and poet, and the most noble and heroic sentiments are found in connection with the noblest of the brute creation. To understand the true character of the horse, we must look upon him not in this pampered, perverted condition to which civilization subjects him, but in his own domain—in his native prairies and plains, where alone he develops and exhibits his best traits. This unrestrained life is the surest remedy for the evils of confinement, and the highly-trained steeds would speedily return if the opportunity offered.

The horse, in his wild state, is eminently a domestic animal, somewhat lordly in his tastes, and fond of a large establishment. He has his harem, over which he watches with as much zeal and vigor as a Turkish pasha. True, his chosen beauties are not so scrupulously concealed from the public gaze, but they are as jealously guarded from all outside approaches, and woe to the interloper who would venture upon any intimacy with the inmates of the seraglio.

When the young horse attains sufficient maturity, his next object is to make a settlement in life, to set up an establishment of his own, and attain the importance and the responsibilities of domestic happiness. Selecting from the droves of mares some such beauties as he may consider worthy of the honor, he commences to build his home; and guided by an unerring instinct, he never makes a mistake in the unconscionable mate. Being a polygamist, our hero horse does not restrict himself to one wife, but generally has from two to a dozen, and thirty or more equine fair ones are the sharers of his home and the objects of his love. But the cares of true love does not always run smooth in horse cases, for he has to fight many battles and overcome many rivalries, ending often in fierce battles and bloody encounters, before he can win the day, and when the noble stallion has routed his rivals, and secured his prize, he has to maintain his claim to it by force, before his pre-emption claim is generally admitted, and everything settled down to quiet possession.

He now becomes the most gallant of lovers, the most devoted of husbands, and the most vigilant of guardians. All his energies and efforts are concentrated upon the object of his affections, and from danger, he leads them to the cooling stream and the tender pasturage; from the scorching sun, to the shade. He warns them of danger. If any are sluggish and straggling, he menaces them with the point of his martial authority, trotting around, now in front, again in the rear, but keeping his whole body guard together. He leads them to the best food or gambols.

Sometimes several families, or "bunches," as they are called on the plains, meet together at some favorite watering place, and then a general carnival is indulged. Mares in a manner that seems inextricable, and to human beings, most unnatural to be a proper bench would appear an impossibility. But the partners of the dance seem to enjoy it, and after every change time to drink and digest themselves in the cool, fresh water. The stallion, however, becomes less encouraging—now driving out an alien mare, now leading back his own wife, now with his head erect and teeth and heel the invasion of a rival, reminding one of the old knights of chivalry—now raising his spirited form after a disorderly charge—and now, with his leaders proudly survey their forces; and prancing gracefully around, with head erect and flashing eyes, they seem to begin sinful defiance to their equally gallant opponents.

But the stallion's duties are not always so friendly, as love loving and faithful, confining his attentions to his own family circle, sometimes and compelling him to remain with him. He is with his wives in summer and winter, in cold and storm, with plenty, and when the burning suns and protracted drouth have parched and withered everything around, he will dig down to the roots of grass conceal in in the thick chaparral his sagacity will find it, and, with many delicate signs, call the mares proudly survey their forces; and prancing gracefully around, with head erect and flashing eyes, they seem to begin sinful defiance to their equally gallant opponents.

The budding love and arbitrarily opposes their addiction; the budding mare shows very youthful evil bias, for the horse cheerfully furthers these tender longings, and the colt and filly grow up under the precepts, to be married elsewhere partners for life and begin the management of families of their own.

There are always some stallions that have not courage enough to maintain their position, and become the objects of their choice. These form a distinct class in the pasture of the herd, and seem to lead a life of misery bloodshed, and spend the weary days of horse life in solitude and sadness. Many days they will stand in the unhappy collapse room about from close to place, wherever they are driven, dejected, dispirited and subdued.

We have thus briefly sketched the history of the horse at home, where he follows his native instincts and develops his character, and we find him here the same noble, deserving animal that we are accustomed to see him when he is the servant and pet of humanity.

THE GREAT PARIS EXHIBITION.

WITHIN rather less than a twelvemonth from this date, that is, on the 1st of April of next year, the French Government stands pledged before the world to have the great Paris Exhibition Universelle of 1867 which has ever yet taken place thrown open to the visitants from the four quarters of the globe, and expected to be crowned by a great triumph of modern civilization. Long before that period, probably, the usual anarchical reaction against the present state of enmity and industry ever brought together in one spot, will have been passed over in France, and have identified, according to the various classification, within the construction just beginning to rear itself above ground on the Champ de Mars, the order by which the public cannot further details of the contemplated Exhibition—some of which, indeed, are already to some extent determined, and some of these are of so novel a character as to promise gratification to all tastes and to the most varied curiosities.

At present all is a mass of inextricable bewilderment and confusion—as it was in the Champ de Mars, from the soil of which the looker-on can gather little idea of future plans; and yet much progress has actually been made. The basement of the structure has, indeed, been, whose structure is about to be raised on it, and vast iron piles are to be driven into the ground to support enormous arches, or rather sections of arches, to be reared on these.

The structure itself is to cover thirty-six acres of ground, and is elliptical, a form eminently suited to the accommodation of spectators, although offering some serious disadvantage as far as a general coup d'œil is concerned. Indeed, although on a superficial survey of the present scene of industry the building will stand unrivaled in point of effect, it is admitted that it will be very much inferior in appearance to the Universal Exhibition of 1851, or indeed, of the still existing palace of Sydenham. The interior exhibits are also classified in ten leading divisions, which again are subdivided into ninety-five classes. The ten divisions comprise:—Works of art; mines and applications of labor to art; furniture and household articles; clothing and personal equipments; raw materials; food products; implements and machines; food, fresh and prepared; living agricultural products and specimens of practical horticultural skill; and lastly, model objects adapted to the amelioration of the physical and moral condition of the laboring classes of the earth. The exhibition groups will occupy one of the elliptical concentric galleries, the remaining one being reserved for a road; each nation will be allotted a section of the ground-floor, running from centre to circumference. This arrangement will enable any one moving from the outside to the centre by a transverse passage, to see everything produced by each several nation, while, on the contrary, by moving round the building, such an one can inspect successively all the articles of the same sort which the world produces. The circular galleries, as well as the sectional passages, will be spacious and airy, and every facility for communicating to and out of the building will be afforded by means of numerous outlets.

In all inner arrangements, the Exhibition of 1867, it is said, will differ from those of its predecessors in the ameliorations which have been suggested by former experiences, and in the greater extension afforded where exhibitors are expected to be more numerous, and to more varied portions of the world. It is in the outward surroundings of the palace, therefore, that great alterations are to be look of for; and if everything is accomplished which is talked of, the Paris Exhibition will stand alone of its kind, at least in our generation. There, in the grounds now being laid out, all sorts of constructions are to be raised. Some of these are to consist of the various portions of the edifice—among the several nations of the world, containing, of course, the articles of furniture, clothing, etc., of every day life among them. Thus, the hut of the Esquimaux will be set up with its mat on the floor and its fire in the window, by the way, it is filled of importing a "real Esquimaux" family to live in it, and to be the living exhibition of the dwellers on the banks of the Greenland fiords. Then the restaurants or cafés of the respective wines and requirements of time and season, and the cuisine of the country, will be the common delight of this country, so that you may "eat" at the Exhibition of 1867 as you "drink" at the Jubilee (of course, we mean the Jubilee of 1867), dine in the open air, food and refreshment, which may be required by travelers, and, finally, there is to be a Grand Hotel provided for their departure again without incurring the expense of a night's lodging in Paris, at the end of the day. The upper story is exclusively reserved for the exhibitors, and the entrance-money will be fixed at one shilling o'clock in the evening; but all games of chance or of skill are to be excluded.

On the other side, it is asserted that the Grand Hotel will be a failure, and which we trust will be the case (if the same company), have been literally besieged by the hotel-keepers and agriculture and the different band by associations already formed in the United Kingdom, for the accommodation of visitors to the Exhibition. Should the Government, however, give the assurance, suggesting that they could not suggest the Exhibition, that for their own sakes the Grand Hotel would be first served; but that previous to April 1st, 1867, the Champ de Mars would be the scene of preparations of accommodation for the period of the Exhibition of the world. In fact, if the Exhibition of 1867 is not to be beneficial to the advantages offered by this Great Exhibition, it will be a failure, and not to the host or keeper, furnished-house-letter, or shopkeeper of any kind.

HOW SHE LOST A HUSBAND.

A VERY select party congregated at the house of Mrr. Bolvile to celebrate the birthday of her daughter, the youngest of four, the fair Henriette, who had just reached her sixteenth year, and entered on her sixteenth year. She was beautiful, accomplished, and, of course, fascinating, although she had no fortune, she was a jewel in herself.

But to return to the birthday party:

Guests arrived, the piano divinely. Mr. William Forrest, the younger son of a country banker, looked over the music, and selected a waltz. Mrs. Bolvile noticed the gravity of the young gentleman, and, doubtless to divert it, desired Henriette to play. Mr. Forrest was delighted, and placed in the finest possible taste. Had she been wound up for the occasion, like a musical box, she could not have played more correctly, without precision, or with less vulgar impulse. Every note fell from her fingers as if it were a pearl from the mouth of nature. Poor William! his heart was dragged up and down the gamut until exhausted, when, at the last three-minute waltz, he approached her, and in the most delicate of places. There was a general burst of applause, followed by a deep blush and profound silence. Mrs. Bolvile looked proudly at the young bachelors, but favored the young lady, as if to say, "Encourage him, if he is sentirely for himself. In this pause a voice cried out, and it sounded like accompanying the glances of Mrs. Bolvile:

"Where's nobody offer?"

A titter, deepening into a laugh, ran round the room, and Mrs. Bolvile, with a smile, answered:

"Oh! ha, ha!" observed the mamma, evidently restored to her composure, "Henriette is engaged to Mr. Eddie's grandma-or bought him. How came it never to be known?" she added immediately after, to check the intruder.

But the parrot was a social bird, and resolved not to leave the party; hence, though weak, had been bound by some Samaritan to the bird cage. Hearing himself addressed, he replied gruffly to ask, but—thus spoke the banker's son—"Good Mrs Forrest, you are a fool, you know—ha! ha!"

Mrs. Bolvile answered Mrs. Belvile, for her daughter; and the favorite song—we forget its title—was exchanged for another selection.

"Your only unmarried daughter?" observed William Forrest to Mrs. Bolvile, as to the mother.

"All married except my dear Henrietta, and I believe it would have been married long ago, but for Mr. Eddie and the mother, affected even by the probability of a separation from the boys, etc., etc., etc.

"The last lot, gentlemen, the last lot!" cried the parrot, and was answered by a general laughter, except by Henriette, with fine presence of mind, struck the keys of the piano forte, and through good management of the interruption, in a minute or two was in the midst of a most delightful waltz.

"If I might aspire to the notice of Miss Bolvile," said William Forrest, as he took to the music—"

"Going for an old song, gentlemen!" cried the parrot, and again its words were greeted with a shout.

But the charm of the evening was gone. Mrs. Bolvile was invited to dinner, and William Forrest—well! whether the last declaration of the bird had "given him away," or whether he was afraid of the consequences of the evening, ventured to speak of Henriette. She died a martyr to the cause of disease. What would become of the world if truth interfered in every marriage?

As old London paper published in 1680 seriously recommended that an act should be passed in Parliament "that all women, of whatever age, rank, condition, or degree, whether virgins, maids, or widows, that shall, from and after such act, impose upon, seduce, and betray into matrimony any of his Majesty's subjects, by the use of scents, paints, cosmetic washes, artificial teeth, false hair, wires, stays, or high heels, shall incur the penalty of the law now in force against witchcraft, sorcery, and such like misdemeanors, and that the marriage, upon conviction, shall stand and void."

THERE is a regular trade carried on in Paris of picking up cigar ends in the cafés, which furnish a thick and unwholesome smoke for the beggars and sweep-men of the capital. The cigar-ends are picked up in the streets, also, when lodge, clothe and feed a flaring establishment for the reception of a certain number of old men, who, on account of their old age, are unable to work. The aged pensioners, as they cannot afford to give them the luxury of a whole cigar,

LIZARDO MONTERO, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE PERUVIAN NAVAL FORCES.

MENDEZ NUNEZ, ADMIRAL OF THE SPANISH FLEET IN THE PACIFIC.

LIZARDO MONTERO.

THE war against the South American Republics has made the prominent men of those countries objects of especial interest to our people, who naturally sympathize with the efforts of other free governments to maintain their liberties. We need not apologize, therefore, for presenting the portrait of the Commander-in-Chief of the Peruvian Navy, who so gallantly and successfully resisted the late attack by the Spanish fleet. Mr. Montero arrived at Callao the night previous to the bombardment, and at once assumed command of the men-of-war in that harbor. He is quite a young man, and distinguished himself greatly in the revolution of Prado, to overthrow the traitor Pezet, on which account he was elevated to his present position.

ADMIRAL NUNEZ.

THIS gentleman has gained an unenviable notoriety on account of his connection with recent events on the Pacific coast. As the orders of his Government were imperative, he was compelled to carry them out or resign, and should not be blamed for the faithful discharge of his duty. He has rapidly risen from the rank of lieutenant to his present grade, and is a brave and able officer. In the recent attack upon Callao, he was severely, and it is reported, fatally wounded.

THE COTTA HOUSE.

MARTIN LUTHER, the great Reformer, was born of poor and humble parents, who were barely able to support their family. They sent their children to school, however, giving them all the advantages within their reach. At the age of fifteen, Martin was sent away from home to Eisenach, where some of his relations resided, in the hope that from them he might derive some assistance; but these relations either could not or would not render any aid, and the young student was compelled to depend upon himself. It was the custom in those days, as it is still in many German cities, for scholars to go around the streets, singing carols and songs before the various houses, begging a morsel of bread as the reward of the entertainment. Sometimes a generous supply was given them, and sometimes they received nothing but hard words. One day, in particular, young Luther had been repulsed at three different houses, and was preparing to return fasting to his lodgings, when, plunged in melancholy reflections, he stopped before the house of a worthy citizen. Suddenly the door opened—a woman appeared on the threshold; it was the wife of Conrad Cotta, who had often remarked the youthful Martin, and been affected by the sweetness of his voice. She had also heard the harsh words just addressed to the poor scholar, and, seeing him stand sadly before the door, she came to his aid, and gave him food to appease his hunger. Cotta liked the boy so well, that, a few days after, he gave him a permanent abode in his house, where, thenceforward, free from want and care, he pursued his studies eagerly and successfully.

THE COTTA HOUSE, A MEMORIAL OF THE EARLY LIFE OF MARTIN LUTHER, THE GREAT GERMAN REFORMER.

Years afterward, when the poor scholar of Eisenach had become the first doctor of his age, a son of this same Conrad Cotta came to Wittenberg, and was received with joy at his table and under his roof; he thus repaying the kindness he had experienced in his struggling days.

The Cotta House is still standing, scarcely changed in appearance from the days of Luther. Our engraving gives a front view of it; and, while antiquated in its style, it is venerable both from age and association.

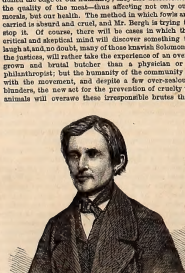
RUINS OF THE WAREHOUSES AT VALPARAISO.

IT will be remembered that in the recent cowardly bombardment of Valparaiso by the Spanish fleet, greater destruction was caused by the fires which raged uncontrolled during the attack than by the shot of the enemy. The custom-house and adjacent warehouses, filled with merchandise, were made the special target by the gallant and chivalrous Spanish Admiral, and were wholly destroyed. Our illustration gives a correct view of the present appearance of the ruins.

CRUELTY TO THE MUTE CREATION.

Carrying Fowls to Market.

ALTHOUGH some of the hard-hearted and practical people consider that Mr. Bergh carries his sympathy for animals a little beyond the absolute necessity of the case, all who know anything of the matter are aware that already a great good has been effected. We are no longer pained by such outrageous spectacles as were constantly seen at the Hoboken



RUINS OF THE WAREHOUSES, VALPARAISO, CHILE, DESTROYED BY THE SPANISH FLEET IN THE BOMBARDMENT OF MARCH 31.

THE CRUEL METHOD IN WHICH FOWLS ARE CARRIED ABOUT THE STREETS OF NEW YORK CITY.

Fuzzy, Barclay street, where calves were tied by the legs and thrown into carts, being piled up one upon another, like so many sand-bags in a fortification. This brutal indifference to animal suffering has been stopped, and the poor creatures, on their way to be slaughtered for man's nourishment, are not subjected to physical pain. These gratuitous cruelties were a double evil—they familiarized us with sights of suffering, and dulled the edge of our humanity; they also debarbarized the quality of the meat—fibres affecting not only our morals, but our health. The method in which fowls are carried is absurd and cruel, and Mr. Bergh is trying to stop it. Of course, there will be cases in which the critical and skeptical mind will discover something to laugh at, and, no doubt, many of those knavish Solomons, the justices, will rather take the experience of an overgrown and brutal butcher than a physician or a philanthropist; but the humanity of the community is with the movement, and despite a few over-zealous blunders, the new act for the prevention of cruelty to animals will overawe these irresponsible brutes that have hitherto tortured unoffending animals on the now obsolete principle that a man may do what he likes with his own.

OSSIP IVANOFF KOMMISSAROFF.

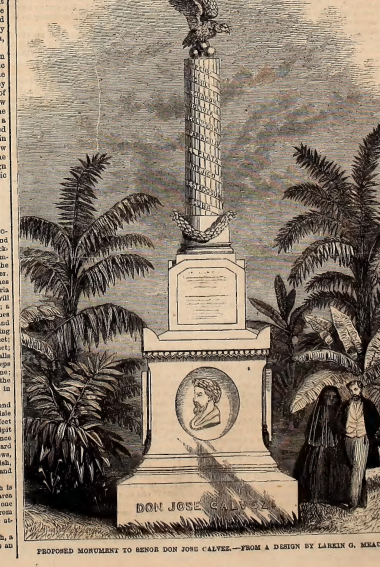
Some men acquire distinction by patient effort, some are born to greatness, and others have it thrust upon them. Such a man is Ossip Ivanoff, who recently saved the Czar's life at St. Petersburg, and finds himself suddenly enriched and ennobled. A peasant in one of the provinces, he went to the capital to prosecute his trade of a batter. By his diligence and industry he rose to the position of foreman, and married a peasant girl. On his birthday he went to say his prayers in the chapel near the house of Peter the Great, and on his return, by way of the summer garden, saw a crowd assembling around the imperial equipage. Desirous of beholding his majesty, he joined the crowd, when a young man, who was standing behind Kommissaroff, tried to push him aside. This individual had repeatedly attempted to penetrate through the surrounding crowd and get nearer the carriage; but Kommissaroff, wishing to see the Emperor, would not suffer him to squeeze through and plant himself before him.

At the moment when the Emperor was putting on his cloak, the young man, pushing Kommissaroff forcibly aside, broke through the front ranks, and drawing a pistol, leveled it at the Czar. Kommissaroff, who had followed him and noticed the movement, instantly caught him by the arm, and, diverting the pistol from its aim, caused it to discharge in the air.

The favor of the grateful Czar has invested him with nobility, and he is the object of a romantic enthusiasm on the part of the people of the Russian capital. In addition to grants of money and estates from the imperial purse, presents of all kinds pour in upon the late humble batter, now one of the most distinguished personages in the empire. Gen. Todleben has been selected as a tutor to advise and educate the almost bewildered young man, and fit him for the high sphere in which he is placed. It remains to be seen how he will wear his unexpected honors; but the recognition of his services by a grateful sovereign is not the least noteworthy feature of this romantic history.

BALDWIN PLACE CHURCH, BOSTON.

THE elegant house of worship, now in process of erection on the corner of Warren avenue and Canton street, Boston, is from plans of S. S. Woodcock Esq., and will cost something over $100,000 when complete. The corner-stone was laid in May, 1865, and the edifice will be dedicated during the coming summer. It will be one of the most spacious and elegant churches in the city. The style is called by the architect Victoria Gothic. The front will face on Canton street, and will consist of a small tower on the east side 75 feet high; a gable 60 feet high, surmounted by a cross 5 feet 6 inches in height. The whole height of the principal tower and spire is to be 148 feet above the sidewalk. Including buttresses, the length of the building is to be 113 feet; width, 77 feet 10 inches; length of transept, 110 feet; width of transept, 35 feet 2 inches. The exterior walls are to be of face brick; weatherings, moldings, steps and angles of buttresses, towers, &c., of sandstone; window and door dressings, of brown stone; and the spires and roof are to be slated with dark slates laid in ornamental patterns.



The main auditorium is 82 feet long, 68 feet wide, and 50 feet high to the ceiling of the clear-story; the aisle walls 20 feet high at the angle of the ceiling and 16 feet at the bottom of the clear-story moldings. The pulpit platform is to be raised 4 feet above the main audience floor, which inclines 1 foot in the whole length toward the pulpit. The pulpit and chancel furniture, pews, gallery fronts, organ-case, doors and other inside finish, are to be of black walnut and chestnut combined, and varnished with panels and moldings.

The main feature of this edifice is the roof, which is self-supporting, there being no pillar in the whole area of the main audience-room. Of the 200 pews, not one will be ineligible, nor will the voice be interrupted from any part of the house. A large organ will form an attractive feature of the internal arrangement.

Rev. D. C. Eddy, D.D., is the pastor of this church, a gentleman well known throughout the country as an earnest, attractive speaker and interesting writer.

PROPOSED MONUMENT TO SENOR DON JOSE CALVEZ.

THE South American patriots have determined to erect a monument to the memory of the Peruvian statesman and soldier, Senor Don José Galvez, who fell while gallantly defending his country from the inexcusable and barbarous attack of the Spanish fleet. His name was known throughout the South American Republics, and he was distinguished for the comprehensive views which he took of republican liberty in all parts of the world, so that, though he was the Minister of War of Peru, he was also the chieftain of every government of equal rights. This characteristic will be signalized on his monument by simple and expressive legends, made up of the names of all the republics of the New World. There is a sympathy between kindred governments which makes the triumph of one the triumph of all, and prompts all to mourn for the heroic dead of each. It is fitting, therefore, that, far below the equator, on friendly soil, the United States should be introduced as adding a flower to the wreath which garlands the sepulchre of Galvez; that his own bust should individualize the homage that is so justly his due, and that the conduct, the powerful and national emblem of Peru, should surmount the shaft that marks the place of his repose. It is also meet that Galvez, though dead, should still speak. By the introduction of Cuba among the republics recorded upon his tomb, the dead patriot flings his defiance at Spain, and prophesies from his grave the sure vengeance that awaits her. By reference to the engraving on this page, it will be seen that all these ideas are embodied in the general plan. The monument was designed by the distinguished artist, L. G. Mead, Jr., who has received the commission for its construction. It will be composed of bronze, upon a granite base, and its cost defrayed by contributions from the friends of republican liberty.

PROPOSED MONUMENT TO SENOR DON JOSE CALVEZ.—FROM A DESIGN BY LARKIN G. MEAD.

THE FENIANS.

WE give some sketches to-day, which cannot fail to be deeply interesting at the present time, when the conflicting reports from the Canadian borders render it doubtful whether President Roberts, or Queen Victoria rules on the other side of the St. Lawrence. We are well aWare that a great nation should never allow any particular past wrongs to influence its statesmanship, and belittle its national policy. Nevertheless, it is impossible not to feel a little grim satisfaction at the annoyance and losses now endured by the same people who aided and abetted George Sanders and his fellow rebels to concoct the St. Albans raid.

The public is so familiar with all the particulars of the campaign in Canada, that our sketches need little, if indeed any, description. We, therefore, content ourself by giving part of our Artist's letter, written immediately after the events he has so ably drawn.

DEAR SIR—The enclosed sketches were taken upon the spot on the days of Saturday and Sunday, by Mr. C. E. Hardy, city editor of the Erie Dispatch, and are thoroughly correct—as all who know the localities will admit.

The first sketch gives a view of old Fort Erie, now a mass of ruins. Here the Fenian flag was first raised, and it was from this point the invading force reembarked for Buffalo after the failure of their plans.

The second gives a general view of Waterloo village, which comprises the larger portion of the settlement known under the general name of Fort Erie. In the distance can be seen the ruins of the old fort, and nearer are the ruins of the Michigan railroad depot, burned by the mob some years ago. The building bearing the United States flag is the house of the American Consul. Many exciting scenes occurred here during the invasion. It was continually thronged with the people of the vicinity seeking protection. The British camp was pitched on Sunday in the fields in the rear of the village.

[This sketch we had not room for in the present number.—ED.]

Sketch the third gives a view of the lower portion of Waterloo village, with the action in progress between the Fenian force of some 700 and the Canadian volunteers 80 in number. The Canadians came from Fort Colburn with 70 Fenians, captured there in a skirmish, bringing them on the tug Robb. Finding the coast clear, the most of the party, after reaching the dock, went on shore, when they were suddenly surprised by the Fenians, who were returning from Limestone Ridge. Part of them regained the tug and escaped, while some 40 took refuge in the old tavern to the right of the dock, and were subsequently made prisoners. Over the woods to the right was the Fenian camp.

The fourth gives an idea of the country and disposition of the forces on the two sides at the opening of the battle of Limestone Ridge. There was a change in the ground before the close of the fight.

No. five I sketched from the face of a dead Fenian, found in a secluded place near the battlefield. He was said by some of the prisoners to be a New Yorker, and very prominent in the movement.]

THE WIFE TO HER ABSENT HUSBAND.

LINGER not long! Home is not home without thee;
Its dearest tokens only make me mourn;
Oh! let thy mem'ry, like a chain about thee,
Gently compel and hasten thy return.
Linger not long!

Linger not long! Though crowds should woo thy staying,
Bethink thee, can the mirth of friends, though
dear,
Assuage the pain, the grief, the long delaying,
Costs the fond heart, that sighs to have thee
here?
Linger not long!

Linger not long! How I shall watch thy coming!
As evening shadows stretch o'er moor and dell,
When the wild bee has ceased its busy humming,
And silence hangs on all things, like a spell?
Linger not long!

How I shall watch for thee! when fears grow stronger,
As night grows dark and darker on the hill;
How I shall weep! when I can watch no longer—
Oh! art thou absent—art thou absent still?
Linger not long!

Yet I should grieve not, though the eye that seeth thee
Gazeth through tears that make its lustre dull;
For ah! I sometimes fear when thou art near me
My cup of happiness is all too full!
Linger not long!

Haste, then, oh! haste unto thy peaceful dwelling,
Haste, as a bird unto its own loved nest—
Haste, as the bark, when tempests wild are swelling,
Flies to its haven of securest rest!
Linger not long!

Behind the Scenes.

THE last scene of the last act had closed, and the brilliant tragedienne, Miss Eleanor Orme, had won to herself all that enthusiastic admiration which an American audience is so ready to accord.

It was her first appearance, after an absence from the stage of some six or seven years, and with most of the men and women who crowded the little theatre she had been an old favorite.

A half-dozen different stories of some domestic unhappiness had aroused the sympathy of hundreds, who could evince it in no other way than by this one spontaneous outburst of welcome back to her old life. Few actors, fewer actresses, had ever received such an ovation—if we may be allowed the term—as was our heroine's that winter night, ten years ago. No marvel, then, that her cheek glowed and her eyes flashed, as she received, again and again, a tribute of praise so justly her own. Wrong, injury, shame, might have been her lot in those past silent years. No matter; here, certainly, she was at home, beloved and welcome.

Once, only, as the curtain fell and hid her from all curious eyes, she curled her lip in a bitter smile, and muttered, hoarsely: "Unwomanly, immodest! Let them taunt me so! They forced me to it."

Then, a few moments later, she had summoned her carriage, and entered it. There was a trifling delay, during which a gentleman followed her, and closed the door behind him. Miss Orme was no coward; but a companion in her drive to her hotel she had neither expected nor desired. Leaning forward, as the carriage passed under the light of a street lamp, she scrutinized the face of the intruder. With a stifled groan, she sank back. The gentleman, if we are to call him such, coolly offered her a smelling-bottle. She noticed neither him nor his attention.

At last, the man broke silence.

"So, I have found you, after all, Ruth Fenton, and in the last place I had expected. 'Time goes by turns.' I'll have my triumph yet, as you have had yours to-night."

He paused a moment, but she did not answer; then, laughing derisively, went on:

"You have been studying of late, I see, my dear. You are quite perfect in your art."

His cool, contemptuous manner stung the woman into answering:

"Be careful! Ruth Blount has the right upon her side, and will make you rue this heartily."

"Aha! so it's that which rankles. Let me see. Eleanor Orme, Ruth Fenton, Ruth Blount. The first is too sentimental; the last, too matter-of-fact. I rather like Ruth Fenton best; and so Ruth Fenton it must be—ay, till your death-day."

He bent over her, and laid a heavy hand upon her arm. She flung it from her as if it burned into her flesh. The carriage stopped before the private entrance of the ——— Hotel. The woman was the quicker of the two; she was out upon the landing before her companion could prevent her; the door opened and closed upon her as if by magic; and the man was left to recover from his surprise alone. He stared at the tightly-closed door, gave a long, low whistle, and strode rapidly down the street.

The next night, and for many nights following, Eleanor Orme kept her engagement punctually. She had never played so well; her impersonation was faultless, and each appearance but added another laurel to those already her own. And each night, also, from behind the curtains of his private box, a dark-browed man kept watch. Never once did his eyes wander from the tragedienne to any other one upon the stage. If she were out of sight, he leaned back and closed his eyes; the moment she reappeared they opened and fastened upon her. If he charmed her into looking that way, the man's dark face lit up with a triumphant smile; the smile deepened into a sardonic grin if ever she faltered or changed color beneath his steady gaze.

By-and-by, rumors of this little by-play began to float about, mingled with strange stories of Miss Orme's difficulty in entering and leaving the theatre; how her steps were continually followed and dogged by a brutish fellow, in a policeman's dress; how she changed hotels and boarding-places almost daily. The occupant of the private box began to attract almost as much attention as the "tragedy queen" herself; conjectures as to whom he might or might not be were frequent and various. The manager—who professed to know all about it, but kept a mysterious silence—rubbed his hands and thought how fine a thing it was to have a little real tragedy mixed with the imitation.

One night, however, he was forced to change his opinion rather suddenly. The orchestra had gone through the overture an unusual number of times; the audience were getting noisely impatient; still no Miss Orme appeared. There was nothing left for the poor gentleman but to explain matters as best he could; as he ended his little speech he glanced significantly toward the empty box on his left. Instantly every eye and every glass in the house was leveled in the same direction. The effect was just what the manager desired, and he congratulated himself on his lucky escape from public disapprobation. Possibly there were a few who left the theatre that night who did not feel as if they had been looking into a neighbor's private parlor, and had had the door shut in their faces.

Where was the actress, and where was the man who watched her? The morning papers were out with a pretty little fiction, under the head of "Strange Disappearance," and working on, from the fact that Miss Orme had left her rooms at her usual hour of going to the theatre, and had been seen within a dozen blocks of that building, substituted a "brutal murder" as a conclusion of the tale. No trace of a murder, however, could be found; and the public were left with the mystery unsolved, mourning, perhaps, the requisite "nine days" over the wonder and the loss of their pet actress.

"WILL she live through the night, doctor?" The woman asked the question, wearily, pushing away the heavy hair from her temples as if its weight oppressed her.

The kind old man hesitated a little before answering, looking pityingly down upon the little sufferer.

"It is hardly possible, madam; but if she lives through this night, the immediate danger will have passed.

The woman lifted the covering, and looked tenderly upon the tiny, broken, bandaged limbs; looked—until the tenderness faded away, and a glowering, bitter hate settled in her great eyes. "Curse him! curse him!" Dr. Wall shuddered, and buttoned his coat. This was no ordinary woman, who had summoned him the day before; her child's death would would have no ordinary grief for her. There was something more; something fierce, and dark, and dread, that lurked behind her manner; something within her past, which had made her strange as she seemed.

"Are you going so soon?" She sprang up and touched his shoulder, pointing anxiously to the little bed.

"I can do nothing more, and there are others who need me."

"But, Lulu may die! I should be alone—afraid!"

"Afraid! madam, of your own child?"

"Yes, yes, my own child—my Lulu, my baby!"

All the mother's agony of grief burst out in that one despairing cry. She sank down by her child, and buried her face in the pillow. Dr. Wall had stood by many a death-bed; he had never witnessed pain so fierce, so life-absorbing, as this. And he pitied her so—not the injured little one, whose life was ebbing surely away, but that young mother, so alone in the desolation of her sorrow. That she should have had husband, brother or friend to stand by her now, he did not stop to think. He bent over the poor, bowed head, and stroked it softly, tenderly, as a father would his child's.

"My poor sufferer, take courage; I will send you some one, that you shall not be alone. And you are not alone now. One is with you who knows all your grief; think that, and trust Him."

She looked up thankfully, took the kind hand between her own, and kissed it reverently. "Bless you," she said; then fixed her eyes with a patient look upon her baby's face, and took up her silent watch.

The little child, whose faint breath scarcely stirred the shining curls which clustered about its face, was not more motionless than she. The old man saw this and went out. Half an hour later, there was a slight tap at the door, and without waiting for a bidding to enter, a woman opened it and came in. "Nurse Miller," she said, by way of explanation. With a quiet look at mother and child she crossed the room, and sat down at some distance from them. The watcher at the bedside bowed, and tried to smile; then turned her face away, jealous of anything which kept her gaze from her Lulu.

The night wore on; the clock of a neighboring church-tower tolled out the hours—"Eleven, twelve;" the nurse sat nodding in her chair, the candle flickered, and the fire burned low; still the mother never moved. "One, two;" there came a change. The dainty eye-lids quivered, opened, and a pair of blue eyes looked out. A sudden upflinging of the little arms, a strange contortion of the baby-face, a broken cry: "Mamma—Pedro—Mamma!" and all was over. One moan, and the mother's forced strength and calmness gave way; she sank down, unconscious, where she had kept her faithful watch. Nurse Miller sprang to raise her, but was pushed aside, and a man stooped over the unconscious form, raised it in his arms, and carrying it into an inner room, laid it upon a couch.

"Her, first," he said, fiercely, coming back, and pointing to the mother.

The nurse had needed no second bidding; to recover life was better than to care for the dead, and scarcely she noticed, as she entered the inner chamber, that the man, whoever he might be, followed and closed the door upon her. She remembered it, when, having seen her patient restored to apparent consciousness, she came out to perform the accustomed offices for the dead child; she remembered it, when, coming to the little bed, she found only the impress of a baby form. The man was gone, and he had carried away the corpse!

How long she stood wondering, in her surprise, she never knew, but a touch upon her shoulder roused her. She turned her head, to encounter the frightened, searching look of the poor mother's eyes—those "awful eyes," she called them afterward. The two women confronted each other; question and answer hung between them, unspoken, with a tragedy written in that short, fearful gaze.

The touch upon Nurse Miller's shoulder tightened to a clutch; and to the hoarse whisper, "Where?" she faltered out: "The dark-faced man has taken it."

The mother heard the answer; perhaps she knew it before it came. She neither "moaned nor uttered cry;" only the face grew white and rigid, the teeth set, the eye glittering. Then she moved away. Quietly, as if she were preparing for a pleasant walk, she tied on her hat and cloak; quietly she went about the room, and gathered a few trinkets, which had been the child's; with a smile as quiet as it was despairing and unnatural, she bade the nurse good-by. The latter, poor soul, was too bewildered to offer any expostulation. Indeed, she scarcely knew what was done, until she found herself alone, and realized how the mother had gone out in the early morning, half-crazed and unprotected.

Shall I go on and tell you of the wearying search, the fruitless journeys, here and there, which that determined and half-frantic mother made before she gained her object, or with one single picture close a life so dark and sad?

The spring flowers had begun to blossom, when, late one afternoon, a woman, travel-soiled and foot-weary, plodded along the highway toward the little village of Norfolk, M——. Between her and the hamlet she was approaching, a country graveyard lay. Pausing to rest for a moment, her eyes fell upon the simple monuments, gleaming in the light of the setting sun. She grew strong again, as she gazed upon it, and passed on rapidly and eagerly. She gained the place, entered it, and began searching, here and there, among the trees, stooping low to read the inscription over each little mound. A sudden turn revealed a spot which had been hidden from her sight before by the thick-growing trees. Back flashed the light to her eye, the color to her cheek, the smile to her lip, as she gazed. There, beside a tiny grave, with his face hidden in his hands, knelt a dark-haired man; sob after sob shook his strong frame, and died off in a wail upon the cool spring air. There was a rustle of a woman's dress, a whisper in his ear. He sprang up and faced the intruder. Ay, face to face, life to life, they had met at last—man and woman, husband and wife. Only a child's grave lay between them.

Slowly the woman's hand upraised.

"A life for a life—the father for his child!"

A flash, a quick report, and Robert Fenton sank lifeless at her feet.

"So am I revenged."

They found her there, the officers of law, beside her dead, quiet and impassive. To their demand she surrendered herself without a murmur. Tried, found guilty by her own confession, and sentenced to death, she lay in her cell waiting execution.

The chaplain came to prepare her as best he could for the solemn fate before her; to him she told a little of her story.

Trained for theatrical life, she had been loved and wooed by a young aristocrat; him she married, and entered his proud family only to be treated with distrust and indignity by all its members. Her child was born, her Lulu; and at last, fearing it would be taken from her, she had deserted her husband and fled with it. He followed, overtook her, and reclaimed the child. Helpless she was, and poor. Money was all-powerful, money would place her beyond her persecutor's reach. So she went upon the stage again.

As a lover, Robert Fenton had not been too proud to woo the beautiful actress, but as his wife, even though she had renounced his name, he vowed she should never live that life. So he followed and tormented her. One night there came a message that the child, whom he had sent into the country with its nurse, for safe hiding, had been fatally injured. "A carriage accident," was all the message explained.

Perhaps a father's love for his child made him thoughtful of the mother, or he might have known her little one's danger was the only thing which could divert Ruth Fenton from her purpose. So he met her with tidings of the accident.

The rest is told—save how the law was cheated of its victim. The morning sun struggled through the prison bars, and they came to make her ready for death. Lo! Death whom they thought to herald, was before them; and only there was left to place the poor worn body in its humble coffin, and to give it the few rites allowed a criminal.

Among the papers of the murdered man was found a marriage certificate, bearing the signatures, "Robert Fenton" and "Ruth Blount;" also a few business letters addressed to Miss Eleanor Orme. So the mystery was solved.

MR. A. J. DAVIS, the voluminous writer on Spiritualism, says that "the spiritual world is made from life-points sent out from the chemical coalition of the planets."

"LET HER RIP!"

A BABY swaddled in Old-World menace,
Rocked on the crossing of old feudal steel,
She spurned the bauble of the despot's mace,
And through stern epochs teethed in war or weal.
"Let her rip!"

She grew to nationhood, and dared to blunt
The lion's claws, and spat upon his lust;
She bore no Old-World type, no borrowed front,
She stirred no lumber from its noxious dust.
"Let her rip!"

There came a time when Harlots clapped their hands,
When, fever-pulsed with war, and sick with slain,
O'er blasted fields and peace-deserted strands,
The shadow of her fall grew big amain.
"Let her rip!"

They howled their scorn, they bastardized her birth,
And all their hate flashed forth from its eclipse;
She smote them dumb, and shook the blood-stained earth
With mighty thunders from her grand young lips.
"Let her rip!"

There came a time when Mercy blanched her brow,
Erst passion-knit with war, and black with ire,
And earth stood still, and nations stopped to bow
Before the art that tempered Right with fire.
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!" She needs no swaddling bands,
No kingly craft, no diplomatic swathe:
The might of Right is sceptered in her hands,
Her heart is throbbing with the pulse of faith.
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!" No Old-World lore she needs;
She made her bosom, when her tongue was dumb,
An arsenal of truths, that, wrought to deeds,
Shall shatter kingdoms in the time to come!
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!" Beneath her tongue of brag
Enough of strength her mighty muscle finds
To split the bosom of the Old-World crag,
And toss its fragments to the quartered winds.
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!" Her freedom-welded car
Before the Future's golden portal waits;
Lo, velvet-chested Peace, rough-shod for war,
Her God-sped courser stamps without the gates.
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!"—with iron sandal'd foot
Tread out the leaven of the Old-World scorn—
Plow deep, with war-tired wheel, a bloody rut
From ice-bound pole to desolate Cape Horn.
"Let her rip!"

Ay! "Let her rip!" When battle-cries shall cease
To galvanize the corpse of Old-World might,
That home-made cry shall flood the earth with peace,
And surge a torrent from the rock of Right.
"Let her rip!"

Maggie's Beau.

"IT is bitter cold to-night, with sitch a cuttin' wind blowin and drivin' in a body's face," said Farmer Mayfield, coming into the large kitchen, taking off his great coat, and shaking the flakes of snow therefrom. "'Pears to me I'm getting the rheumatiz, or it is awfully cold in here."

The farmer walked slowly to the old fire-place, piled the logs, covered with tufts of gray and emerald moss, together, while the red flames went crackling and roaring up the great chimney. A smile went flickering over the good-natured face, as he spread out his sun-burnt hands to catch the genial warmth. It was a cozy-looking apartment, for all its plainness: a strip of gayly-colored rag-carpet lying before the fire-place; two large rocking-chairs, in one of which his better-half sat, busily engaged in knitting; in the other end of the room a large cupboard, while beside it was a little table, on which was piled a few dainty books, their bright bindings in odd contrast to the plainness of the apartment, the fire casting golden rings of light around the room, tinging it, as the sun does an olden picture.

At last his wife broke the silence; raising her brown eyes to her husband's face, she said:

"Well, Reuben, I suppose Maggie's enjoying herself fine to-night among those grand city folks?"

A smile came into the lips, and danced in the farmer's eyes, as he rubbed his hands gleefully together and replied, quietly:

"Yes, I s'pose so."

"Were you at the post-office, Reuben?"

This time the knitting ceased. There was no reply, only that same quizzical look in the dark eyes.

"Reuben, I say," almost shouted the dame, "were you at the post-office?"

The farmer could restrain himself no longer, and throwing himself back in his chair, burst into a hearty laugh.

"I'd like to know what this means?" said the lady, her voice waxing louder. "But I'll see, sir, I'll see;" suiting the action to the word, she went to the chair where her husband's coat was drying, thrust one hand into a deep pocket, eager to grasp its contents.

The sly farmer was there before her, saying:

"Softly, dear," holding up to her angry gaze a dainty white letter.

"To think, Reuben, that you would treat me so; git a letter from Maggie and never tell me, when I have been almost dyin' to know about that 'ere weddin'."

"Just wanted to tease you, mother, a little, that is all," growing quite repentant as he saw her damp eyes, while he patted the still rounded and rosy cheek.

It seemed as if he never would get to that letter; first he drew a table near him, put the large brass candlestick thereon, snuffed the candle, put on his spectacles, warmed his hands, and then rubbed them together, looked at the letter, took his knife out of his pocket, cut it very carefully—for it was a principle of his never to tear a letter open—as he observed to Mrs. Mayfield, "It looked kind of wasteful-like."

All this was very provoking to his good wife, who looked ready to cry, but the brave little woman went quietly on with her knitting. It was evident to her dyed teasing her, for around the good-humored mouth was lurking a provoking smile.

"Comin', Tabithy, comin'!"

So a small sheet of paper was slowly unfolded. The wife kept herself in a listening attitude, laid her knitting down, and was all expectancy.

The farmer coughed, glanced upon the paper as though he was going to read, then, with letter in hand, walked to the fire-place and commenced poking the huge logs that were crackling and blazing there.

"Well, if you sin't the most provokingest man I ever see!" burst from her lips.

Which seemingly gravelly, he began reading:

"MY DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER—You have not written me; yet, fearing you had forgotten, I write you. I am enjoying myself finely; the wedding is over and we are all discussing it. You know I was first bridesmaid, and Mr. Simonton was first groomsman. Cousin Grace was beautiful, dressed in white satin, with orange blossoms in her golden hair, and her cheeks as rosy as the red apples that grow down by the garden fence. Her white veil almost swept the floor. I never was so delighted at anything in my life. We have been riding and walking around Boston, and I am charmed with the Bostonians. Uncle John and Aunt Betsie are very kind to me, and send their love. I shall be home next week in time for Christmas. Your loving daughter

"Boston, Dec. 1863.

"Hum! hum!" went the wife, rocking back and forth. "Maggie was always good at composition"—that is a very beautiful letter."

"It were," repeated the farmer, solemnly, after a pause, folding up the letter and placing it in the envelope. "I s'pose Maggie will be thinking home a city beau."

"Some city fool!" responded his wife, indignantly, "with tassly-touches, a cane, and paler'd kid gloves, like the feller that was at Deacon Jayne's last summer."

Maggie Mayfield was the only child; strangely graceful for a girl that had never been ten miles from home until she went to Boston to see cousin Grace married. A merry, laughing girl, superior in intellect and ability to say about her; the favorite of all the young men for miles around who admired, and in their admiration did see forget her father's brood acres and waving fields of grain. The village idolized their lovely daughter; and truly she was a sweet flower.

Well, Maggie came home. It was a bitter cold day—the ground covered with crisp snow—the biting wind blowing and whistling around the old house—the leafless trees, with their bleak branches waving to and fro. Desolate and chill looked the world that day. The old stage stopped; the driver reined up his horses, clambered down from his seat, dropped his chilled hands together, drew the red comforter closer to his blue nose, then, with a low bow, extended his hand to Maggie, who, gathering up her bundles, was quickly over the crisped snow into the great kitchen, and was soon clasped in the arms of her parents.

"To think I should her mother, kissing the cold cheek—"to think of your comin' home this cold day! why, child, how could you look?" taking the warm ermine hood, edged with snowy fur, from off the fair oval face, and the warm cloak from off the slight shoulders, and stowing them carefully away in the spare room.

"Maggie can't get warm, mother," spoke the jolly old farmer; "you're in the way."

"Sure enough, Reuben, so I am; why, what can I be thinkin' about?"

"Absent city bean, I guess," a twinkle in the great laughing eyes.

A scarlet blush overspread the girl's face, flashing even to her hair, and dying away in a crimson spot on either cheek.

"Why, has anybody been here?" was the eager question.

"No, no, Maggie—only old Mrs. Flinn, come for some of these yellow-streaked apples."

The girl laughed—a rippling, musical laugh, like water-drops as they fall over golden-tinted shells. A weak later, one beautiful star-lit night, when the skies, like so many spirit-pearls, looked down upon the old homestead, sheltered by the quaint, leafless trees, Maggie bustled to and fro in the spare room, building a fire in the dark fireplace, making the red flames cast fantastic shadows on the white wall, while her hands were busy fixing two large yellow candlesticks on the mantel-piece—an old heir-loom, highly prized by its prudent owner; then two curiously-carved shells were brought from their hiding-place and laid on a mat of strangely-wrought wool, a relic of her Boston visit; then she pulled the stiff-starched cane-bottomed chairs away from the wall; placed a large tidy of snowy-white over the back of the wooden rocker; put some twining sprays of green over the looking-glass; then stepped back pulled a pleased expression, as she surveyed the neatly-arranged apartment, and hastened away to array herself. She looked exceedingly pretty as, half an hour later, she came into the kitchen, her neatly-fitting crimson merino displaying the fine figure, the dark wavy hair rolled off the white forehead, and some scarlet flowers twined with the curls. Certainly very pretty she was, "looking just like a picture," as the farmer said, approvingly, to his wife, who nodded assent, while she went on paring the great red apples, the pride of Reuben Mayfield's orchard.

It may be that you wonder what was on the pipin. Nothing more than, upon this Thursday night, Mr. John Charles Simonton, her particular escort while in Boston—at least so she perfumed note he had sent her said—was going to call. An event of great importance in the eyes of its young mistress.

"Now, Maggie," said her mother, laying down one of the aforesaid apples, "you must be very polite, and don't say anything unless he talks to you; that's the way I did when Reuben used to come to me."

"Pears now, to me, it was just the other way, mother; you did the talkin', and I said 'Yes' and 'No!' That's a pity glimmer for, for around the good-humored mouth was lurking a provoking smile.

"Comin', Tabithy, comin'!"

So a small sheet of paper was slowly unfolded. The wife kept herself in a listening attitude, laid her knitting down, and was all expectancy.

The farmer coughed, glanced upon the paper as though he was going to read, then, with letter in hand, walked to the fire-place and commenced poking the huge logs that were crackling and blazing there.

The girl laughed—a rippling, musical laugh, like water-drops as they fall over golden-tinted shells. A week later, one beautiful star-lit night, when the skies, like so many spirit-pearls, looked down upon the old homestead, sheltered by the quaint, leafless trees, Maggie bustled to and fro in the spare room, building a fire in the dark fireplace, making the red flames cast fantastic shadows on the white wall, while her hands were busy fixing two large yellow candlesticks on the mantel-piece—an old heir-loom, highly prized by its prudent owner; then two curiously-carved shells were brought from their hiding-place and laid on a mat of strangely-wrought wool, a relic of her Boston visit; then she pulled the stiff-starched cane-bottomed chairs away from the wall; placed a large tidy of snowy-white over the back of the wooden rocker; put some twining sprays of green over the looking-glass; then stepped back pulled a pleased expression, as she surveyed the neatly-arranged apartment, and hastened away to array herself. She looked exceedingly pretty as, half an hour later, she came into the kitchen, her neatly-fitting crimson merino displaying the fine figure, the dark wavy hair rolled off the white forehead, and some scarlet flowers twined with the curls. Certainly very pretty she was, "looking just like a picture," as the farmer said, approvingly, to his wife, who nodded assent, while she went on paring the great red apples, the pride of Reuben Mayfield's orchard.

It may be that you wonder what was on the pipin. Nothing more than, upon this Thursday night, Mr. John Charles Simonton, her particular escort while in Boston—at least so she perfumed note he had sent her said—was going to call. An event of great importance in the eyes of its young mistress.

"Now, Maggie," said her mother, laying down one of the aforesaid apples, "you must be very polite, and don't say anything unless he talks to you; that's the way I did when Reuben used to come to me."

"Pears now, to me, it was just the other way, mother; you did the talkin', and I said 'Yes' and 'No!'" with a sly glance for, for around the good-humored mouth was lurking a provoking smile.

"Comin', Tabithy, comin'!"

So a small sheet of paper was slowly unfolded. The wife kept herself in a listening attitude, laid her knitting down, and was all expectancy.

The farmer coughed, glanced upon the paper as though he was going to read, then, with letter in hand, walked to the fire-place and commenced poking the huge logs that were crackling and blazing there.

"Well, if you sin't the most provokingest man I ever see!" burst from her lips.

Which seemingly gravelly, he began reading:

"MY DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER—You have not written me; yet, fearing you had forgotten, I write you. I am enjoying myself finely; the wedding is over and we are all discussing it. You know I was first bridesmaid, and Mr. Simonton was first groomsman. Cousin Grace was beautiful, dressed in white satin, with orange blossoms in her golden hair, and her cheeks as rosy as the red apples that grow down by the garden fence. Her white veil almost swept the floor. I never was so delighted at anything in my life. We have been riding and walking around Boston, and I am charmed with the Bostonians. Uncle John and Aunt Betsie are very kind to me, and send their love. I shall be home next week in time for Christmas. Your loving daughter

"Boston, Dec. 1863.

"Hum! hum!" went the wife, rocking back and forth. "Maggie was always good at composition"—that is a very beautiful letter."

"It were," repeated the farmer, solemnly, after a pause, folding up the letter and placing it in the envelope. "I s'pose Maggie will be thinking home a city beau."

"Some city fool!" responded his wife, indignantly, "with tassly-touches, a cane, and paler'd kid gloves, like the feller that was at Deacon Jayne's last summer."

Maggie Mayfield was the only child; strangely graceful for a girl that had never been ten miles from home until she went to Boston to see cousin Grace married. A merry, laughing girl, superior in intellect and ability to say about her; the favorite of all the young men for miles around who admired, and in their admiration did see forget her father's brood acres and waving fields of grain. The village idolized their lovely daughter; and truly she was a sweet flower.

Well, Maggie came home. It was a bitter cold day—the ground covered with crisp-snow—the biting wind blowing and whistling around the old house—the leafless trees, with their bleak branches waving to and fro. Desolate and chill looked the world that day. The old stage stopped; the driver reined up his horses, clambered down from his seat, dropped his chilled hands together, drew the red comforter closer to his blue nose, then, with a low bow, extended his hand to Maggie, who, gathering up her bundles, was quickly over the crisped snow into the great kitchen, and was soon clasped in the arms of her parents.

"To think I should her mother, kissing the cold cheek—"to think of your comin' home this cold day! why, child, how could you look?" taking the warm ermine hood, edged with snowy fur, from off the fair oval face, and the warm cloak from off the slight shoulders, and stowing them carefully away in the spare room.

"Maggie can't get warm, mother," spoke the jolly old farmer; "you're in the way."

"Sure enough, Reuben, so I am; why, what can I be thinkin' about?"

"Absent city bean, I guess," a twinkle in the great laughing eyes.

A scarlet blush overspread the girl's face, flashing even to her hair, and dying away in a crimson spot on either cheek.

"Why, has anybody been here?" was the eager question.

"No, no, Maggie—only old Mrs. Flinn, come for some of these yellow-streaked apples."

The girl laughed—a rippling, musical laugh, like water-drops as they fall over golden-tinted shells. A week later, one beautiful star-lit night, when the skies, like so many spirit-pearls, looked down upon the old homestead, sheltered by the quaint, leafless trees, Maggie bustled to and fro in the spare room, building a fire in the dark fireplace, making the red flames cast fantastic shadows on the white wall, while her hands were busy fixing two large yellow candlesticks on the mantel-piece—an old heir-loom, highly prized by its prudent owner; then two curiously-carved shells were brought from their hiding-place and laid on a mat of strangely-wrought wool, a relic of her Boston visit; then she pulled the stiff-starched cane-bottomed chairs away from the wall; placed a large tidy of snowy-white over the back of the wooden rocker; put some twining sprays of green over the looking-glass; then stepped back pulled a pleased expression, as she surveyed the neatly-arranged apartment, and hastened away to array herself. FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

THE BRIDE'S DEATH.

THERE is a little flower which grows wild, or with little care, in the gardens of southern France, which the country folks call by a name which is best interpreted, "The Bride's Death."

It is a little, blue, frail innocent thing. Yet, if you ask the reason of its name, any peasant girl in Languedoc will tell you the same story.

There dwelt, within sight of the Rhone, years ago, an old chemist and his daughter. He was a German by birth, but had married a French woman, and since that day dwelt in her native land. His name was Werner. His daughter's, Antoinette.

She was a very handsome girl, and since her mother's early death had been the ministering spirit of her old father's humble dwelling, and was beloved by all the village.

She had a singular disposition, generally merry and good-humored, but when aroused to anger utterly ungovernable, until she had in some way punished the offender, and with her a quarrel was never made up with tears and kisses, as with other girls. It was a lucky thing she was provoked very rarely.

Being beautiful, and, in peasant's eyes, an heiress of some importance, even the dread which was generally entertained of old Werner, on account of his mysterious chemist lore, did not keep suitors from the door.

But Antoinette looked coldly on all the sterner sex, until one summer evening the young magistrate of Grenoble was brought by fate to break his arm at Chemist Werner's door, and to be nursed back to health and strength by the old man, who was as cunning a leech as any in all Languedoc.

It had been a dangerous illness, owing partly to the heat of summer and the fever that the young marquis had been drinking much more wine than was good for him, and the recovery was quite a marvel.

The youth was properly grateful, and would have rewarded the old man with money and costly gifts.

These being declined, he bestowed upon the chemist and his daughter his friendship, and became a frequent guest at their little home.

Soon he declared to Antoinette that he was miserable save in her presence, and that she possessed the power to make happy his heart.

She was a warm-hearted, passionate creature, and after his several of love, every day found the handsome marquis nearer to her.

For his sake she decked herself in holiday attire, for his sake her dark and beautiful black hair that glittered like jet in the sunshine.

Nothing she did but was done with a thought of him, and he, with his high position as her wife, she foresook her old companions, and took to studying the speech and manners of those above her, until the village gay vigorettes into which she had fallen were quite unlearnt.

The girls of her village were sorely vexed by this, and many a scandal-monger would whisper many a taunting glance given toward the chemist's beautiful daughter as she passed the cottage doors.

Antoinette knew of them all, but she thought of her triumph when she should be at last Madame la Marquise, and bore the grace.

It was enough for her that young Grenoble held her brown head so tenderly in their secret rambles by moonlight, and that each flattering thought of her beauty and her goodness.

She trusted him as she would have trusted an angel, but, alas! the handsome youth was only a very faulty mortal.

At last his visits to the cottage became rarer; finally they ceased; and Antoinette, horror-stricken, heard a rumor that he was about to marry a beautiful young lady of his own rank within the next month.

She wept and trembled, but refused to believe, and finally sought an interview with the young marquis.

She met him on the road near his chateau, and he paused, and seemed to confront her.

"This is not true they tell me?" panted Antoinette. "You are not betrothed to that blue-eyed baby? You love me, you love me, and love so often told me? They are slandering you—are they not, Grenoble?"

And she looked up into his eyes lovingly.

The youth put his arm round her waist.

"If they are, Antoinette, they are true, my life," he said. "To be sure, my family insist that I shall marry Mademoiselle Amande; but what of that? I have another chateau, and you and I may yet be friends."

And he kissed her.

Antoinette looked to it; she made no indignant protests, only from her black eyes glittered sheathing lightning.

In a moment more she made him a courtesy and turned from him. What she thought he could not guess.

She said not one word. Perhaps he thought little of her, for his wedding-day drew near, and his young bride engrossed his thoughts.

He came at last, and was beautiful a morning as ever smiled on France, and every one in the village crowded toward the church to witness the ceremony, and the women all wondered maliciously what Antoinette would do now.

For the girl had disappeared at dawn, dressed herself in her scarlet bodice and gold cross and ear-rings, and went out beside the river.

It was said by many that on that same pale, blue, tiny flowers were yet in bloom. Of these she plucked a fragrant handful, and carried them into her father's laboratory.

She remained there an hour; then, with her bouquet, took her place at the church porch, to await the coming of the bridal party.

They came at last. And when the bride, in her white veil, crossed the porch, Antoinette stepped forward:

"Wear these, gentle lady," she said. "One bestows them who has loved also."

And she put the flowers into the bride's fingers.

The lady received them with a smile, and they were in her bosom when she knelt at the altar. She had never heard of Antoinette, and the gift and the speech pleased her. Besides, at that day the flowers had never been called "Bride's Death," but only "Bride's Beauty."

The ceremony went on—the holy words were uttered. It was time for the bride to rise, but she did not move.

They spoke to her in vain. The bride-groom bent over her.

"She has fainted!" he cried, and the group of friends pressed about the beautiful girl.

They lifted her and bore her to the air. Alas! she had not fainted. She was dead!

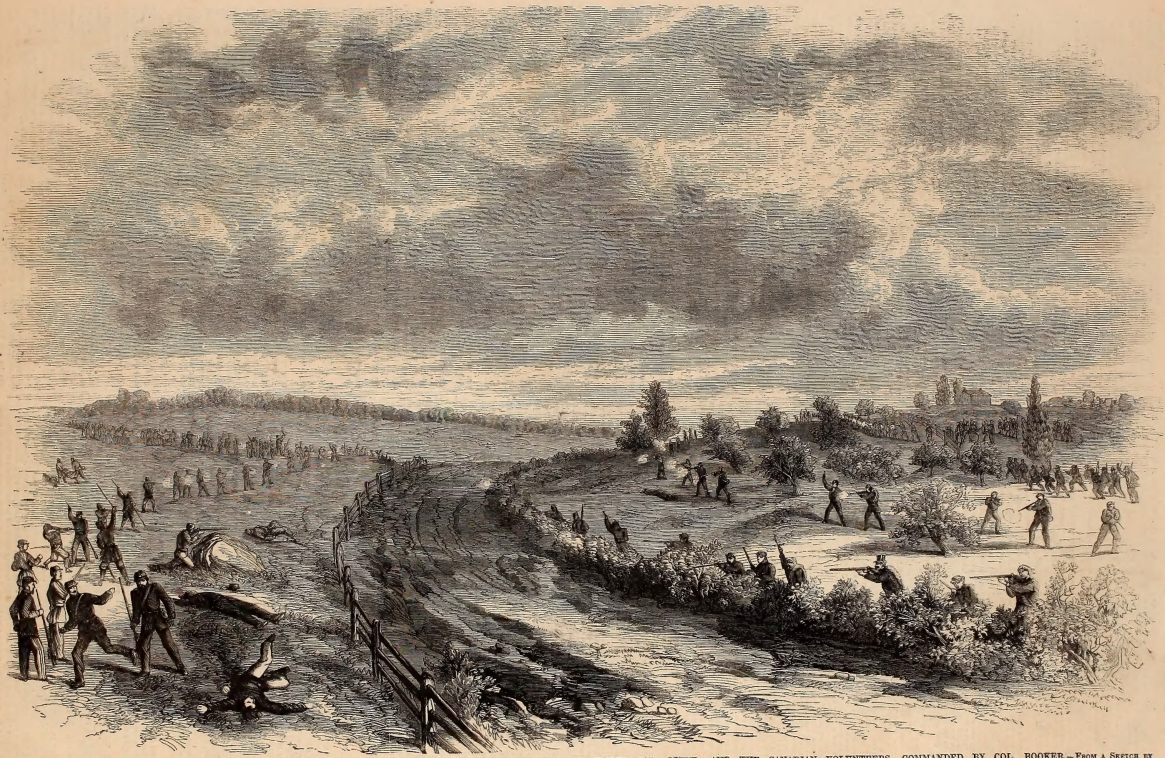
The consternation that was given, the excitement spread to the peasants at the porch. They who knew the story of Antoinette's slighted love began to speak of the flowers. Until then they had lain in the dead bride's bosom.

Now a celebrated Italian physician stepped forward to remove them. As he did so, a strange, subtle aroma struck his senses, and he flung them from him.

"They are poisoned!" he cried. "The bouquet has murdered her! It is an art the Germans understand. Arrest the woman who gave them to her!"

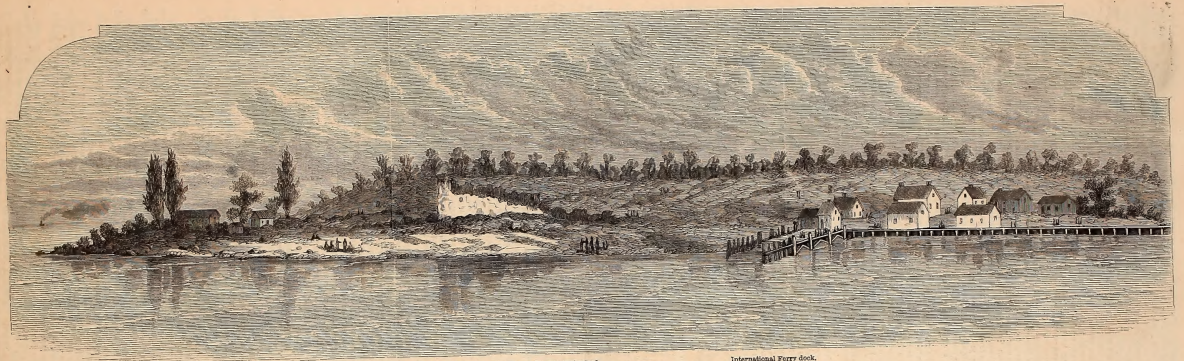
Search was made for Antoinette, but she had vanished; and when the gens-d'armes sought her cottage, it was empty.

The chemist and his daughter were never seen again, but from that hour the pale blue flower, which is the first to bloom beside the Rhone, was called no longer "Bride's Beauty," but "Bride's Death;" and it would be a hard matter if one of greatest ill should the least bud or blossom be found among the flowers bestowed upon a bride in Languedoc.



THE PAINTER'S DREAM.

"I DREAMT," said Sir Godfrey Keeller to Pope, "that I was dead, and soon after found myself taken into a narrow hall by two men very like Silk, smug pretty equally on each side of it. Before me I saw three, at a great distance, a band of people coming round it, I walked on toward them. As I drew nearer, I could distinguish St. Peter by his keys, with some others of the apostles. I observed him studying the people as they reached the door. When I had joined the company I could see several were left behind, and took my station with the entrance. As the first person approached for admittance, St. Peter asked him his name, and then his religion. 'I am a Roman Catholic, quoth the spirit. 'Go in, then,' said St. Peter, 'and sit down on those seats there on the right hand.' The next was a Presbyterian. He was admitted, too, after the usual questions, and ordered to take up upon the left. A Quaker came next, and as I appreciated, St. Peter very civilly asked him to walk in. 'Friend,' said the Quaker, 'excuse me, I will not.' Like, who was standing by, turned round to me, and exclaimed, 'Now, Sir Godfrey, what the famous Sir Godfrey Keeller, from England?' 'The same,' I replied. 'Let your quality in,' said Like. So Like immediately drew near to me, embraced me, and conducted me with much ceremony through the gate, as followed in his wake. He ordered so far on the subject, that he seemed almost to have forgotten the business for which I came thither. At last, however, he recollected himself, and said: 'I beg your pardon, Sir Godfrey; I was so taken up with the pleasure of conversing with you, that I forgot the object of coming into my you be at?' 'Why, truly, sir,' says I, 'I am of no particular religion.' 'Oh, sir,' says he, 'that will be no good, then, as to walk in and take your seat where you please.'" The dream here terminated, as I had been fathered on David Hume and others who came within the same category of unbelievers, and—Like me—believe the above to be the original version.



RESULTS OF MODERATION IN DIET.—Health and longevity are said to be the only results of moderation in diet. His patience is far from being limited to the body's best effect on the mind is still more valuable. Julius Cæsar, constitutionally addicted to excess, when relieved on some great exploit, was accustomed to maintain his diet to an extent truly marvelous, and to this diminution he ascribed the clearness and energy of mind which distinguished him in the field of battle. When extraordinary mental vigor was desired by the great Napoleon, he used the same means to keep it. To his rarely-equaled moderation in diet Dr. Franklin ascribed the "calmness of ideas" and "clearness of perception," and considered his progress in study proportionable to the degree of temperance he used in his food. While Sir Isaac Newton was composing his "Principia Mathematica" he lived on water and bread and a little cask and water. Scarcely less rigid was the abstinence of Leibnitz, when pursuing the principle of his "Universal Language." D'Aubigne relates of Luther, on the authority of Melancthon, that "a little bread and a single herring were often his only food for days." Abstinence has sometimes been recommended as even after he had found out that heaven was not to be purchased by penance, he often entertained himself with the poorest food, and would continue for a considerable time together drinking no other than water. Charles, a celebrated physician, reduced himself from the exorbitant weight of 345 to 140 lb. by confining himself to a limited quantity of vegetables, milk, and water, as his daily food and drink. Dr. Cheyne writes forcibly on the health and of mental vigor, and, small professional task, himself experimentalized and recommended abstinence. An eminent man once made the remark, "that nobody ever repented of eating too little for his health."

COLONEL STANCE is the latest and greatest novelty of the season. It is made in pink, buff, the new green, slate, and other colors, and is the most pretty produced. Any article stanched with the new preparation will immediately be changed into the style we allude, but as it washes out, and the garment that was pink to-day will be white to-morrow, it is not to be recommended. It hardly say "dyed." It is intended especially for those who have been accustomed before using it to carefully wash out, and perpetrate their owners. If the pattern has been worn, they only wear the more conspicuous for the green stains; and they can be rendered one even and entire shade, thus becoming not unlike Joseph's coat, but very stylish.

THE latest "sensation" in England is the Rana Esculenta, a gigantic radish, from Java, and which is found to grow well in the insular gardens. Its roots are gigantic carrots, and the plants produce a profusion of blossom in short eight weeks, often making a growth of five or six inches in a single day. It is of a red color, only the pods, which often attain a length of seven inches, are green. It would be tied upright, as they produce from 12 to 20 pods each, growing in fantastic and irregular shapes. Eaten raw, the radishes has much the flavor of the most delicate radish, and is a great addition to a salad. When boiled, it is served up as a vegetable, and is equally delicious. Some have put forth a claim of the taste of early green pea added, but this is considered a good puffer. Seeds are sold at the rate of three for half-a-guinea, and seven for a guinea.

THE LAST MEETING.

On the topmost branch of a blasted pine
A raven sits in the dusk alone,
With eye intent on the tossing brine
And something white by the wave upthrown.

The tide comes creeping along the strand—
The raven croaks through the shadowy night—
While higher it drifts on the silvery sand,
And stonier gleams in the pale moonlight.

There's a shimmer of golden hair, and a face
That seems, 'neath the passing ripples to smile,
The white hand stirs with a tremulous grace,
And the calm eyes open and shut the while.

Time whirls away; 'tis the noon of night—
A wanderer roams on the lonely strand—
He pauses and looks; 'tis a fearsome sight;
Then he touches the brow and the snow-white hair.

That face, he knew it—that delicate form
He had known and loved when his life was blest;
Like a thief he had rifled its virgin charm,
Then flung it away like a worthless pest.

From the blasted pine hath the raven gone,
No more by the waves is that white hand tost;
But a grave was made at the morning's dawn,
And tears were shed for the loved and lost.

CHAPTER XVI.—A NIGHT OF STORM.

"RAYMOND, dear, do you know I don't like that man?" said Mildred, earnestly, as they sought the shelter of the little cottage.

"Yes, I do know it, my love," returned her husband, laughing. "You looked at him, when he thanked Mary Hill with his ugly face, very much as you would look at an ogre sharpening his teeth to devour a baby-feast. He is, however, only one of those unconfortable persons who take even their pleasures sadly. It is only charitable to suppose that he is something really estimable lying deep bid within such undemonstrative folds, which would exhibit itself, if an opportunity of sufficient value should occur to him. Under ordinary circumstances, they certainly appear more and disagreeable enough. But it is the poor lieutenant who is in trouble in earnest more than we. A couple of walks with this Mr. Stevens is the limit of our self-sacrifice; but to have such a vet blanket for a guest in one's own house, in weather like this, with the idea, too, which Carey has got hold of, that he is a coast-guard inspector in disguise—why, that is season's superstition, indeed, should think he would consider Friday next, which rids him of his guest, a lucky day."

"But Mrs. Carey don't think he is an inspector," observed Mildred, thoughtfully.

"Well, I hope not," laughed Raymond, "for I never saw her behave so frightful to anybody since that scoundrel, Lieutenant Topsell, threw the poor, half-drowned Newfoundland back into the surf last winter, and she declined to sit down to dinner with him. What does she think about this Stevens?"

"She scarcely knows what to think; but she has a half-suspicion that, instead of his being a coast-guard man, he is upon quite the other side. The landlord of the Crown is an obliging person, and stands very well with the lieutenant, but, as she thinks, without much reason, he has also endeavored to show himself a friend to the revenue upon more than one occasion; but his information has not led to a little luck. At the present time, it seems the Lucky Bay people have received a hint from other quarters that 'a run' is to be soon expected, upon a large scale, and, of course, if this be so, a spy such as Stevens in the enemy's camp would be invaluable."

"I should think so, indeed. But, Carey was too sensible a woman to entertain such far-fetched apprehensions," observed Raymond, carelessly; "but whether this gentleman be coast-guardsman or smuggler is no concern of ours, but of the revenue. We have nothing to do with these parts, I believe, up my mind to mix myself up with neither side. We have never bought a yard of lace or a bottle of brandy since we came to live in this part of Cliffe. If those commodities are to be got anywhere so cheap as in this hamlet of Sandby; upon the other hand, we have no business to look for them, that Simon Reeves has got a cellar under his hearthstone, or that Walter Dickson's boat has a false bottom. I think the new lieutenant made a mistake here, and which has entirely destroyed his usefulness. A priest of our religion would have been more welcome. And yet, to find himself blocked out of his own pulpit, on the very first Sunday, by negs of one sister! Can't you fancy old Reeves explaining in a whisper, from his clerk's desk beneath, that there was really no where else to put them for a day or two, and requesting his reverence to preach from where he was, instead of shifting?" Raymond roared with laughter at the idea; he was thus drawing, of a circumstance that had actually occurred but lately in the parish church; but Mildred scarcely smiled. Again and again her husband rallied her upon her silence and melancholy; and at dinner, when he toasted her lovingly in a full bumper, and made her drink a glass herself to the health of little Milly, she did contrive to call them off for a while; but afterward, as the evening drew on, and the storm increased, her vague forebodings once more seemed to take possession of her, and after one or two attempts to win her to cheerful talk, Raymond himself grew silent.

Conversation, however, was by that time rendered almost impossible by the violence of the rain, pattering against the windows, and beating with tremendous thuds upon the straw-thatched roof. After they had retired to rest, and Raymond had fallen asleep, and the waken lids of the little child in the cot by her side were closed in slumber, Mildred lay wide awake, consumed with shadowy fears. To be in the same room with one who could do some reapers to be more lonely than if quite companionless. There is something awful in the thought, that though the body is there, the soul for some compassion is probably far away; that the reins of that own being are out of his control; that he is separated from us, even from himself, as thoroughly, for the time, as though he were dead. The quiet breathing may indeed assure us that he lives: but the still, motionless, unconscious limbs irresistibly remind us of that time when those eyes will never open to gladden us more, or those lips bless us with gracious speech, when we shall be alone indeed, and all the sympathy that man can heap upon us will not avail to fill up the aching void in our hearts by ever so little, and when the best comfort that God himself can give us—or as it seems to us—is not even welcome—is to let us die, too. I doubt if it is usual for even the most-worldly-minded—the merest slave of scrip and share—to weep, under such circumstances, the same gross sob of contrivance that solely usurps his thought by day. He does not surely lie on his sleepless pillow with the true wife slumbers by his side, calculating still, like some horizontal triumph of Professor Babbage, without one thought of her who sleeps near, and the hushed world rotating without, and the stars with no accountant can number.

At all events, such was always a solemn time to Mildred Clifford, and would have been seldom more than it was, had it been terrible. The world was far from hushed, nor were the stars shining. The elements were at deadly strife, as we usually say, when the howling wind are only fulfilling His word; and except that the forces employed were far more prodigious, it resembled a battle between living men. There were pauses when the powers of the storm seemed gathering themselves together as after a repulse, and then with a more tremendous onset. Then the skirmishers—the sharp, thin, driving rain—were pushed forward in countless thousands, and the solemn artillery thundered from the heavens upon column, while the heavy guns thundered ceaselessly—the awful diapason of the sea! Then, in the midst, would blaze out a sheet of light which might well be taken for a trumpet sounding the overall, the legions of the air would grudgingly retire, and again there was a lull.

Mildred was no coward; but oppressed as she was by premonitions of evil, the viewless war that was raging without seemed to have a mortal affinity with the vague dangers that seemed to threaten within. Mechanically she stretched her arm over her unconscious child, as though to protect her from some imaginary foe. If heaven should send a fiery bolt, would it fall where it was committed to her; but how should she be able to fulfil it? It was not the apprehension of poverty, for she knew that she was well able to work and support the child, which struck a chill to her mother-heart; but the sense, should Raymond be removed, of the utter defencelessness of their position, and of the unswerving resolution of their moral enemy.

During the first year of her marriage, and while her husband was all in all to her, she was not thus haunted. Whatever else she knew, indeed, of the implacable disposition of Mr. Carey, she was well aware that the endeavors to discover their whereabouts were dogged, and that when found, some terrible vengeance would be immediately perpetrated. Still—suppose the very worst that could happen—Raymond, if they slew her Raymond—well, let them slay her also. It would not be difficult for one like her to die, having nothing left to live for. But now that little Milly, although Raymond was no dearer to her than he was, and that he could not be—yet how infinitely more precious was his life to her! How the sleep of her child filled with the sense of separation. How would she feel, then, when he should in reality leave his life for hers? Or, if he should survive the loss of him, though a sudden shrinking of the heart told her that such a thought had passed unbidden athwart it—how could she ever look to him, when he would in reality be absent? How could she ever seek another night of storm, when there should be no breast to receive her, whom she could wake with a touch, as now, and cry: "Raymond, I fear;" and straight be comforted?

Her husband had never left her for a single night before, and though the present absence beyond measure, although she could not explain it even to herself. The expectation of it had thrown a shadow upon her heart which had not heard of his intention of going to Marmouth, and had even saddened, as we have seen, the anniversary of their marriage. Yet, for more than two years since she had escaped from that dread slavery—from the woman who had claimed her very heart to dispose of as her own—she had learnt to breathe an atmosphere of liberty and love. For two years, her former taskmistress had been dead in her solemn grave—beyond the reach of schemes she had had was so certain as that the thunder-cloud should not lightning. But was it always to be so? Was not this present happiness too great to be enjoyed, notwithstanding that it was thus marred by her fears? Would not those fears be one day realized? And at what time was this more likely to take place than when Raymond and she were temporarily separated? Upon whom would the blow first fall?

An intermission longer than usual was taking place in the elemental war without; mutterings only were to be heard, as though the powers of the air were counseling together as to the point against which they should next direct their fury.

Suddenly, and yet with the naturalness peculiar to the situation—for nothing that occurs to our minds at such a time seems strange or to demand inquiry as to how it got there—suddenly, Mildred's thoughts reverted to Mr. Stevens. Why did Mrs. Carey dislike him so? A good woman, if ever there was one, was the lieutenant's wife, sincere and pure; and with a marvelous faculty of discrimination of character, which the poor sometimes possess—and which the rich and even children—as though the crystal soul shrank from the impure touch. Venice glass shrinks and proclaims the presence of the poison. As for herself, Mildred was aware of the want of foundation in her own suspicions, unexpected every stranger of boding them no good. That very Lieutenant Topsell, whom Raymond had spoken of that afternoon, she had disliked in some manner with their enemies; and indeed his merciless and cynical character seemed to have fitted him for the ally of her she feared.

But she had been mistaken in that case, and had done him a terrible wrong, who had since then met with his evil, and not discreditably for that matter, fighting against overwhelming odds in his lawful calling. But this Stevens, who had given no evidence of his evil disposition, why did she shrink from him, in spite of herself? Why had she shuddered to see his cold gray eyes riveted upon Raymond, and why did the thread-like sense of her husband on the morrow seem more and more unmeaningly, because he was to be accompanied by this same new portion of the way? She had no fear but that her Raymond would come back to her a match, for him, but his very strength and courage made him careless and unsuspicious; and, besides, what could the strongest arm avail against a deadly weapon?

While her mind indulged itself with this ghastly supposition—which by no means insensible of the extreme improbability of the event upon the fancy—the storm rose to a line-of-battle, and no matter how imminent it might seem, rather than let her suffer the heartpang of the meeting Mr. Stevens herself in the Mermaid Cave, on the morning afternoon, that might be considered afterward; sufficient for the day was the evil thereof, she well thereof. In the meantime, she had mentally arranged for Raymond's safety. Thus relieved from her more selfish anxiety, she lay still and wind keeping an armed truce, if not subsiding, tardy sleep touched her eyelids, as it had long ago seated itself upon those of her husband and child in the room. Mildred's spirit, too, was freed from the trammels of the flesh, and roamed, only God knows how far, among the stars, while her body she slept, a minute or an hour, she could not tell, but was awoke with a spasm of terror, amid the raging of such a storm as she had never before decided it seem but as the light winds that diversify the calm of summer. Were her companions dragged, that day through it? She took up the child into bed with her, and hugged it close, thundered down the chimney, and made the nightlamp flicker and flare, should snatch her from her arms, burst open the balcony outside—close outside their very chamber-room window? or a falling brick? or a—— "Raymond, Raymond, they are coming! Is the house-door?" at the top of her voice, she shrieked, while the shock her husband by the shoulder. The next moment he had started from his bed, and snatched something from beneath his pillow.

"Let them beware," he cried; "their blood be upon their own heads!" and he turned his head to his forehead, he added, more calmly: "I am not myself, Mildred. Did you call?"

"They are coming," said she; "do you not hear them? They have torn the door off its hinges."

I hear the rain beating and the wind roaring, Mildred. The door must have been blown in. I must get it shut, and put up the bar, or we shall be all wet through and drowned."

Putting on some garments hastily, he was about to leave the room, when he felt a hand upon his shoulder. Mildred, pale, and in dressing-gown, with the still sleeping child clutched in her arms, was standing beside him, making signs that she would go, too. Terror had deprived her of the power to raise her voice to the pitch necessary to make herself heard in that great tempest.

"I am not going to take the lamp with me," cried he, as she perceived he was obliged to use. "Never fear, love; I shall not leave you in the dark."

But she, like one stone deaf, only shook her head, and followed him down stairs to the little passage where the wind was pouring in like a flooded tide-race. The whole of the cottage rocked like a tree. It was not so dark but that they could see what had happened—the door of the little sitting-room had been driven in by the wrong side against the wall. Through the gap could be seen the steady light from the little Pharos above Lucky Bay: a cheering sight to Mildred, glad to feel that there were fellow-creatures there, up and about these usual task, and even countenancing to some extent the awful effects of the storm; perhaps, too, it reminded her of that Eye which, although we may not care to look for it in fair weather, watches us always, and in the storms of life, becomes as to heaven, and in the night of death is a star of hope.

"Hold this, dear Mildred; nay, your hand shakes; let me have it on this step."

Raymond put down the lamp he carried, and offering the wainscot, while his wife watched him from behind the angle, advanced step by step. Twice he essayed to leave the house-door in its proper position, and twice was borne back with it against the wall and brulled. The third time, taking advantage of a moment's lull, a lucid interval in the war of the storm, he managed to close the door, and put the bar up. Then they went over the little house, seeing that all was safe. The cook and housemaid were sitting up in their respective beds, with night-caps tucked behind their ears, as though the storm was an outrage of which they would not have missed a note upon any account, but both in tears. Mildred affected to laugh at their fears, and endeavored to reassure them; but when she once sought her own couch it was not to sleep. A new and totally unexpected cause of apprehension had now taken possession of her mind.

Why, for the first time during their married life, did her husband sleep with a loaded pistol under his pillow? What, too, had been the presentiment of imminent peril, or was he cognizant of some real danger, the nature of which he was concealing from her? Mildred did not dare to ask him the reply.

CHAPTER XVII.—INTERCEPTED.

PALE and haggard from her almost sleepless night across Mildred Hepburn, and wrote her note in secret and hastily snatched it to the appointed station by a trusty hand. The elements which had denied her rest were now at amity. The rain was over and gone, the winds were whispering already enough their favorite tune, "Over the Hills and Far Away," and the dark clouds, scattered and thinned, were carrying over a bright blue sky. Even she sea wore a smile upon its lips, still white and harsh, and strove to look as though its great green waves were only at play, without losing about for leagues upon their crests the fragments of men's fleeting homes, and not far down their drowned and mangled limbs. Those storms of course in day-time, but the Wind loves the night, and loves her black wing more often works its malice than in the day. The weather is like a healthy public opinion among men, seems sometimes unreasonable, but in the April morning, at all events, it showed no trace of malign fury, but seemed to delight in practical jokes, such as whisking the petticoats from the faces of farm (which considered itself inland) in twices as many places as their own spiral habits would have suggested, and then whistling them with the utmost gravity that they scarcely knew themselves from gulls; also, meeting with the round hat of Mr. Walter Topsell, and making so much merry at his expense by capillary attraction to the extreme back of his head, it tossed it hither and thither, and "skied" it, and whirled it "shrieval" in the broadcasted mob at a fair, and not like a blood-thirsty rabble present at the rapine and murder, as had been its behavior but a few hours before.

Nevertheless, these high-spirited proceedings of the zephyrs were far from relished by Mr. Dickson, and he was pleased, in the course of with his appointment of special messenger to Mrs. Hepburn, since it involved his visiting the coast-guard station. He would have done anything in the world for her, and indeed he was doing even now it is impossible for any gentleman who trades in lace and brandy—with a false bottom to perform service with cheerfulness when on his own personal contest with the guardians of the revenue. No one with any feeling would select from among all his acquaintances a mysterious pedagogue, even a receiver of stolen goods, to go on an errand for him to the sitting magistrates at Bow street; nor would Miss Hepburn have employed Peter Dickson on this particular mission if she could have helped it. But, in the first place, he was her nearest neighbor, and there was no time to spare, since Mr. Stevens was expected very early; and in the next place, the objection of being connected, openly or secretly, with the contraband trade, by against every man, woman and child in Sandby, who looked upon French brandy and Brussels lace as productions of their own island, and upon a coast-guardsman as the interloping foreigner. The high tariffs and prohibitories in those days was certainly an example of a law against which many men would have been free from sin; like the gamekeeper of to-day, it made of the innocuous effects, truncheons, blood-shedding, murders, as well as indirectly producing a general demoralization of all laws as a consequence. The ill-feeling thus engendered between the governed and their governors manifested itself with great promptitude, of course, in the latter, that is, between the actual violators of the obnoxious law and the parties whose duty it was to uphold it. A man who had served in a coast-guard-man as he would behave to nobody else who was his enemy. Sandby, even had wives and children of their own, to whom they longed that would be merciful, by preserving to them their breadwinner, had made several rescues of unknown orphans in that small colony at Lucky Bay before now with but small scruple. Even on a windy night, when the probable haul is considerable, so used to the cliff as Robert Deans, for instance, should have been blown over it, which happened to Farmer Giles, during a dead calm, and by a curious coincidence, on the very night when a large cargo was known to have been run within half a mile of the spot; or, even granting so much, out of an abundant charity, William Boyce, another guardian of the revenue, could scarcely have dogged him out on the seashore for himself, in which he was found dead one winter's morning, with only his hand above the snow.

Nor is it to be supposed that all the cruelty was exercised upon one side. There were men at Lucky Bay ready to stash with their cutlasses upon very slight provocation, and who looked upon a Guernsey shirt as a very pretty mark for a pistol-bullet. Worst of all, perhaps, informers insinuated the neighborhood, and sowed suspicion everywhere, making bad blood, even, where it should have flowed most purely in the veins of freemen. Writers who are not practically acquainted with troubles of this sort, generally fall into the error, when describing them, that, notwithstanding all crime or vices which may be generated by such a state of things, the courtesies of life, the ordinary relations of man and man, go on pretty much the same as under more favorable circumstances. But this is far from being the case. No war is carried on with that distinguished politeness which it presents in the cream-laid pages of the historian, and civil war least of all. When coast-guardsmen and smugglers met one another in the neighborhood, incidentally and during what I may call the intervals of business, they did not give one another "good day," if they spoke at all, they consigned each other's eyes and limbs to everlasting perdition. Even when engaged upon a lawful calling like the present Mr. Walter Dickson fully expected the roughest of receptions at Lucky Bay. A perceptible difference exists the most affable of medical practitioners, when a homœopathist enters the same room; a country magistrate addresses a poacher, even more cordially, in tones which he generally uses toward the cantos world rather than the human; and I think I have seen a clergyman of the Established Church look almost livid when brought into connection with Baptists. Similarly, Lieutenant Carey, although a most polite naval officer, was by no means favorable to the enemies of the Revenue. Moreover, as I have said, there was just now a rumor afloat of some proposal to that effect having been, or being currently committed upon his Majesty's customs in those parts, and it was not wholly out of the range of probability that he might suspect Mr. Dickson of having lent his lug to the Tempter on this occasion, as he had often been known to lend his ligs.

Altogether, if commissionaires had been an institution of Britain times, and Mr. Dickson had happened to find one waiting for an errand on so unpromising a thoroughfare as that between Sandby and Lucky, he would have preferred to send a message over the handsome guardon which Mrs. Hepburn had given him for his trouble, as well as something out of his own pocket, to get that letter taken to Mrs. Carey by other hands. He did not, indeed, find a commissionaire, but he found Mr. Stevens, who had started out with a cigar (and a good one) but before breakfast, a quarter of a mile or so on the Sandby side of the Look-out Station. Perhaps we shall not go far wrong in supposing that the object of his post of espial he had sent Mr. Dickson coming, and had purposely gone to meet him.

"A fine fresh morning, my good fellow," observed this gentleman, carelessly. "Was there much damage done at your place by last night's storm?"

"Not as I knows on," replied the messenger, gruffly; "but the fact is, I came away before my eyes were open; for the wind whipped my cabin with blowing the shingle off my roof, and when I should have had my snooze that's considered by me this to many to the preventive station;" and he held out the letter to Mr. Carey, at arm's-length, as a man does who has got a material grievance to expatiate upon.

"Well, as far as that goes," rejoined the stranger, "I can save you the rest of the trouble and welcome, as I am the guest of Lieutenant Carey at present, and I am going back to his house at once to breakfast."

"Well, you see, it's got 'private' written upon it," observed Mr. Walter Dickson, indecisively; "and you'll have to scratched his head with a tracedinary vehemence—" I have no great fancy for putting my head into that there hive yonder; even to deliver a letter, and that's the truth on it. I ask your pardon, sir; perhaps you may belong to them beamed 'Bluebottles'?"

"Not by friend," rejoined the stranger, laughing; "the very cigar I am smoking came to my lips free of the Custom-house. I am only here to look at some of your sea-sights—the Devil's Cavern, and so on. I came, too, recommended by mine host of the Crown"—here he ended his cigar, and looked cautiously about him—"which should be a passport—should it not?—to all free-traders."

"Perhaps it should, and perhaps it should not," returned the other, warily. "The coast-guard station is a queer place for an honest man to put up at: he don't trust the dog, you know, that lies in the same basket with the cat."

"And, yet, if he offered the no of his teeth to carry a letter," laughed the stranger, "I should think even the most cautious of rats might accept that service. By all means, carry it yourself, however, if you think it right to do so, and you should have thought that the word 'private' referred rather to the contents of the letter than to any partiality I had by which it was to be delivered."

"Ay, that's true enough, master, surely; and if you're going to breakfast with the lieutenant and his wife, it's like you'll have an earlier opportunity of getting her this here than, if, for them, the bottle's as ratin to keep me hanging about, and listening to their sauce, instead of taking in the best liquor."

"Very good," observed Mr. Stevens, quietly pocketing the note; "I will see that Mrs. Carey gets it at once."

He nodded carelessly, and, turning upon his heel, sauntered back in the direction of the preventive station; while Mr. Dickson, not displeased at having been spared the most unpleasant portion of his errand, walked lustily Sandy-ways, without once looking behind him. If he had entertained any suspicion of Mr. Stevens as a letter-carrier, and had kept his eyes turned westward for a few minutes, he would have remarked that that gentleman was a considerable time emerging from the little thicket which lay between him and the Look-out; this interval was spent in a manner which (besides the late Sir James Graham could have conscientiously commended. Nothing was easier than to untwist the little note, which had neither seal nor fastening of any kind, except that mould one conveyed by its superscription, "private," and the contents were his own (by appropriation) in half a minute.

"DEAREST MRS. CAREY: Pray beseech the lieutenant to accompany Mr. Stevens and myself in their walk this morning. This is a very silly request, I know; and yet I think you will grant it me, without further entreaty, if you respect the yours affectionately, MILDRED HEPBURN."

Mr. Stevens folded up the letter before and placed it in his waistcoat-pocket, with an unpleasant smile.

"No, Mrs. Raymond—Hepburn," soliloquized he, slowly, "I don't think that plan will suit me. Two in company—for a little way—but three is strong. Such a very fortunate chance that I was at the Look-out, and thereby able to anticipate that new arrangement!"

Mr. Stevens had not been the only person among the figure-heads that morning. Early as it was, Mrs. Carey had stepped out there with the intention of making her guest that the tea was "made," and had been an unseen witness to the interview between him and Dickson. This so greatly strengthened her suspicions of his connection with the smuggling interest, that she ventured to confide them to her husband. But from an inspection of coast-guard stations to the court of pills 'Will Watch, was too many points for the opinion of the lieutenant to veer round to. Mr. Carey, for his part, only began to admit the possibility of Mr. Stevens not being a direct emissary of the Admiralty, when the object of their discussion appeared coming up the little garden.

"Let us see whether he mentions having seen Dickson," said Mrs. Carey, in a low voice, at the moment their guest was seated at the breakfast-table.

Not a word did he utter about any such meeting, and very little about anything else. Ever and anon Mrs. Carey shot a glance of significance at her husband, as much as to say: "Did I not tell you so?" but the conversation languished. It was felt a relief by everybody when the meal was over, although the cause of that relief was of embarrassment to endure still, when Mr. Stevens observed:

"Carey, lieutenant, if you cannot be my companion for a longer walk, you will, at least accompany me half way to Sandby."

"I have Mr. Walter Dickson not say "No," albeit he was burning to have his talk out with his spouse concerning the character and intentions of their unbidden guest; but as Mr. Stevens satisfied with even dragging him half way, but compelled him to accompany him in the height corresponding to the Look-out, upon the Sandby side of the bay. There, in sight of Pampas Cottage, the stranger struck his forehead theatrically:

"Upon my life, Mr. Carey," cried he, "I believe I have left my cigar-case at home! I had a fine one mine: I have clean forgotten a letter which the messenger from Mrs. Hepburn entrusted to me in the first moment: pray, will you excuse me? But stay—I don't think you must open it, for you see it is marked 'Private.' I won't detain you another moment: pray, pray, do not open and make my humblest apologies; pray, do—pray, do!"

Mrs. Hepburn, watching in the little garden, had beheld, with a grateful heart, the appearance of the lieutenant with his guest upon the western bill-top; and her disappointment was extreme when she now saw the former shake hands with his companion, and, turning, commence his return journey. She even beckoned to him with her hand to come on; and although he took off his hat, when that had no effect on her, he only shook his head emphatically, and walked rapidly away homeward.

CHAPTER XVIII.—BESIDE THE BEACON.

MRS. STEVENS pursued his way to Pampas Cottage, and as he waited for the servant to answer the bell could not but be struck with her appearance by, as though he would observe: "I am a punctual man, you perceive. Not five minutes have elapsed, therefore, before Raymond and the stranger were climbing together the Down behind the Look-out, and Mildred Hepburn, alone in her room, was watching them, and fashioning with dumb white lips a prayer for her husband's safe return. At the top of the Down they paused and turned, standing up against the horizon very distinctly, and Raymond appeared to be earnestly kissing his hand twice, once for her, and once for little Milly, as she well understood it, then vanished over the brow of the hill, while her own fingers were yet upon her lips. Mr. Stevens lingered an instant behind him, and seemed to imitate her gesture mockingly, as if in some strange spectre of the Brocken. She had promised to meet this man on the morrow at the Mermaid's Cavern, and to his guide honoured; yet now fear was upon her, and his hand for herself, but everything for Raymond, and although she knew it not, she had good cause for fear.

The two men pushed swiftly on their way. There was not enough sympathy between them to make them slacken their pace for the convenience of conversation. They walked, rather, like the Alpine travellers who have hired a guide for sale, and about whom the professional guides they employ would, I should think, be very unwilling to express their own private opinion. When, however, they came to any remarkable spot, Raymond would pause, and courteously explain to his companion whatever of interest belonged to it. Their path lay almost always close to the verge of the chalk cliffs; but every now and then a huge cleft, riven by some convulsion of nature, or worn away by the constant action of some little river, would compel a detour. These sheltered spots, wooded for the most part to the very edge, with their green, sea-sod, were very lovely, but in the eyes of an inhabitant of the locality, their picturesqueness had but little claim upon his attention. They were all more or less used for smuggling purposes: not a boat lying up high and dry on the shore that tempestuous morning but had had, or was to have, a share in the foreign cargo—and about each there was a tale of adventure, and peril, and blood to be told, to which Mr. Stevens was not listening an attentive ear. The Downs themselves, with many a velvet hollow, met for the noiseless passage of the cloud-shadows, with their sheep feeding with peace, and shaggy with thorn, were by no means without their story. More than one of these green mounds could open the "barrows," or burial-places of the long-forgotten dead—some rifled of their contents by brutal curiosity, but others still intact, with the same earth upon the moldering bones which Briton or Saxon, centuries ago, had placed with pious hands above the dead. Many of these tumuli were invariably upon some lofty ridge, as though the closer wish of those beneath them had been to be laid within the sight and hearing of their homes, and fields, and the little world which they had known in life, could best be seen.

Some description of this sort Raymond made; but his companion only shrugged his shoulders, not seeming to appreciate antiquities, or the reflections awakened by them, so much as the tales about "Will Watch."

"What does it matter, when a man is dead," observed he, roughly, "where his bones are put to?"

"Salvage, true," replied Raymond. "Still, one has a fancy in these matters. One would not like to lie unburied, for instance, with one's bones picked whitened by the sun, and burning on a desert; or in the depths of ocean, tossing about with shell and sea-weed, and sucked by the cold lips of tooth less fish."

"You are fastidious, Mr. Hepburn," responded the stranger, hammering at the rounded turf with his walking-stick.

"If it be so to prefer land to water for a last resting-place, I am," returned Raymond. "It is a fancy, I believe, of my wife's. Still, I would like to be laid where my wife and child could come to look upon the earth which to them at least would be sacred; and, as I have told them, and as I confess I would rather find my last home where all the scenes around had been familiar to me during life."

"We have not all that choice," observed Mr. Stevens, coldly.

"Nor, I agreeable, cheerful companion this," said Raymond to himself. "I hope he is not going to be a dismal fellow during the time we live."

Almost immediately, and as though in answer to the unexpressed thought, Mr. Stevens stopped; and, with a countenance in which there was no good-by; he pointed with it to a dark object looming upon a crest of Down far in advance.

"What is that?" he inquired. "It looks like a—like a gallows!"

So haggard, so wild, and yet so menacing was the appearance of the object to which he made this inquiry, that Raymond might aptly have retorted, "And you look like a gallows-bird." But he only answered, quietly:

"For one who has no foolish fancies such as we were speaking of but now, you seem strangely moved by that object. It is genuinely black, and it is made of timber, but I never knew it taken for a gallows before. A beacon has stood in some shape or other there, on that promontory, which is one of the highest cliffs in the south country, for perhaps a thousand years. In the noble ages it dedicated to the warning fir and now whenever an invader threatened; it did good service. Now it is a mere mark for sea-boys to have sport with, and told with a tongue of flame when his great Armada made the deep yonder white with sunshine—but never before mistaken."

"Ay, he would have brought back the old faith," said Mr. Stevens, carelessly, but with a stealthy glance at his companion.

"I am a Catholic myself," answered Raymond, simply, "but I would not force my creed down a single throat, even at the point of the sword. In these times, as during the late war, the beacon is only used as a telegraph. Those wooden arms, which you see by it, as you say, so ghastly an appearance, have a vocabulary, when made to speak, of many hundred words, which, on a fine day, can be read from point to point, and miles away."

"Are there any people stationed there to work it?" inquired the stranger.

"No, not at present, but is pulled down where the semaphore men used to live, and at intervals," he suppose, by one of the most lonely places here about. From the sea it is totally inaccessible; the cliffs everywhere are sheer; and, except by clambering down their sides, I should doubt whether it is visited once a week by any human creature. If you would like to pass by it, however, it will not take us much out of our way."

"I should like to do so much," replied Mr. Stevens, briefly; "I have not been quite favored a beacon, nor even seen one before."

"Yet henceforth they call them 'Seesaws' force," observed Hepburn, laughing.

The fresh, clear air, the rapid walk, had worked with Raymond's naturally healthy anomalies, and put him in high spirits, which even the companionship of the sombre Mr. Stevens could not damp.

"You are pleased to be jocular, sir," responded that worthy. "In our north country such mirth is held to be a bad sign. 'Against ill-chance,' is said, 'men are ever merry.' We call it 'fey.'"

"Indeed!" responded Raymond, laughing still. "I never knew that a poor pun was held to bring bad luck; and yet I know the north country well, too."

"If thought you told me yesterday you were from the south," observed the stranger, gravely.

"I have lived in both north and south," answered Raymond, in some confusion. "Now, look at that beacon, and that chalk which runs to and from the beacon, like the outlines of a gigantic skeleton. game. Without them the coast-guardsman would have a dull time way at night; and, unless some cowardly scoundrel, for whom smuggler was far too good a name, arranged them after dark so that the passers-by thinking that he was only upon his usual beat, fell over the cliff-top."

"And was killed, I suppose?" inquired Mr. Stevens.

"Killed! Ay; if he had had nine lives he must have lost all before he reached the bottom. Whether a man fell from precipice upon sea or shingle, it would matter nothing: to him by the time he reached either. Sect the very rabbits in the warren there below left a space between their burrows and the hideous steep, and squat at a respectful distance, the poor victim's name is carved somewhere upon the cliff-top itself; yet here it is—a more fitting record of his fate, perhaps, in such a place, than any other mode of memorial:

ABRAHAM PRICE—peril——

The date is already erased by the wind and weather, but the rising took place but a very few years ago."

"But why peril?" inquired Mr. Stevens, with unwonted interest. "That is not the Latin for 'murdered,' is it?"

"Why, no—exactly, I believe," laughed Raymond; "but the fact is, the crime was never brought legally home to the wretch, although the whole country seemed to point him out as clearly as yonder arm is pointing to Calais."

The stranger looked up in the direction indicated by Raymond's cane, then staggered back, with his face pale as ashes. The grim black arm of the telegraph was grimly covering him, as a monster covers its mark.

"Well, for a gentleman who entertains no silly fancies, I must say you are easily frightened," observed Raymond, with some contempt. "Why, Marmouth Beacon is quite a scarecrow to you. I should have thought you were the murderer himself, instead of his victim, but that I happen to know he has paid the forfeit of his crime. He was the very man I was telling you of who was shot through the heart by Mr. Forrest in the second 'chine' we came to. His name was Peter Elliot. Take care where you are going to, sir, for heaven's sake. You are standing too near the edge, unless you have a very steady eye."

"I am never giddy from physical causes," returned Mr. Stevens, coolly, "although, as you have been good enough to remark, some things make me nervous. Do you mean to say that a man would have no chance of his life if he fell from into deep water, when the tide was well in?" "Not in the least instance."

"Not the very slightest," returned Raymond, confidently. "Where we are now, and for two miles, or more, and we can see nothing beneath us but a sheer descent, a few feet westward, and you may see in yonder precipice a considerable cleft, the sheer edge upon whose beetling edge we stand, in early days the haunt of the smuggler, sycophant-like, licks the huge white wall it slowly undermines. Beneath that cleft are caves, and there is scarce a foothold sure upon the ledges where the sea-birds breed, and the boldest gentlemen stand in ordered line, by scores and scores."

"Still, this very scoundrel must have fallen on the poor wretch you spoke of a greater chance; he would not, at least, have been dashed from the cliff-top to the shingle, as I see the depth there is said, I see."

"Nay," returned Raymond, "but you see no sand, and your mistake is a proof of the great danger which we stand. When the tide flows from here, so brown and small, is a beach of shingle, which would afford no more hope to a man, though he fell but one quarter of this distance, than the most ebb-tide would bear him out, to see; and yet——"

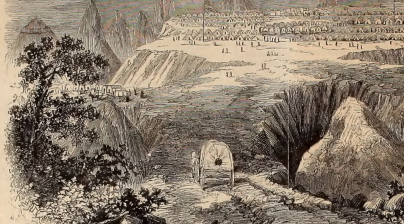
"Ay, what? You were going to say something. You think it was even in such a case magic yet be saved?"

"Not at all; I was calling to mind how, in this very spot, I saw the bird-catcher at work last spring. No less than five hundred feet in the face of that same precipice, with nothing but a rope of their own twisting to assist them, I saw one being drawn up with a young fulmar—the only gull—in either hand, striking his feet against the ancient wall, and bounding from it in the very air, as though he scorned even a foothold; and all that time he was having police to his mate upon the edge here, who merely held the kids with a firm grip, and waited for the birds to fix their feet upon their rope. The only difficulty that seem to find in the matter is at the last part of the ascent, when, the wretch, afraid, when I have by for themselves from the face of the precipice, in order to escape the beak of the bird, he has made this cliff-edge. No accident, indeed, happens, I believe, after the catching or snatching-point, but well has Shakspeare called it "dreadful trade."

"You interest me immensely," said Mr. Stevens; "I must have, then, these men's half-a-dozen folks beneath us, whose presence we know not of, above?"

"Not so to-day," returned Raymond; "the wind is far too strong for—— Lord have mercy upon us!" Shall I believe my eyes? Shall I be cursed with murder?"

With one strong push between the shoulders, the treacherous stranger had thrust his companion over the cliff.



He had fallen, of course, but not sheer; the wondrous instinct of his fall had somehow caused him, even in that instant, to twist round with his face, and not his side, toward the precipice; and in so doing, a few feet down, he had found, with his nails dug into the soft chalk, and his feet preserving for, and even contributing toward with them.

CAMP NO. 38, MINNESOTA.

THE recent outrages of the Indians in our Northern and Western States have compelled the formation of numerous camps in those portions of the Union. These are useful on many accounts, since they exercise a wholesome terror over the Red Skins, and are places of refuge and assistance to the emigrant trains. Our sketch represents one of these camps in what is termed he Bad Lands of Minnesota. Some of these taole-lands are two thousand feet above the evel of the Gulf of Mexico, and serve natural fortifications.

On the left is a train of emigrants on their way to the Far West, resting for a while before they resume their tortuous march to Montana or Idaho.

Our correspondent describes the scenery as being very sublime as well as peculiar, the plateau being surrounded by mountain peaks, which rise everywhere like church spires. The air is very bleak, the cold in winter being so intense as to freeze the quicksilver.

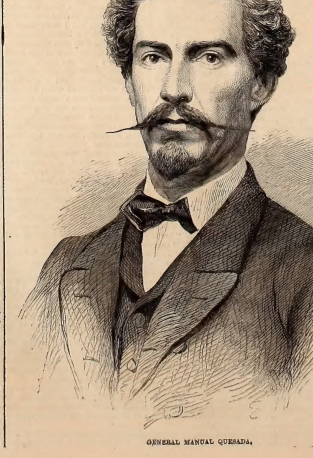
CAMP NO. 38, IDAHO TRAIN IN THE BAD LANDS, MINNESOTA TERRITORY.—FROM A SKETCH BY F. A. BRANDT.

GENERAL MANUEL QUESADA.

THE Mexican Republic, in its present struggle for national independence, like that of the United States in the late civil war, has developed the noblest traits of character in some of her soldiers, and brought to light the rarest qualities of head and heart. There, as well as with us in our terrible conflict for national life, we have seen men, before unknown to fame, rising from subordinate positions in the army, suddenly become leaders of singular merit, of great tact and valor. Sword in hand, they have thrown themselves in the midst of danger, leading successfully thousands of soldiers to victory, and in a comparatively short period achieving a reputation and a place among the world's bravest warriors. Today we present our readers a portrait of Gen. Manuel Quesada, one of the most active, successful and prominent generals of the republican army of Mexico.

Gen. Quesada was born in the city of Puerto Principe, in the Island of Cuba, on the 29th of March, 1833. At an early age he left his native isle to seek a livelihood, and try his fortune in Mexico. He took no part in political movements in that republic until the year 1858, when he espoused the liberal cause of his adopted country, and has proved to be one of its most faithful, valiant, and successful champions and defenders, defeating the French invaders at Tepeji del Rio, Fortin Arroyo Sarco, Calpulalpan, San Martin, Tesmelucam, &c.

The frequent dissensions between the invaders, and the church party or imperialists, and the liberals, afforded him vast opportunities to display his activity, intrepidity and capacity as a soldier, and he was promoted for gallantry to the rank of Colonel at the well-contested and hard-fought battle of Calpulalpan, and shortly afterward to that of General for his invincible valor in his brilliant and vigorous attack on Puebla. One of the actions that sheds most lustre on his military career is that of Palo Gacho, in the State of Vera Cruz, where the Mexican army for the first time met the French troops, and a few days later at Cruz Blanca fought against the invaders.



Gen. Quesada is extensively known in the republican army as a kind friend and excellent officer. He has been favored with the honorable medal of Zaragoza, and with that of the ever-memorable 5th of May, for the defeat of the French forces at Puebla, in 1863, and he has subsequently held with great credit the office of Governor ad interim of the several States of Tlascala, Coahuila and Durango. He is at present in this city, on a mission of great importance to the cause of Mexican independence and the welfare of a sister republic.

SHOOTING A GHOST.

IT is not very long since a belief in ghosts was quite prevalent even among educated people, and it is well known that the Puritans of New-England once thought it right and necessary to burn and exterminate witches and other disorderly characters. Of course the pranks and appearance of ghosts were due to the mischievous vagaries of ill-disposed persons, who thus imposed upon the credulity of the public, and sometimes involved themselves and others in very serious consequences. The occurrence referred to in our illustration took place in England in the last century, and resulted in the death of one person and the condemnation of another, who was afterward pardoned.

It appears that some one personating a ghost had for some time been frightening the people by appearing in the churchyard and pursuing those who passed by. Francis Smith, the subject of this sketch, doubtless incensed at the unknown person who was in the habit of assuming this supernatural character, and thus frightening the superstitious inhabitants of the village, rashly determined on watching for, and shooting the ghost; when unfortunately he shot a poor man, named Thomas Milward, a bricklayer, who was in a white dress, the usual habiliment of his occupation. This rash act having been judged willful murder by the coroner's inquest, Smith was committed to jail, and took his trial at the ensuing sessions at the Old Bailey, on the 11th of January.

The evidence adduced was, that the unfortunate deceased had quitted the residence of his father and mother only five minutes before he was killed; and that, as he was passing along Black Lion lane, the prisoner saw him and called out: "Who are you? I'll shoot you, if you don't speak." No answer was returned, and the prisoner then fired, and the contents of his gun struck the deceased on the jaw, and he fell down dead. The prisoner immediately went in search of assistance, but it was found to be too late, and he then surrendered himself into custody. It afterward proved that he had agreed with a watchman to go in search of the ghost; and that his only object was to rid the neighborhood of the visitor who had occasioned so much mischievous alarm.

GENERAL MANUEL QUESADA.

MONKEYS ATTACKING TRAVELERS

SOME of the larger species of the monkey tribe are rather formidable antagonists when enraged. Their affection for their young and for each other is well known; and instances are fully authenticated in which they have fearfully avenged insult and injury. The engraving on this page illustrates this trait quite clearly. A traveler in the East Indies tells us that, as he was passing through the country on one occasion, in company with the English President, several apes were observed on the trees around them. The President was so much amused that he ordered the carriage to be stopped, and desired his companion to shoot one of them. The attendants, who were principally natives, and well acquainted with the habits of the animals, begged him to desist, lest those that escaped might do them some injury, in revenge for the death of a companion. Being, however, still requested, he killed a female, which fell among the branches; letting her little ones, that clung to her neck, drop to the ground. In an instant all the remaining apes, to the number of sixty or more, descended in fury, and as many as could leaped upon the President's coach, where they would soon have strangled him, had not the blinds been immediately closed, and the number o attendants so great as, though not without difficulty, to drive them off. As it was, they continued to run after the servants for at least three miles from the place where their companion was slain!

COCO DE MER,

A Ceylonese Product

WHAT the bread-fruit-tree is to the Pacific Islanders the palm tree is to many Eastern nations, more especially the inhabitants of the beautiful island of Ceylon, where the cocoa-nut tree flourishes in the richest luxuriance. There are five varieties of the nut. The one called the king cocoanut is generally planted near the temples. The color of this is a bright orange. The other four vary from light yellow to dark green. The wonderful double cocoa-nut, from the Seychelles, has been introduced into Ceylon. In size, it exceeds greatly the common cocoa-nut, with the added peculiarity of presenting a double form. In the annexed sketch an orange is introduced to exhibit the extraordinary size of these singular cocoa-nuts, even after being deprived of the outward husk. Drifted by the waves from some unknown shore, this mysterious fruit was at one time believed to grow beneath the sea, hence its name of Coco de Mer.

A CINCALESE WITH HIS COMBS.

ONE peculiar custom of the Cingalese not only attracts the eyes of every stranger by its singularity, but presents a remarkable instance of the unchanging habits of an Eastern race. Seventeen hundred years ago, Ptolemy, speaking of them, alluded to the length of their hair, and a contemporary writer describes with minuteness their mode of dressing it: "Men," says he, "who inhabit Ceylon, allow their hair an unlimited growth, and bind it on the crown of their heads after the manner of women." Dr. Davenport, who has recently published a most interesting map of Ceylon, and whose sketch we reproduce, says: "So closely do the low-country Cingalese follow the manners of women in their toilet, that their back hair is first rolled into a coil, called a knot, which is fixed at the top of the head by a large tortoise-shell comb, whilst the hair is drawn back from the forehead à l'impératrice, and secured by another circular com

TOMBSTONE OF THOMA , LORD FAIRFAX,

In Episcopal Church, Winchester.

In the Episcopal Church at Winchester is a tablet to the memory of a nobleman, whose princely domains extended far and wide in the Old Dominion, comprising nearly six millions of a - ca.

Though a personal friend of Washington, and his early patron, the hero's first employment, at the age of sixteen, being that of surveyor on Lord Fairfax's lands, the nobleman, for adhering to the crown, was attainted, and all his lands confiscated.

He was born about 1695, and was the sixth Baron Fairfax of Cameron. Educated at Oxford, he chose a military career, and held a commission in the Horse Guards. He was, too, a man of letters and a wit, contributing several papers to the Spectator. Disappointed in love, he came to America to look after his estates which he inherited from his mother, the daughter of Lord Culpepper. He erected a beautiful seat—Belvoir—near Mount Vernon, and lived the life of an English country gentleman, doing, perhaps, more than any other to give that peculiar tone to Virginian society. He afterward removed to Greenway Court, near Winchester, where he pursued his fox-hunting and other field sports with unabated ardor, dispensing a generous hospitality, and spending half his time with his friends and horses.

When the news of the surrender of Cornwallis reached him, he called his body-servant, and said: "Here, take me to bed, I will die now!" and, in fact, he expired soon after. The tablet erected to his memory, with his name in a few places, are all that is left to remind us of America's greatest nobleman. A few score such as he might have changed entirely the character of American society and institutions. The inscription on his tablet is beneath his arms, and is as follows:

In Memory of
THOMAS, LORD FAIRFAX,
Who died 1782,
And whose ashes repose underneath this church.
His motto was
"Je le feray durrend ma vie."
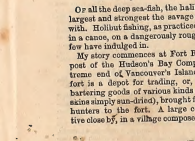
"I will do it during my life."

FROG EATING.—Frogs, at Vienna, are a great delicacy. Both the edible and the common frog are eaten; but the latter is much less esteemed, as the flesh is not so white. The hind-legs are in most request, two pairs of them coming about three coals. The fore-legs and livers are mostly used for soup. These poor animals are brought from the country, 30,000 or 40,000 at a time, and sold to the great dealers, who have conservatories of them. These are large holes four or five feet deep, dug in the ground, the mouth of which is covered with a board, and with straw, in severe weather. In the winter, during the frost, they never become quite torpid when in these conservatories.



SHOOTING A GROUSE.

A Day with Halibut.

Or all the deep sea-fish, the halibut is by far the largest and strongest the savage has to grapple with. Holibut fishing, as practiced by the Indians, in a canoe, on a dangerously rough sea, is a sport few have indulged in.

My story commences at Fort Rupert, a trading post of the Hudson's Bay Company, at the extreme end of Vancouver's Island; this so-called fort is a depot for trading, or, in other words, bartering goods of various kinds for peltries (fur skins simply sun-dried), brought for sale by Indian hunters to the fort. A large colony of Indians itive close by, in a village composed of wood-sheds, situated on a level plateau overlooking a bay, or, more correctly, a sheltered roadstead, named Beaver Harbor. A regular fleet of canoes are generally to be seen on the beach, of all sizes, from the war canoe, capable of carrying thirty fighting men, down to the sheil, paddled by girls and boys.

COCO DE MER.

I was the guest of the chief trader, and having expressed a desire to witness halibut fishing, it was arranged that my wishes should be gratified, as soon as the requisite negotiations could be carried out with the chiefs. The morning of departure arrived, and as I left the fort, and strolled down the slanting beach toward the sea, a quaint assemblage of disagreeable specimens of humanity preceded me, in novel procession—savages of every age and size, from the stalwart chief to the waddling brat, all eyes and stomach.

A chief, particularly a white one, in savagedom is great or little in an exact ratio to the amount of pat-a-lech (a word equivalent to the bak-shish of Eastern) he pays or gives for service rendered; being the trader's guest, and the presents being deemed highly satisfactory, of course the "Long Beard"—so they styled me—was on the topmost pinnacle of popularity.

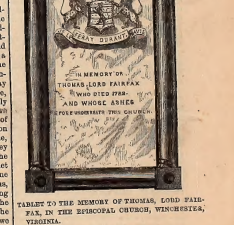
A large canoe, manned by four savages, awaited my arrival, and this being a special occasion, they were more elaborately painted than is usual. A brief description of one will serve to portray the other three. Tailors are entirely unknown in the land of the red skin. A small piece of blanket, or fur, tied round the waist, constitutes the court, evening and morning costume of both chief and subject. My crew were kitted with pieces of scarlet blanket. Imagine, if you can, a dark, swarthy, copper-colored figure leaning on a canoe paddle, his jet black hair hanging down nearly to the middle of his back, the front hair being clipped close in a straight line across the forehead. Neither beard, whiskers or moustache ever adorns the face of the red-skin, the hair being tweezered out by squaws in early life, and thus destroyed. A line of vermilion extends from the centre of the forehead to the tip of the nose, and from this trunk-line others radiate, over and under the eyes arms and back, the remaining being artistically arranged to give apparent width to the chest; the legs and feet being naked. A fine bag made from the skin of the medicine otter, elaborately decorated with beads, scarlet cloth, bells and brass buttons, slung round the neck by a broad belt of wampum, completed the costume of my coxswain.

The canoe was what is commonly called a dugout, that is, made from a solid log of wood. The cedar (thuya gigantea) is always used by coast Indians for canoe-making. The process of hollowing out a long and tedious, but when complete, the requisite bulge at the sides is accomplished by a very ingenious method. The canoe being filled with water, red hot stones are continually plunged into it until nearly boiling, then pieces of wood of various lengths are jammed athwart the canoe, and thus the sides are pressed out, and when cold retain the shape given to them. Nothing can be more graceful than the lines of the canoes used by the Fort Rupert Indians. Coiled round the sharp bow of the canoe like a huge snake was a strong line about sixty fathoms in length, made from the inner bark of the cypress, neatly twisted. Laying along each side extending far beyond both bow and stern, were two light spear hafts about sixty feet long, whilst stowed away in the bow were a dozen shorter spears, one end being barbed, the other constructed to fit on to the longer spear, but so contrived that the spearsman can readily detach it by a skilful jerk. Tied lightly to the centre of each of the smaller spears was a bladder, made from sealskin blown full of air, the line attaching it being about three fathoms in length.

I had hardly completed my investigation of the canoe, its crew and contents, when, to my intense astonishment, the chief trader was about to accompany me lifted me, as they would a bale of fur or a barrel of pork, and without a word deposited me in the bottom of the canoe, where I was enjoined to sit much in the same position enforced on a culprit in the parish stocks. I may mention, incidentally, that a canoe is not half as enjoyable as poets and novelists, who are prone to draw imaginary sketches, would lead the uninitiated to believe. It would be impossible to trust oneself in a more uncomfortable, dangerous, damp, disagreeable kind of boat—generally designated a "Fairy Bark"—that "rides, dances, glides, threads its silvery course, over seas, and lakes, or arrow-like shoots foaming rapids." All a miserable delusion and a myth. Getting in, unless lifted as I was, bodily, like baggage, is to say but an Indian is dangerous and difficult process; the least preponderance of weight to either side, and out you tumble into the water to a certainty. Again, lowering oneself into the bottom is quite as bad, if not worse, requiring extreme care to keep an even balance, and a flexibility of back and limb seldom possessed by any save tumblers and tight-rope dancers. Down safely, then, as I have said, you are compelled to sit in a most painful position, and the least attempt to alter it generally results in a sudden heeling over of the canoe, when you find yourself sitting in a foot of cold water.

We are off, and swiftly crossing Beaver Harbor, the beach grows indistinct in the distance; still the dusky forms of the Indians, the rough, gaudily-painted huts, the gleam of many lodge-fires, and streaks of white smoke slowly ascending through the still air, the square substantial pickets shutting in the trade fort, its roof and chimneys just peeping above all, backed by the sombre green of the pine trees, together presented a picture novel in all its details, wild and grand as a whole, such as Turner would have loved to paint.

A few minutes and we round the jutting headland, keeping close along the rocky shore of the island, glide past snug bays and cozy little landlocked harbors, the homes and haunts of roundface wild-fowl; soon we leave the shore and stand away to sea. The breeze is fresher here, and a ripple that would be nothing in a boat, makes the flat-bottomed canoe what a sailor would call unpleasantly lively. Save a wetting from the spray and an occasional surge of water over the gunwale, all goes pleasantly. The far-away land is barely distinguishable in the gray haze. No canoes are to be seen in the dark blue water, the only sign of living things—a flock of sea-gulls waging war on a shoal of fish, the distant spouting of a whale, and the glossy backs of the black fish as they roll lazily through the ripple. The line at the bow is uncoiled, a heavy stone enclosed in a net is attached as a sinker, a large hook made of bone and hardwood, baited with a piece of the octopus, a species of cuttle-fish, is made fast to the long line by a piece of hemp cord; then comes the heavy plunge of the sinker, and the rattle of the line as it runs over the side of the canoe, and we wait in silence for the expected bite. While so waiting, it may be as well briefly to explain, for the benefit of such as are not familiar with fish, what a holibut is.



The holibut is a flat fish, belonging to the genus pleuronectide of naturalists; it attains a very large size on these seas, from three to five hundred weight. Halibuts are common on the banks of Newfoundland, and are frequently taken by the cod-fishers; they are also found on the west coasts of Norway and Greenland, and it is stated are common around the coast of Ireland and Cornwall. In 1828, a holibut, seven feet six inches in length, three feet six inches in breadth, and weighing three hundred and twenty pounds, was taken off the Isle of Man. The halibut is a ground feeder; its favorite diet, small fish, crustaceans, and cuttle-fish. It spawns early in the summer.

A tug that came unpleasantly near to upsetting us all, let us know that a halibut was biting in the tempting morsel, hook and all. A few minutes to give him time to fairly swallow it, and now a sudden twich buries the hook deeply in the fleshy throat, the huge flat fish finds to his cost that his dinner is likely to seriously disagree with him, whilst in the canoe all are in full employ. The bowman, kneeling, holds on tightly with both hands to the line; the savage next him takes one of the long spears, and quickly places on to the end of it a shorter one, barbed and bladdered; the other two paddle warily. At first the hooked fish was sulky, and remained obstinately at the bottom, until continued jerks at the line ruffled his temper and excited his curiosity sufficiently to induce a sudden ascent to the surface—perhaps to have a peep at his progenitors. Awaiting his appearance stood the spearman, and when the canoe was sufficiently near, in he sent the spear, jerking the long haft or handle from the shorter barbed spear, which remained in the fish, the bladder floating like a life-buoy, marking the fish's whereabouts. The halibut, finding his reception anything but agreeable, tries to descend again into the lower regions, a performance now difficult to accomplish, as the bladder is a serious obstacle. Soon reappearing on the surface, another spear was sent into him, and so on, until he was compelled to remain floating. During all this time, the paddlers, aided by the line-man, followed all the twistings and windings of the fish, as a greyhound courses a coubting hare. For some time the contest was a very equal one, after the huge fish was buoyed and prevented from diving. On the one side the halibut made desperate efforts to escape by swimming,

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE.

WHEN the Empress Josephine was yet a child in the West Indian island in which she was born (Martinique or St. Domingo), an old negro sorceress, or Obi woman, predicted to her that she would take her first husband, undergo extreme misfortunes and trials, but would afterwards be greater than a queen, and yet outlive her dignity. Her prophecy was fulfilled to the letter. Her first husband, Count Alexander de Beauharnais, a general in the army of the Rhine, was guillotined during the Reign of Terror. She herself was in the greatest danger of the same fate, and escaped almost how the scene ends. Even then she mentioned the prediction to her fellow-prisoners, and was told by a female companion that she had gained some of them as ladies of the bedchamber—a post which the aforesaid Creole tried to confer on Mme. Lavalette. Sir Archibald Alison, when relating the story, says that the Obi woman's second prophecy in 1801, long previous to the divorce, was made known, from the lips of Countess of Bath and the late Countess of Avesmore, who were educated in the same convent at Bourgtheroude, and had repeatedly heard her mention the circumstance in early youth. According to some she had also told the prophecy was that she should die in a hospital. This was the word misinterpreted to signify Malmaison, where she breathed her last—a palace which, like our own St. James's, had once been an hospital.

Truly, says Shakespeare, "the whirligig of time brings in his revenges," and never was this more strikingly illustrated than in the fortunes of the Napoleonic dynasty. The first Napoleon repudiated the wife of his choice, in the hope of leaving his crown in the direct line to a son of his flesh. A son was born to him; that son, however, died and disinherited, and the grandson of Josephine sits finally on the throne of France.

A SILENCED CITY.—A correspondent gives the following description of the capital of the empire of Japan: "Yeddo, without exception, is one of the most odious in the world; streets broad and good, and the canals which intersect them in every direction, are bordered with stone quays. Two-thirds of the immense city are covered with ground like gardens. Within the inner enclosure the houses are of wood, and generally of one story. The palaces of the princes and nobles are palaces; and you may walk for hours, when once you are in the enclosure, for leagues. They are built in regular order, forming streets of palaces, every one of which is a palace. An immense courtyard, with trees and gardens, forms the entrance to each palace, and the dwelling is built in the house of the owner. The houses containing the followers, or guards, etc., form the outer enclosure. The streets leading to the courtyard are exceedingly handsome, of immense width, ornamented with copper and other devices. From the road that leads by the moat to the castle you see one of the finest views in the world, unrivalled seeing. On one side is the Gulf of Jeddo, with the trees and villages of picturesque beauty, and the more extended streets, extending as far as the eye can reach toward the mountains. The gardens of the princes, from one to five miles in the distance, far away beyond a thickly-built palace, are the most striking part of all, as that closer by the well-kept green banks of the second defense, with their several towers and gateways, and the moat, with grand old cedars, over a hundred years of age, shading the roadway, and the castle, with its high and ground, the water-lilies in the moat, the grandeur, good taste, and magnificence of the whole, form a scene that for some ways far surpass, anything I have seen in Europe or any other part of the world. Not a mendicant is to be in the country. The cottages were surrounded by neatness and beauty. The people are healthy, fine, well clothed and kept as any place in England. The same complaining and trouble exist in every land."

IT now appears that our iron-clads were provided with what are called "deck scrapers." These are made of steel, projecting sufficiently to clear away the nine-inch percussion shells, which are then exploded, without damaging the engines. Such was the case in the Dictator with wooden mos, and the force of explosion destroyed everything on deck, but left only a fragment of a shell out the chain-cable to run. This is the method which our engineers have proposed to capture our iron-clads by boarding them.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHY would a robber prefer robbing an old man's house to any other?—Because his gait (gate) is the least and his locks are few.

WHY is Gillot, the penmaker, the most wicked of men?—Because he makes men steal (steel) pens and then persuades them to forge (forge) (write).

WHY are cowardly soldiers like butter?—Because when they are exposed to fire, they run.

WHAT metamorphosis does a washerwoman undergo when her husband goes to bed a washerwoman, and gets up fine linen.

WHAT do you suppose led Alexander Selkirk to believe that Juan Fernandez was inhabited?—He saw, on reaching the island, a heavy cannon on the shore, and a ship-of-the-line lying off.

WHAT wind would a hungry sailor wish for as sea?—A wind which blows foul (fowl) and then drops.

WHY might sailors be naturally supposed to be little men?—Because they can sleep in their watch.

WHAT gives a cold, cures a cold, and pays the doctor?—A draft.

WHICH is the most indigestible supper you can eat?—The bolt the street door the last thing before you go to bed.

HOW can a boy make his jacket last?—By making his waistcoat and trousers first.

WHY is a roguish lawyer like a man who cannot sleep?—Because he turns on his side and then turns round and lies on the other, and is wide awake to the whole time, and even when dead he lies still.

WHAT is the difference between a spendthrift and a feather-bed?—One is hard up and the other soft down.

WHO was Jonah's tutor?—The whale who brought him up.

WHERE was beef-tea introduced into England in the Norman scale?—When Harry VIII. dissolved the Pope's bull.

WHAT fruit does a newly-married couple most resemble?—A green pear.

AT what time of life may a man be said to begin on the vegetable kingdom?—When long experience has made him sage.

WHEN may two people be said to be half-brothers?—When they have an understanding between them.

WHAT two counties in Ireland would you suppose to be lighter in weight than the rest?—Cork and Down.

WHEN rain falls, does it ever get up again?—Of course it does, in dew time.

WHAT stone should have been placed at the gate of Eden after the expulsion?—Adamantine—(Adam stin'd).

N. B.—Parties should be careful to observe our numbers, to address THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO., Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street, P. O. Box, 5,643—in full.

Country Clubs, Hotel and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands), of which are doing well, can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled; and in case of clubs, can have each party's name marked on their packages as directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey st.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars, had better send Post-Office drafts, or money will be necessary to save large per cent collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, for collection and delivery.

Our friends are getting up Clubs in most towns throughout the country, and for which we feel very grateful. Some of our Clubs send orders weekly, some not so often, but the latest keep a standing order to be supplied with a given quantity each week, or at stated periods. And in all cases (where a sufficient time has elapsed) Clubs have repeated their orders.

Commissions will be allowed each order from Washington Treasury Department Club:

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1866, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 561—VOL. XXII.] NEW YORK, JUNE 30, 1866. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 10 WEEKS $1 00.

The Fenian Lesson.

THE Fenian experiment of liberating Ireland through an assault on Canada has proved, for the present at least, a wretched failure. The probabilities are strong that the attempt will cost more lives at the hands of the executioner than did the late formidable Southern rebellion. The grand humanitarians who shudder with well affected horror at the remote possibility of hanging Davis, and were sensibly affected when Wirz was swung off, will string up the hundred or two enthusiastic Irish boys of whom they have got possession, with no more mercy or compunction than if they were so many rabid dogs.

We shall have no reason to complain. The men and boys who went to Canada took their lives in their hands. They played for a stake, grand in their eyes, and lost. They will probably die with the ecstasies of martyrs, and as such, will, no doubt, be regarded, in that near or remote future day when the aspirations of Irish nationality shall have been realized. It would be wise on the part of the British in Canada—for it was against them alone that the Fenians made war—to turn their prisoners free. But no such prescience, no such sublimity of mercy is to be expected of them," and by the probable exercise of a blind severity, they will provoke and precipitate their own ruin.

For, if this movement of not over one-half of the Fenians—this badly planned, headlong, blundering, and thoroughly Celtic onslaught of a distracted organization had not been checked by the interposition of the President and the authorities of the United States, it is as certain as the existence of the sun in the heavens that, at the moment we write, Canada would have been lost now nd forever to the British Crown. Had an effective lodgment been made when O'Neill first crossed the Niagara river—and it might have been made if any but an Irishman had been the leader—the forces of the United States, available for any such purpose, would have been insufficient to check the pressure of Irish reinforcements. Had the United States troops been called on to fire on the thronging invaders, nothing is more certain than that the balls from their muskets would have whizzed harmlessly in mid air. Not because they love the Irish, but because they have cause to hate England.

It is safe to say, and we know we are within bounds when we say it, that, had it not been for the President, Mr. Seward, Gen. Meade, the District Attorneys, and other Federal officers, and had it not been for extra-official and legally unwarranted arrests, and interferences with public carriers, and seizures of property without authority—we say, had it not been for these things, and notwithstanding Fenian disorganization, there would have been fifty thousand Irish soldiers in Canada at this hour. The Fenians were beaten this side the border.

Chile and Peru have survived our system of neutrality, which is sublime in theory, and only damaging to ourselves and our friends in practice. Mexico has been able to live in spite of it. But Feninism has succumbed. Its field of battle has been transferred from the shores of the St. Lawrence to the voting booths of our great cities.

We doubt if there is any great sympathy with the Irish in this country per se. The native American barely tolerates them; the demagogue wheedles them; the priests fleece them; the Germans, now dominating in the statistics of emigration, hate them, and between them and the negroes there is a deadly feud. If there is any general sympathy for them, it is a cross between that felt for Poland or "any other" oppressed nationality, and dislike, not to say detestation, of England. No one except the most unmitigated of demagogues pretends to any special admiration or regard for Ireland or Irishmen, except in the sense of opposition to England. Five years ago Fenianism could not have taken root in the United States, even among Irishmen. If tolerated now, in any degree, it is in view of the posture of Great Britain during the late war, and especially in view of the infamous conduct of Canada during the same struggle. The people of the United States are not so short of memory as to forget the ovation given to the pirates of the Chesapeake in New Brunswick; the immunity accorded to the incendiaries and murderers of St. Albans, and the toleration and sympathy openly and ostentatiously extended to the horde of assassins and conspirators who made Canada the base of their operations against the United States.

Canada is at this hour a dependency of the British Crown only and solely through the favor of the American Government. But for that the Fenians would have been before this in occupation of the country, and that, too, with the acquiescence of a large, if not the larger part of its population.

Let us suppose for an instant that, some time or another, through some infatuation of our people or Government, it should become an object of ambition to occupy Canada, or, in the course of events, an object of importance—how long a time, in the light of recent events, does any one suppose it would require to reduce the provinces, or, to use a euphemism, "reannex" them? If recent events have not shown that a mere suspension of the neutrality laws would accomplish the result, then facts have no significance!

MR. GEORGE PEABODY, THE DISTINGUISHED AMERICAN BANKER, OF LONDON, ENGLAND.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MAYALL, REGENT STREET, LONDON.

MR. GEORGE PEABODY.

We embellish our front page with a fine portrait of Mr. Peabody, from a photograph taken in London just before he left for this country. Mr. Peabody went to England in 1837, and established himself as a merchant and banker. His career has been a remarkably successful one, but he is mainly distinguished for his extensive charities, which have been so numerous and judicious as to make him one of the marked men of the age. His first large gift was a benevolent of nearly $100,000 to his native town of Danvers, for the purpose of founding a town library and institute. He likewise contributed largely to the first Grinnell expedition under Dr. Kane. In 1859 he gave $150,000 to found a scientific and literary institute at Baltimore, where at one time he resided. His largest benefactions, however, have been to the poor of London, in which city the most of his fortune has been made. These benefactions amounted in all to over $3,000,000, and Peabody's liberality has received the special acknowledgment of Queen Victoria in a graceful letter of thanks, enclosing her portrait. To elevate the condition of the poor by providing for them comfortable houses and rational pleasures, is his grand purpose, and he has inaugurated a system which, when extended and consummated, will revolutionize the social life of thousands who are now destitute and degraded. Mr. Peabody presents to the world the noble example of a man who accumulates wealth for the good of his race, and of himself he chooses of his own bounty, imparting his gifts with a prudence and discrimination that will make them a blessing to the world. Though past seventy years of age, he is still an active, vigorous man, with the promise of long years of usefulness and honor.

An Evening with the Roughs.

BY JAMES PARTON.

STROLLING up Broadway the other evening, we were roused from our reverie by the unusual appearance of things in front of Hope Chapel. That edifice was built, we believe, for a chapel, and is still occasionally used as such by some eccentric body of religious people on Sunday evenings. On week days, however, it is abandoned to the uses of the world, and any one may hire it, for any lawful exhibition, at reasonable rates. On the evening to which we allude there was a large gaslight about the entrance of more than ordinary brilliancy, and a large number of men and boys lounging near the door. At first sight it was that it was a political meeting; for the men evidently belonged to our Ruling Class—such as we see hanging about the City Hall when the Aldermen and Councilmen are in session, and such as do duty in torch-light processions at twenty-five cents a night, torches found, or fifty cents and find your own torch.

But, no; this could not be a political meeting. We were in the strawberry season, and politics do not come in until the fall. A person opposite the door informed the inquirer that the object of this gathering in Hope Chapel was to witness an exhibition of the Noble Art of Self-Defence. An eminent professor of the Noble Art was about to leave the Metropolis for Baltimore, where he was to meet in battle another distinguished professor of the same, and contend for a prize of a thousand dollars. The "sporting fraternity" were, therefore, invited to come and witness a specimen of his skill, and give him a good "send off" on the great mission. A long list of other eminent boxers had volunteered, and the occasion was to be one which no sporting man could be absent from without doing himself an irreparable wrong. In short—having never seen anything of the kind—we paid our fifty cents and entered.

The Sporting Fraternity does not appear to be very numerous. About two hundred persons were present, who half filled the pews of the chapel. They were diligent in the use of tobacco. Clouds of smoke ascended to the ceiling, and showers of expectoration descended to the floor. We noticed several long-haired, bull-necked men, who sat upright and silent, in pew-corners, and gave up their whole minds to smoking their short, black pipes. There were a good many young gentlemen who looked like upper clerks in dry-goods stores; these conversed knowingly upon the merits of illustrious prize-fighters, leaned forward to blow aloft coolest of segar-smoke. The company was better dressed than we had expected, and much more respectable-looking; and there was nothing but the smoking to indicate that the performance about to take place was one upon which a ban of disapproval is supposed to rest. In London, it is said, such exhibitions are attended by young noblemen, students of the universities, and rich old roués. There did not appear to be present on this occasion any such individuals. The spectators seemed to be about one-third of the barkeeper-politician class, one-third merchants' clerks, and one-third short-haired, bull-necked, red-faced men, who came to the surface in some mysterious way when there is a prospect of a riot.

The Sporting Fraternity, we fear, are not punctual. The performance, announced for eight, did not begin until nearly nine; nor did the company manifest any particular impatience. One young gentleman who stood near the door kindly volunteered to break the monotony of waiting. Assuming the authoritative tone of a policeman, he cried out: "Come, clear out of here! There was a general stir; and a few of the more nervous rose to their feet. But the joke was immediately perceived, a languid laugh ensued, and smoking was resumed. We judged from the murmurs of surprise present at the interruption of this nature, both real and sham, were something they were used to.

Toward nine, the whistlings and yells were beginning to be slightly imperative, a gray-haired man came forward upon the stage to the footlights, and bowed to the company. He was, perhaps, not a man of more than the slimmer of his own bounty, imparting his gifts with a prudence and discrimination that will make them a blessing to the world. Though past seventy years of age, he is still an active, vigorous man, with the promise of long years of usefulness and honor.

There was a general stir; and a few of the more nervous rose to their feet. But the joke was immediately perceived, a languid laugh ensued, and smoking was resumed. We judged from the murmurs of surprise present at the interruption of this nature, both real and sham, were something they were used to.

He was, perhaps, not a man of more than the slimmer of his own bounty, imparting his gifts with a prudence and discrimination that will make them a blessing to the world. Though past seventy years of age, he is still an active, vigorous man, with the promise of long years of usefulness and honor.

"Gentlemen, we shall begin the performance this evening as we begin life—with two minors."

Having said these words, he withdrew. Two newsboys entered, about eleven years of age, dressed in shirt and trousers, with their suspenders strapped around their hips, and wearing brown gloves. They were placed at bowing to the spectators, but it was too evident that their trainer had neglected this part of their education. The voice of the venerable sire, behind the scenes, was heard: "Time!" "Time!" The boys then advanced to the middle of the stage, shook hands, grinned, and "squared off."

In our total ignorance of the Noble Art, we are unable to say with what degree of skill these young gentlemen knocked one another about the head. We can only report that they threw themselves into the combat with very great energy, and bore their "punishment" with praiseworthy firmness. As they grew warm, they struck out wildly, and sometimes seemed disposed to clinch, and make a rough-and-tumble fight of it; but when this was the case a signal from behind the scenes terminated the "round," and they separated, and went off to the right and the other to the left. By way of acknowledging the laughter and applause which rewarded their efforts, one of the boys, a saucy, red-haired urchin, played the very same trick upon the imitation of the walk of Mr. Chanfrau in "Mose." At the end of the usual half-minute, the voice of the invisible Master of the Revels was heard calling: "Time!" The combat was renewed with tremendous vigor; the spectators shouting approbation, and, again, the combatants left their ring in possession, and the round was brought to an end. When next the ancient voice was heard, it said: "Time, gentlemen, for the last." It was well; for, by the time these pugnacious youths had once more got entangled, they were about the hottest, reddest, fiercest pair of boys on Manhattan Island. Not long, however, did he of the red-hair make his exit in the Mosic style—meaning to show the company that he was good for something yet, although a little the worse.

Two young men next presented themselves, and were introduced to the spectators by the Venerable Sire. This he did by waving his hand toward each of them, and solemnly announcing his name without prefix or appendage, thus: "John Smith. That done, he uttered the word, "Time!" for the eighth time. It immediately appeared that these young men were tyros. Their boxing consisted chiefly of feints, which the company encouraged, as they were unable to form any active contest by such remarks as these: "Come, warm up!" "Go in!" "Why don't you strike out?" "Say, when are you going to begin?" "Though a little—can't you?" with many more observations of the same purport. Stimulated by these enlivening expressions, they did "warm up," and kept on so well that, when they retired, at the end of the third round, they were honored with considerable applause.

But all this was preliminary to the real performance. The men who next advanced to the footlights—naked to the waist—were evidently persons of high rank in their vocation. One was a sailor, named Sullivan; a pale, carefully developed everywhere, except above the eyebrows. The other was lighter in weight, but exceedingly muscular, and he was famed over his shoulder for his name, like a South Sea Islander. The boxing of these men gave the company the highest satisfaction, and we must confess that we beheld their science, courage and endurance with real admiration. We cannot understand how a man can learn to take a blow that might knock down an ox without wincing. The glove, no doubt, mitigates the smart pain of the blow, but not its force. These men gave one another some tremendous blows, any one of which would have knocked the breath out of an ordinary man, or, as one of the company observed, "would have sent him to far beyond the middle of next week that he never would have found his way back again." We were surprised, too, at the rapidity with which a boxer expends his strength. These men, after three rounds, of about three minutes each, were so thoroughly blown, that they were still but sent heaving half an hour after.

The Sporting Fraternity are not skillful in the art of conducting an exhibition. There was such an exceedingly long interval between the performances of these two athletes and the one announced to follow it, that we concluded we had seen enough of the Noble Art for a beginning, and so resumed our homeward walk.

Missing none that we had seen, we were ordered why so harmless, so useful, so proper an exhibition should be accounted disreputable and wicked. Was not the Greeks the highest honors of the State were bestowed upon excellence in such exercises as these. Why should we abandon them to the class whom we stigmatize as Roughs, and in many a young Sunday-school scholar who is perishing for want of a little of such bold, free, honest exercise as those newsboys daily enjoy. There are a thousand students in our colleges who could better give an hour or two a day to boxing and fencing, then spoil their eyes and narrow their chests over an extra lesson in Greek. Charles Wesley said he could see no reason why the devil should have all the good tunes, nor can we see why the sinner should monopolize all the robust fun.

What we saw that evening in Hope Chapel threw some light upon the puzzling question, why so many bad men (so-called), are strong, and so many good men (so-called), are weak. We do not mean weak merely in bone and muscle, in breathing and digestion; but weak in character, intent, purpose, without courage, fortitude, or perseverance; abounding in good desires and schemes, but destitute of the force to carry them out. Positively we are afraid of bodies left in their training, and see whether we, too, can bear to take those thundering knocks on the nose with sweet serenity.

The Legal Results.

THE amendment of the Constitution of the United States, abolishing slavery and prohibiting it for ever, was the first great result of the war. It has amended the Constitution with many provisions growing out of the recognition and protection of slavery in the original instrument, and further amendments become requisite as logical sequences to the first. For instance: the provision which permitted slaves, claimed to be simply property, to enter in a single proportion to the basis of representation, to the political aggrandizement of the slaveholder, and a corresponding detraction from the just political weight of the white man in the free States. Again, under the old slave code, the negro had few rights; consistently with the theory and practice of slavery, he could have none; and notwithstanding the abolition of slavery, some of the lately rebellious States have undertaken to retain him in substantially the same condition that he was in before, denying the rights that have accrued to him in virtue of the Constitutional amendment.

For these and many other reasons, there are few people who have not recognized the necessity of further amendments of the Constitution, so as to make the fundamental amendment, which has wrought so profound a change in our system, effective and permanent. Differences of opinion have existed as to the character and extent of these supplementary amendments, but Congress, after long and deliberation and exhaustive debate, has fixed upon a series, which, in view of their importance, we refer our readers to another column. They have received the requisite vote of two-thirds in both Houses of Congress, and now require to be adopted by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

These resolutions do not involve the sanction of the President; but we believe they embody his views, and will receive his support in such ways as he can legitimately exercised. He has repeatedly declared himself in favor of granting to the negro the fullest protection in the exercise of civil rights, or, as the Spaniards say, "equitided 'ante la Ley." He has gone further, and expressed his willingness to invest him with the franchise under certain conditions. He has also more emphatically declared in favor of making the voting population the basis of representation. He sees no justice in perpetuating, in the form of slave compromises, which gives two white voters in South Carolina a political power equal to five voters in New York. He has often, and with patriotic pathos, declared that the negro, as he is, cannot and ought to be made "odious," and it cannot be made so better than by excluding the fomenters of the present rebellion and their dupes from office from the privileges of citizens. The perjurer may not be trusted a second time. That the people of the United States should never be called on to pay a debt contracted by those who sought to subvert the country, and for the purpose of such subversion, seems to be too obvious a proposition to require a prohibition. Mr. Johnson, in permitting the Southern States to exercise any of the functions of Government, made this prohibition a condition precedent, and will, no doubt, be glad to have it made imperative under the Constitution.

We may, therefore, congratulate the country on the great fact that Congress and the President are in accord on the only really vital issues before the country. The precise time when the lately rebellious States shall be permitted to resume their place in Congress, and be freed from military surveillance, are questions of expediency, on which co-ordinate branches of the Government may honestly differ. No great harm can come from delay; some is possible from precipitation.

The proposed amendments of the Constitution, if speedily acted on, will facilitate "reconstruction," and settle in advance many disturbing questions. There is no reason why, if these amendments be acted on without delay, Congress may not meet in December with complete delegations from all the States. We are prepared to say, therefore, that Gov. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, one of the most patriotic and efficient, as well as one of the most conservative of all our State Chief Magistrates, has suggested the convocation of all the State legislatures, for the special purpose of acting on the Amendments of the Constitution now before Congress. All desire to have the matters they pertain to definitely settled. It is equally important for the South and North, and if settled now, will remove many difficult and perplexing questions forever from the political arena.

SUFFRAGE FOR WOMEN.—Every one must admit that a very large number of women possess all the mental qualifications necessary to the exercise of the franchise, did it belong to them. A woman who is capable at all of forming opinions on those matters of interest which occupy a nation, is perfectly competent to the act of determining whether she will favor the Democratic or the Republican side. The great difficulty about the matter appears to be, that, practically, women do not much interest themselves in politics. The great mass of women do not turn, first of all, to the political page of the morning paper, but eagerly to devour the columns which record the proceedings of Congress. They are glad to know that the duty of tea, or pepper, or salt, or fine combing has taken place which will, by-and-by, affect the details of their housekeeping. But to say that this proves that they are deficient in political tendencies, or a desire to rush into the arena of public discussion, is to assume for them a much more vivid interest in matters of fact in the great world than they, as a rule, possess. That there are women who do care about the possession of the suffrage we do not for a moment doubt, any more than we deny their perfect capacity to exercise it in a high judgment in the days of their vote. But these are women who are distinguished above the majority of their sex; and we believe that, if the suffrage were to be granted to-morrow, the ballot, the whole tendency of the average feminine mind must be changed, and the education of women would have to be admitted into elements of thought not existing in the present programme of things considered essential.

NEW BLOOD.—It is a remarkable fact that the population of large cities exists in very great part of immigrants from the healthy country districts. In the agricultural counties, as in nurseries, where trees are raised for transplanting, large numbers of persons who afterward spend the prime of their days in the great industrial centres, are born, and there actually pass their early population, but serve to supply the waste caused by the comparatively early deaths of the inhabitants of cities. Even in this way it may be observed that the death-rates of New York, Philadelphia, etc., though no high, by no means represent the actual unhealthiness of those cities. Many a New York population have come into them after having passed safely through the dangers of childhood—perils more incurred in the country, and whose graves are reckoned there, and not in the towns. It is almost universally the case that the families are the descendants of actual born and bred dwellers in the town. Indeed, a rapid survey of one's acquaintance will bring before us many middle aged gentlemen else the fact of the very large number of persons who are either themselves actual immigrants, or whose immediate ancestors have been so.

THE average position of women in Europe is something pitiable. Between the extravagance of the cities and the equalidoes of the country, there is no class of women in the world so to shrink with horror and disgust from the tales which reach us of the depravity and misery in which the women of Europe are living as mistress and drudge. No one cannot travel through any European country without finding their counterparts. The writer has seen Germans and a donkey jointly drawing a plow in French Brittany; and throughout every department of their country which arrogates to itself the duty of "civilising Mexico" the traveller will find the mass of women doing the work of beasts of burden. Even in France, you cannot go through a single village where you will not find at least thirty-five who suffer from some deformity, caused by the carrying of fuel, water, and other heavy burdens on their heads. They are prematurely old, almost before they are young. At twenty-five they are old women. In peace time it is not much better than in war; they slave from morning till night in the fields, to the neglect of their persons, their children and the interior management of their homes. They are, in fact, born to a pair with squaws of the untamed, uncultured red men of the prairie, and this in one of the most civilized of nations, one of the great powers of Europe. Look to it, we say, ye who are placed in authority amongst men; look to it, ye who live but for the hour and the day. Human nature is sometimes long-suffering; but she often turns round, as the wild beast baited to madness, crushing her tormentors in her fury. It is difficult for a moment to imagine the stage of ignorance which also exists amongst them; they have as much idea of saving for a rainy day as they have of making a fortune; if they are well off, they eat white bread and drink wine; if badly off, they eat black bread and drink water, with the same amount of contentment. We are wont to commiserate the poverty and ignorance of the Irish cabin, and the influence which is so easily obtained over unlettered minds by a crafty priesthood. Alas! this is not the only spot. Would that something could be done to make woman take her proper position in Europe, nor permit herself to sink to a level with a common beast of burden.

THE amount of alcohol developed in grape juice by the process of fermentation varies, the average quantity being about 20 per cent. It very rarely indeed exceeds 26, and never 28 per cent. Hence, speaking roughly, it is fair to infer that all wines having a higher alcoholic strength than 26 per cent. are artificially raised to this by the addition of spirit. Now, sherry, as sold in the United States, generally ranges from 30 to 40, and port from 30 to 42. The inference from the fact is easy, if not gratifying.

MR. LAYARD, speaking on behalf of the British Government, when questioned in the House of Commons relative to the bombardment of Valparaiso, tells a very different story from that officially given by Com. Rogers. He asserts, roundly, that the Commodore never offered to join the British Admiral to prevent the bombardment. In his own language, "The statement that the American commander offered, if the British admiral would join him to stop the bombardment, is utterly untrue." Verily, "some one has blundered!" But this is not the worst of it. Mr. Layard continues:

"On the contrary, the American commander admitted the right of the Spanish commander to bombard Valparaiso, although he went to Santiago to remonstrate against such a course. Nor was there any truth in the statement that the American admiral, if he had had sufficient force, would himself have interposed. He never said so. Had his force been ten times greater than that of the Spaniards, he could not have interposed, seeing that it would have been an act of war against Spain. He was informed by the Spanish minister that day that when the American commander went on board the Spanish flagship to remonstrate with the Spanish commander, he said, doubtless as a joke: 'Suppose I put my ship between you and the town, what would happen?' The officer replied: 'You are a sailor, and I am a sailor. You know what your duty would be under those circumstances, and you know how I should fulfill my duty under similar circumstances. If you put yourself between me and the town, it will be my duty to sink you.' Upon this, the American commander shook the Spanish officer warmly by the hand, remarking that he perfectly understood him."

We cannot see how Com. Rogers can remain silent under these imputations on the veracity of his report.

TOWN GOSSIP.

JUPITER PLUVIUS was a propitious deity last Sunday, withholding his hebdomadal frowns and affording bright skies, greatly to the satisfaction of the multitudes who gladly escape from the murky city once a week and enjoy a ramble in the suburbs, and vastly to the delight of other multitudes whose opinions and practice come in collision with the regulations of the Excise Board. Many of these latter, however, believing that they had been put on their good behavior long enough, determined to restore the former order of things, and finding parties willing to satisfy their cravings and brave the terrors of the law, opened anew the fountains of lager and other beverages, and re-enacted the scenes which our good law-makers at Albany complacently flattered themselves would be forever banished from view. But since our worthy Mayor has denounced the Sunday law as possessing "a spirit of intolerance, and striking at the life-long habits and customs of a large class of our people, which are as harmless as they are universal," it is not a matter of surprise that a mere statute is insufficient to curb the propensities and restrain the license, that for years have been gratified with impunity. If our chief executive officer encourages remonstrance to the law, multitudes, with less virtue and acumen, will readily persuade themselves that the violation of the law is in nowise reprehensible.

The signal failure of the Canada invasion has brought Fenian matters into disrepute, and chilled the ardor of the sanguine would-be liberators of Ireland. President Roberts, who was arrested and confined for a short period, has been discharged. With his opportunities of ruminating on the uncertainty of all human (and Fenian) plans, he ought to be a wiser, if not a sadder man. In the meantime the decided falling off in the receipt of funds forebodes anything but promise to the success of a movement that most people regard as both a blunder and a crime.

The usual summer pastimes of the metropolis have occupied a considerable share of attention during the week, and presented a sufficient variety to gratify every taste. Those fond of witnessing the development of sociability and muscle at the same time, wended their way to the Turners' Festival, where agile Teutons performed on ropes, and swings, and wooden horses, and all sorts of gymnasium trappings, until the eye of the spectator was bewildered, and an immense festive throng, with song and waltz, found the hours too short for their hilarity.

The annual regattas of the Brooklyn and New York Yacht Clubs were another feature in the sports of the week, that afforded gratification to admiring thousands.

The Hoboken regatta was held on the 15th, and passed off very well, although, of course, it was a very inferior affair to those already named.

The turf has contributed its share toward the sports of the week, and in some of the best races on record given its patrons an additional cause of pride.

There have likewise been some fine base-ball matches, in which the skill of the defeated parties made almost full amends for the loss of victory.

The "Hub" and the Metropolis, had a friendly contest, through representatives, on Friday night, for superiority in billiard playing. In a skillful and well-contested game, the "Hub" came off victorious. But we shall not envy the fortune of our Boston friends; we know they can do many things well, and are therefore cheerfully disposed to accord the meed of praise whenever and wherever it is due.

Apropos of billiards, we would mention that Mr. Carland has opened an elegant room on 14th street, and placed it under the direction of Melvin Foster. There are seven of Kavanagh & Decker's tables, and all the appointments of the establishment are such as to render it a most desirable resort for gentlemen of taste, who would enjoy a quiet game free from any annoyance.

The appearance of the cholera in Cherry street has set the people to scrubbing, ventilating and fumigating, instead of creating a panic; the improvement in the public morale since its last appearance is very significant, and evinces considerable progress in civilization.

The theatres present little novelty. Brougham is playing in his own pieces to very good houses. It is quite a treat to see him again in "Pocahontas"—he is really the beau-ideal of Powhatan. He looks so real a savage, that his performance alone of that part, would justify his wife in applying for a divorce.

Moss is doing well in his summer campaign, and Barnum, is crowded, as usual.

CONGRESSIONAL PUGILISM.

IT is not very long since every member of Congress was liable to be called to account, outside the House, for any sentiments uttered in debate which were not satisfactory to the Hotspurs who disgraced themselves and their country, by their lawlessness and disregard of common propriety. It was a simple logic and an easy method of gaining notoriety to fire upon an unarmed and unsuspecting opponent, or steal upon him unawares and strike him down with a cane. The course of events for the last few years changed this order of things, and members have been allowed to say what they pleased with impunity, provided they observed the rules of the House, without fearing a battered head or disfigured face the first time they ventured to leave their seats.

During the past week, however, this fancied security proved fallacious, and the old spectacle of answering an opponent in debate by brutally pounding his head was presented at the national capital, with all the old-time accompaniments. A few days ago Mr. Grinnell, of Iowa, and Mr. Rousseau, of Kentucky (between whom a bitterness of feeling had existed for some time), indulged in some severe strictures upon each other, Mr. Grinnell being especially intemperate and ungentlemanly. In fact, his manner and language were grossly abusive, and it is unfortunate that the House allowed itself to listen to his tirade without promptly calling him to order and requiring an apology.

Mr. Rousseau comported himself on this occasion with great forbearance and dignity, and the hope was very generally indulged that he would take no further notice of charges that were really more damaging to his opponent, who so unwisely preferred them, than to himself. But Mr. Rousseau did not let the matter rest thus; and meeting his accuser outside of the hall a few days subsequently, he demanded a prompt apology for what he regarded as an unwarrantable insult. The apology being refused, he immediately struck Mr. Grinnell a number of blows with his cane, at the same time loudly declaring the intention of thus disgracing him. No serious injury was inflicted before the parties were separated, but an injury has been inflicted upon the privileges of the House and the good sense of the people at large that cannot be readily repaired. Our representatives are not sent to Washington to establish the prize ring and become proficients with the shillelah. We do not want our national legislature turned into a bear-garden; and when members cannot refrain from the barbarities and puerilities of personal encounters, they should promptly resign, and give place to others who know how to act as gentlemen, and appreciate properly the dignity of their position. Truth cannot be contradicted by caning; a castigation is no legitimate answer to an argument, and any man who resorts to such expedients, proves both the weakness of his cause and his own ignoble nature.

Mr. Rousseau has made a great mistake if he supposes the use of a bludgeon will vindicate either his honor or his character. We have reconstructed the former habits of our representatives, and will no longer tolerate the blackguardism of former days. The sooner Mr. Rousseau, and all others, who like him, may feel disposed to resent their injuries by a resort to violent lawlessness, understand this fact, the sooner will they have a claim to the respect and confidence of their countrymen.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS OF THE CONSTITUTION.

THE following amendments of the Constitution have passed both Houses of Congress by the requisite two-thirds vote, and now require the concurrence of the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States to become integral parts of the Constitution:

Resolved—By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE ——.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or happiness without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons, excluding Indians not taxed. But whenever the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President, Representatives in Congress, executive and judicial officers, or the members of the Legislatures thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. That no person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disabilities.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume to pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

THE CHILDREN'S FRIEND.

No. 4 of this popular and admirably conducted periodical is just out, sustaining, in every respect, the high character of the previous issues. It is so well suited to the tastes of the little folks, and affords such a variety of interesting reading matter, that it is just the thing for every household, in which instruction and entertainment are happily combined. Parents who wish to put into the hands of their children unexceptionable reading matter, will find the Children's Friend just what they need.

NEW MUSIC.

WE have received from Horace Waters, the well-known publisher of popular and sterling music, the following pieces: "Gen. Scott's Funeral March," which the admirers of the old hero will appreciate; "Sunlight," a sparkling Polka, together with the following Songs, viz: "Looking Forward;" "Don't Marry a Man if he Drinks," and "I'll Marry no Man if he Drinks." The music of all these pieces is by Mrs. Parkhurst, and the publisher has spared no pains to bring them before the public, as usual, in a neat and attractive form.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The American Bible Society was organized in 1816. It has printed 21,409,966 Bibles in the half century of its existence, and received contributions during the same period to the amount of $10,434,953. The receipts for the year closing March 31, 1866, exceed those of 1861 by $253,084.12. It has issued during the past five years 6,555,231 books.

—— One of the most valuable collections of natural history in the United States was destroyed at the recent burning of the Academy of Sciences in Chicago. The ornithological collection had been gathered with great care by the Smithsonian Institute and by Mr. Robert Kinnecutt, the Arctic explorer. The museum was valued at $30,000, and was totally destroyed.

—— The number of pardons issued by the President up to date: Political pardons, 12,381; criminal pardons, 164. The President has ordered that hereafter no pardon shall be issued to a second party, but must be given to the individual, or sent to the Governor of the State, with the view of breaking-up the pardon-broker nuisance.

—— The amount of mutilated and redeemed paper-money which the Treasury Department has been daily destroying of late is so great, that the department has determined hereafter to make it into pulp, and estimates that it can thus supply itself with envelopes, saving $12,000 per annum.

—— The yield of petroleum in Pennsylvania has fallen off fully one-half since the first of January. The immediate abolition of the tax on crude will revive operations somewhat.

—— The following are the aggregate products of manufacturers in the three great cities of the West:

Cincinnati - - - -	$46,995,062
St. Louis - - - -	27,619,070
Chicago - - - -	18,555,671

Cincinnati produces $212 94 in manufactures for each one of the population; St. Louis produces $145 30 to each one; Chicago produces $94 10 to each.

—— Throughout the valley of Oil Creek in Pennsylvania are many traces of ancient workings to obtain oil. Over sections embracing hundreds of acres in extent, the surface of the land has at some remote period of time, been excavated in the form of oblong pits, from four by six, to six by eight feet in size. These pits are often from four to six feet still in depth, notwithstanding the action of rain and frost for so many years. Some of these pits appear to have been of a circular or oval form, but all to have been excavated with care, and with reference to one design. They are found in the oil region, and over the oil deposits, and in no other place; affording unmistakable evidence of their design and use. The deeper and larger pits appear to have been cribbed up with timber at the sides, in order to preserve their form, and better to adapt them to the end in view.

—— The largest amount of revenue paid by the British people in any one year was $370,000,000. The amount which the people of the United States will pay this year will be $540,000,000.

—— The State Agricultural Society of Illinois has offered premiums to persons who plant the greatest number of deciduous trees in artificial groves this spring, the same to be counted in the fall and the premiums to be paid in January, 1867. This is a movement of peculiar value to the West, where the boundless prairies are without shade, and where the value and beauty of every homestead would be so much increased by trees.

—— Of the loyal States. New England lost the heaviest proportion of killed and wounded, in the men it contributed to the national army—nearly 45 per 1,000; the Western States next, 37 per 1,000; the Middle States about 32 per 1,000; and the Border States 25 per 1,000. Kansas heads the list of States—more than half the able-bodied men there entered the army, and 61 of every 1,000 of them were killed or died of wounds. Vermont stands next on the list—her losses in killed and those who died of wounds amounted to upward of 58 per 1,000. Massachusetts lost nearly 48 per 1,000: New Hampshire over 47.

—— The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations proposes a substitute for the House resolution in respect to the Paris Exposition, by which the sum of $131,400 is appropriated, to enable American exhibitors to participate in the great show. Mr. Grimes offered an amendment that no money should be paid nor any officers appointed until we are sure that the French troops are to be taken out of Mexico.

—— The Fenian excitement has died out. The United States Government, however, appears resolved on prosecuting the leaders in the late aggressive movement, and with the close of these trials, probably, the end of Fenianism, for the present, will come.

—— Judge Underwood has refused to admit Jefferson Davis to bail, on the ground of non-jurisdiction, the defendant being held by the military power of the Government.

—— A tornado destroyed an old building at Bambery, S. C., a few days ago, killing seven children, who were playing inside.

—— Recently conventions of the various religious denominations have been held in the various Southern States. At nearly all of these steps were taken for the education of the freedmen, each sect providing for the religious and secular instruction of the colored members of the church. Among the zealous leaders in this movement is Bishop Quintard, of the Episcopal Diocese of Tennessee.

—— An experiment was made last week in this city, with Marshall's Fire Annihilator. This consists of a number of pipes leading through the building and attached to the ceiling. These pipes are perforated, so that, on a steam fire-engine being attached to the street pipe, a very heavy shower of rain was thrown into the building. No fire could have withstood such a deluge. There were many spectators present, all of whom were satisfied of its great utility.

—— Cotton in Georgia has commenced to blossom. The recent rains have overwhelmed the crop in many places with grass. Wheat throughout the State is harvested, and although the crop turns out better than was feared some time ago, it is by no means excellent.

—— The American and Western Union Telegraph Companies are about forming a union of interests, which will control and operate all the territory and connect all points of importance from Newfoundland to San Francisco and Vancouver's Island. From the latter point a line to St. Petersburg will be done within a year, and Cuba and the West Indies will be connected.

—— The Italian ship Napoleon Canevero, which sailed from Macao for Callao on the 8th of March, with 600 coolies on board, was burned on the second day out, and all on board are supposed to have perished. The coolies revolted early in the day, and when ordered to surrender, threw some burning material into the hold of the vessel. The crew managed to lower a boat and escape in it; but there being 8,000 boxes of Chinese fire-crackers in the hold, an explosion took place before the coolies could escape.

—— The Nebraska newspapers announce that the new State organization has been carried by the Union party, with a Union majority in both branches of the Legislature.

Foreign.—A discovery, of at least as vital importance for Egyptology as the celebrated Rosetta Stone itself, was lately made in Egypt by a party of four German explorers—Reinisch, Rösler, Lepsius and Weidenbach—at a place called Sane, the whilom Tanis, the principal scene of Rameses II.'s enormous architectural undertakings. A stone, with Greek characters upon it, was found protruding from the ground, and when fully excavated, proved to contain a bilingual inscription, in no less than thirty-seven lines of hieroglyphics and seventy-six lines of Greek, in the most perfect state of preservation, and dating from the time of the third Ptolemy, Euergetes I., in 238 B. C. The stone measures two metres twenty-two centimetres in length and seventy-eight centimetres in width, and is completely covered by the inscriptions. Their first attempts at editing this important inscription having failed, the travelers returned to the spot, and, during a stay of two days (the 22d and 23d of April), copied the inscription most carefully, and photographed it three times.

—— A clever bit of roguery has just been stopped by the police of Paris, who have caught the authors at their work. A well-dressed man has been in the habit of going into a shop, buying a trifling article, and giving a ten-franc gold piece. On receiving his change, he declares it was a twenty-franc piece; and, when the dispute becomes warm, says it is very easy to prove it: "My piece of twenty francs is a very old one of the reign of Louis Philippe, and has a scratch across it." Sure enough, it is found, and the change for twenty francs must be given. But some time before his accomplice has been to the same house, bought a trifle, and given this marked twenty-franc piece, and the game is continued till the harvest is sufficient.

—— The Vossische Zeitung, a moderate Liberal paper of Berlin, states that the exasperation against the Prussian Government is unbounded in Wurtemberg, and that deep hatred of Count Bismarck fills all hearts. Among the soldiers in the South an uncontrollable spirit manifests itself, and fears are expressed lest the Cabinet war meditated by Bismarck should end in a German civil war. "The photograph of Ferdinand Blind," says the letter in the Vossische, "is exhibited in all the shop-windows of Stuttgart, wreathed with immortelles; and people loudly declare him to be a second William Tell." From another source it is stated that the Landwehr men of Sigmaringen, who are called out for service in the Prussian army, kissed the portrait when marching the streets, and gave enthusiastic cheers, amid tears, in honor of the deceased.

—— There is a variety of good stories told at the London clubs with reference to the late panic, for men will have their joke even upon serious subjects. A celebrated barrister, who had invested a small sum in Overend & Gurney's Company, met a friend to whom he communicated his loss. "Five hundred," said the latter, "that must have quite upset you." "Not at all," responded the wit, "I only lost my balance." —— An extraordinary accident occurred to a little girl living at Southsea, on the 22d ult. It appears that she had been sent out to a neighboring public-house with a glass bottle for some stout, and on her return she fell and broke the neck off the bottle. In falling, however, her neck came upon the jagged ends of the broken glass, which penetrated one of the main arteries, and the flow of blood was so profuse that death ensued almost immediately afterward.

—— Prussia, as is well known, possesses a special manufacture, from which she draws considerable profits—that of cannon and materials connected with artillery. Several large factories of great renown have, for many years, with the consent of the Government, supplied pieces of cannon to a number of States. The export of these arms has now been forbidden, the only exceptions being those which have been purchased for the United States of America, Asia or Africa, and the destination of which shall be well authenticated.

—— From the summary of the number of exhibitors, and the demands for space in the Paris Exhibition of 1867, which has just been made up, it appears that the number of proposing-exhibitors, exclusive of the fine arts, is 2,280. In 1855 the number was 1,541. The total nett space demanded in the forthcoming Exhibition exceeds 305,000 square feet (exclusive of space demanded in the park). The nett space at the disposal of the British executive is 93,000 square feet, or considerably less than one-third of the space asked for. In 1855 the nett space filled was 65,000 square feet.

—— There is a colliery shaft in Belgium 932 yards in depth. In Saxony there is another upward of 800 yards; and in the Dukinfield Colliery the black mine has been followed to the depth of 940 yards from the surface.

—— Mr. Francis Mahony, for several years past the Parisian correspondent of the London Globe, died at Paris a few days ago. Mr. Mahony, who was a native of Cork, was at one time well known in London literary circles as "Father Prout," under which designation he published some thirty years ago a series of most amusing articles: "The Prout Papers," in Fraser's Magazine. To this periodical he, as well as the late Dr. Maginn and Serjeant Murphy, both Cork men, were frequent contributors. His translation into Greek and Latin of some of Moore's melodies, and of some well-known Irish slang songs, such as "The Groves of Blarney" and "The Night before Larry was Stretched," showed considerable power of language and of humor. "The Prout Papers" were collected and published in one volume, and passed through several editions.

FASHIONABLE INTELLIGENCE.—The habitues and visitors to Saratoga Springs will be much pleased to learn that Mr. Edwin A. Brooks, the popular proprietor of the great New York Boot and Shoe Emporium, opposite the Metropolitan Hotel, has opened a large branch store at Saratoga Springs. Mr. Brooks is so well-known and so much respected by all who know him, both in and out of business, that, in addition to the pleasure it will give his old New York customers to see his pleasant face, combining the utile cum dulci and improving his fortune and health at the same time, there will be the convenience of not having to send for their boots and shoes to the Empire City. The ladies will be especially gratified, as we all know how pretty ankles are improved when their shoes and gaiters are made by so accomplished an artiste as Mr. Brooks, who may be said to have carried his science to its utmost limit.

"THE Princess Helena of England," says the Gazette de France, "by her marriage with Prince Christian of Augustenburg, will become the niece of a New York lady named Lee. The family of this latter, some years ago, established themselves at Paris, hoping, as it is not unusual with rich Americans, to form an alliance with some noble European family. There were two young ladies, both of whom attained their wish, as one married Baron Wachter, Minister of Wurtenburg at Paris, and the other some time after inspired with the warmest love Prince Frederick, brother of the late Sovereign Duke of Augustenburg, and uncle of the present Princess. The marriage took place at the United States Embassy at Paris, and the bride and bridegroom started for the East on a wedding tour. They had reached Beyrout in Syria, when the Prince was taken ill and died. His widow returned to Paris, to the house of her sister, the Baroness Wachter, and now becomes aunt of an English Princess."

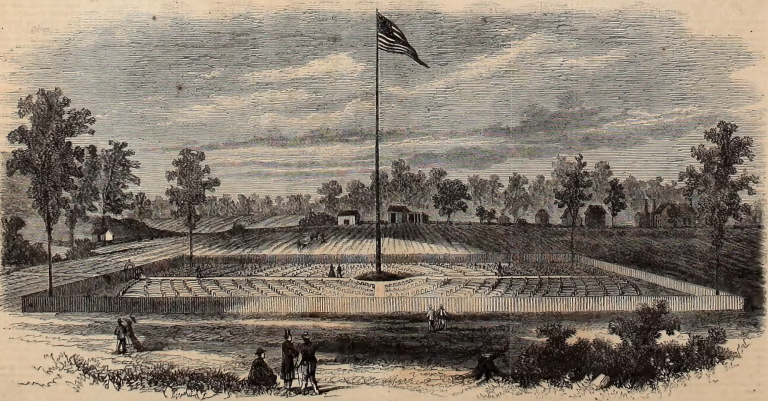
THE comparative magnitude of the planets is as follows: Supposing the earth to be 12in. in diameter, then Herschel is 4ft. 5in., Saturn 10ft., Jupiter 11ft. 3in., Venus 11¼in., Mars 6¼in., Mercury 4¾in., Pallas 3¾in., Juno 2¾in., Ceres 1¼in., and Vesta only one-third of an inch. The sun is 111ft. 8in., and the moon 3¾in.

GAINES'S MILL, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY J. E. TAYLOR.

GAINES'S MILL, VA.

IT is just four years since the splendid army of the Potomac ended the celebrated Peninsular campaign in disappointment and disaster. After seven days of as brave fighting as the world ever witnessed the army, defeated, though not disgraced, gladly sought the protection of the gunboats, and made its escape from the fatal swamps of the Chickahominy, leaving thousands of its brave men a sacrifice to the Moloch of war, and barely forcing its way against the almost irresistible masses of the enemy to a place of security. The battle of Gaines's Mill, the second in the seven days' series, was the most bloody, obstinate, and disastrous of the whole, the losses on each side being fearful, and the combat ending only with the day. The mill from which the battle derived its name was burned during the engagement, and has not been rebuilt.

Our Artist has sketched the ruins as they now appear, and we reproduce them on this page, together with a view of Glendale Church and the cemetery for Union soldiers adjacent to it. The battle of Glendale has sometimes been called the battle of Frazier's Farm, but it is more generally known by the former name. The church is four miles from Malvern Hill, another memorable point in the famous retreat of the Peninsular army. The cemetery embraces an enclosure of about two acres, and in it are interred all the bodies of our soldiers who fell at Glendale, White Oak Swamp, and Malvern Hill that could be identified. About 3,000 patriots have found a resting-place within this simple enclosure. These places will ever have a historic interest, and as this week is the anniversary of the terrible battles near Richmond, it seems a fitting time to call attention to scenes and localities that were so prominent in our great national struggle.

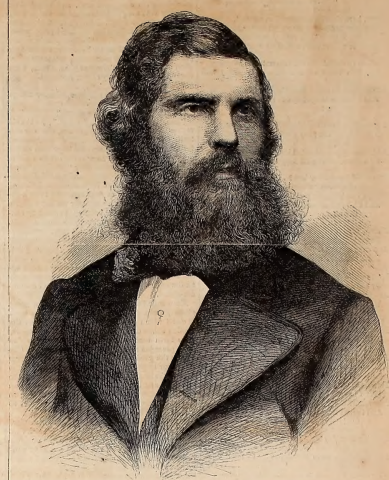


GLENDALE CHURCH, VA., THE LOCALITY OF ONE OF THE "SEVEN DAYS' BATTLES."

ROBERT DENISON HOLMES,

Most Worshipful Grand Master of Free and Accepted Masons of the State of New York.

THE subject of this sketch was born at East Haddam, Conn., on the 12th June, 1822. His parents soon afterward removed to this city, and here his school-boy days were passed. At the age of thirteen he entered the law-office of Horace Holden Esq.; but soon after, craving a more exciting life, engaged in an importing house as custom-house and shipping clerk. From the force of association, he was led to the sea, and at sixteen shipped before the mast, from whence, in four years, he had risen to be chief mate of a ship in the European trade.



His father died in 1841, and this sad event determined him to settle in New York, where he could be near his mother, and cherish her in her declining years. In casting about for the means of employment, the idea of the law again suggested itself, and he therefore placed himself under the care of John W. Mulligan, Esq., at the same time supporting himself and mother by his pen, contributing to the Knickerbocker Magazine and other periodicals of the day.

In 1846 Mr. Holmes was admitted to the bar, and, by his industry and ability, has secured an extensive and lucrative practice, in both the civil and criminal courts.

In 1859 Mr. Holmes was initiated in the Ancient Fraternity of Free and Accepted Masons. Within a brief period he was one of a number of applicants to form Mystic-Tie Lodge, and was unanimously chosen Master, to which position he was annually re-elected for eleven years.

In 1860 he received appointment as District Deputy Grand Master for the Third Masonic District, and in 1864 he received the highest vote for Deputy Grand Master, and the following year was unanimously elected Grand Master of Free and Accepted Masons, to which position he was again elected, at the late annual communication, a compliment well-deserved by his careful attention to the onerous duties of the office, and his studious endeavor to promote the welfare of the Craft. He was for six years Masonic editor of the New York Dispatch, and is now connected with the musical and dramatic department of that journal.

In person, Mr. Holmes is about of the medium height, with a slight tendency to embonpoint. He is a ready and forcible speaker, and, in the very prime of his days and faculties, may reasonably look forward to a career of usefulness and success. His position is a proof that honest and well-sustained endeavor must, sooner or later, meet its reward.

SAMUEL SINCLAIR, ESQ.

SAMUEL SINCLAIR, whose portrait we give on this page, is a native of this State, having been born in Chautauqua county, in 1825. He can boast a patriotic ancestry; His grandfather, Major Samuel Sinclair, distinguished himself in the war of 1812. His father was a worthy mechanic being a good carpen ter and especially skilled and celebrated as a millwright. He also had a taste for military life, and passed through the various grades of office, up to that of colonel, with marked distinction. He died in 1848.

Mr. Sinclair's mother, who is still living, is a native of Vermont, and at an early age emigrated with her parents to Chautauqua county, being among the first settlers of that region.

The subject of this sketch came to this city in 1841, and entered the Tribune establishment as cashier, bookkeeper, subscription and mail clerk. He filled all these positions up to about 1848, when, the labor becoming altogether too burdensome, he was obliged to relinquish the different positions one by one, except cashier and book-keeper, which he continued to fill till 1856, when he was appointed publisher of the Tribune, which position he has held since then, except during 1864. By his energy and dogged perseverance, and faith in the principles of the Tribune, he aided materially in putting the circulation of that paper to the enormous number of 280,000 copies; a much larger circulation than ever before obtained by any newspaper, which comparative circulation we believe it still holds.

He was married in Amherst, N. H., in 1848, to Charlotte A. Perry, a niece of Mr. Greeley, and an estimable woman, by whom he has three children, a son and two daughters. Having been constantly engaged in the business department of the Tribune, he has not taken much public part in politics out of his own Ward, but he has been earnest and radical in his opinions. The best evidence of Mr. Sinclair's ability and faithfulness is his long connection with the Tribune, and its prosperity under his management.

DEDICATION OF THE ITALIAN CHURCH

Of St. Anthony of Padua.

ON the 10th of June, 1866, a neat but modest structure in Sullivan street, New York, was solemnly dedicated by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of the diocese, Dr. McCloskey, as the Church of St. Anthony of Padua, intended as a place of worship for the Italians residing in New York. Some of these are wealthy merchants and well-to-do traders, but the mass are of the humble class: workers in marble, painters, and itinerant musicians. These will now have the gospel preached to them in their own liquid tongue. The church will be under the direction of the Franciscan friars, an order which began missions in Canada as early as 1615. On the occasion of the dedication, the church was filled to its utmost capacity. Before the solemn High Mass, the Archbishop moved around the new church in procession, according to the rite prescribed by the Roman Pontifical, and with prayer and incense and sprinkling, dedicated it to the worship of Almighty God.

Then followed the solemn High Mass, sung by the Provincial of the Order in this country, the very Rev. Pantilo da Magliano, assisted by Rev. F. Leo da Sarzana, O. S. F., of Winstead, Conn., as Deacon, and Rev. A. Pfeifer, O. S. F., as Sub-deacon. The Archbishop delivered an impressive sermon in English, and after Post Communion, the Father, the Rev. Leone Pacifico, returned thanks in Italian in a short address to the Archbishop, expressing to him the gratitude of his flock, and their endeavor to render their church such, by their zeal and Christian virtues, as best to testify to the sincerity of their gratitude.

The music on the occasion, directed by Mr. William Berge, was especially fine and appropriate.

THE DEDICATION OF THE ITALIAN CHURCH OF ST. ANTHONY OF PADUA, IN SULLIVAN STREET, N. Y., BY THE MOST REVEREND ARCHBISHOP M'CLOSKEY, ON SUNDAY, JUNE 10TH.

THE DOUBTFUL TOMB OF VIRGIL.—The locality of the grave of many a genius is now lost to the world. Even the tomb of Virgil, near Naples which has been for so many centuries visited by travelers, and regarded by them with veneration, as having once retained the ashes of the great poet, cannot be pronounced with confidence genuine. It is a small square building with a rounded roof, and stands on the very brink of a precipice immediately above the entrance to the subterranean tunnel of Posillippo, a beautiful, and we learn, faithful view of which was given in Waugh's "Italy." The old entrance to the tomb has been enlarged, and a modern window cut through the wall. The interior is a vaulted cell about twelve feet square, having many small recesses for urns. The urns, if ever any filled these recesses are now wanting; and with them, of course, the one containing the ashes of the great

MET AT LAST.

BY E. S. SPENCER.

"Yes, and a deager can Yet, than all other."

Look, here she lies now, dead as my feet,
With the death-dew scarce yet dried on her brow;
It is thus, then, O God, that at last we meet,
And the waters have ended a broken vow!

Look at her silk! Is the tale not told?
See, the braid of her tresses is glossy and smooth!
I remember her neat little dresses of old,
And the eyes laughing out through the curls—
all truth!

I remember the days when a clear voice rang,
Man and child, by gray church, with a tottering tower,
And I fancy the notes fell low as they sang
Of a place we should long for in that hour.

When did I meet her last? On the night
When she swore to be mine, my lov'd one alone,
Well, I look'd in her passionate eyes so bright,
And I kiss'd her—and then at the dawn she was flown!

Flown, with the lie on her red rose lips—
Gone, with my kiss yet warm on her!—gone!
And over my heart fell a deadly eclipse:
For a sun set then that has never since shone.

Little white feet, was your tread too light,
Or sad and weary, to end like this?
Ah, you walked in a dream to a bridge one night,
While he bought of the waves with a fearful bliss.

Poor little soft hand, clammy and thin,
Many longed for you once—you are changed since then!
Round, pinkish white throat, dimple-arched chin,
You are cold, and those eyes cannot open again!

Yet, 'tis hard, too, to meet just as we have met,
(For I loved her so dearly, so purely, so well)—
To walk by a bank, see a dead woman, wet,
And to find that the features are those you can tell!

To know that the body borne down by the stream,
And the dark hair drenched by the waves below,
Are those you have worshiped! It must be a dream,
To fancy that face is the same face!—No—

'Tis the same sweet mouth, and the same little nose;
And the lashes lie near where the light once shone;
The cheek is her cheek, though the roses have fled—
I have kiss'd these lips in the days long gone!

Close wrap her gay clothes over her form,
And my cloak—I had rather her face were not seen—
Lay her there. She is cold, but her grave will be warm!

After all, death is better than life has been!

She will be nearer the new-mown grass,
Nearer the scent of the flowers He gave;
Pure stars will light her instead of the gas,
Angels of eve may pass over her grave.

I leave her. Our meeting is all too late.
If prayers would avail, how I'd pray for her now!
I take a last look at my life's one fate,
And I plant my last pitying kiss on her brow.

I leave her, my lov'd one, faded and wan;
No sun in the morning can open her eyes;
Now I know how it is, when all hope is gone,
That they look on the river and long for the skies.

Poisoned by Mistake.

THE MORAY OF THE STORM.

TOWARDS the close of the sixteenth century, when the belief in sorcherers and sorceresses (a belief so common amongst the uneducated and ignorant of of all classes and all ages) had as yet by no means begun to die out, there resided in the fine old city of Antwerp one of those arch-impostors and charlatans, by name Leopold Hoffner. The man was precisely of the Cagliostro stamp—that is to say, his character was a mixture of genius, impudence and artful imposture. Such men, however, we will know, did not want for credulous followers.

It was the evening of a fine summer day, between seven and eight o'clock, and the red rays of the setting sun threw a gleam on the antiquated gables of the old mercenary's dwelling, at the door of which he sat upon an old oaken stool, according to the fashion of the day, taking the evening air previous to his retirement for the night, and after the close of his day's labors. He was past eighty years of age now, and unable to devote half the night to secret calculations, as was his wont in the junior members of his craft. Before the old man stood, on a low bench, a black jack of Rhine beer and a loaf of coarse brown bread, with a piece of Gruyère cheese. Rich though he certainly was, yet he was, like most of his profession, miserly to a degree. Crouched at his feet, playing with making faces, was an enormous black ape of frightful visage, regarded by the superstitious patrons of the old wizard as his familiar spirit. The animal, however, in spite of his ill-omened looks, was in truth most good-tempered and amusing, and extremely attached to his master. This uncouth attendant and an old shriveled crone (if possible still uglier), formed the whole of this curious household. It is only due, however, to the poor old lady to state that her looks, like those of the monkey, belied her heart, for she was of a most gentle and amiable disposition.

Old Wintzer sat musingly at his supper, now throwing a morsel of cheese to his monkey (and quite unconscious that the ingrateful rascal was thereby exhibiting every gesture), and now looking absently at the sky, over the face of which darkness was fast gathering. Dame Charlot, the housekeeper, sat just behind her master in the curious old-fashioned doorway, turning her spinning-wheel with a nimbleness of finger that might have been profitably imitated by many a busy milliner of the good old city. A few minutes passed thus, when the old woman suddenly raised her head.

"Master."

"Ay, Dame." (For so Master Wintzer always styled Charlot.)

"Yon clouds, sure, bode a storm."

"Yes, yes; trust Bertram for that." As the old man said this, he glanced knowingly at his ape, contorting his features with most frightful vehemence; for it is a most curious fact that impostors of the stamp of Wintzer have always professed to bear of the supernatural powers of their "familiars" from the tongues of their thousand and one deluded disciples, that they ended by themselves believing that which they had at first intended to be a diabolical ruse, just as a slanderer will set afloat a malicious story on his own account, and end by convincing himself he is speaking the simple truth.

"Sure, sure," muttered the old lady, trembling, for she was a devoted believer in the supernatural powers of both man and monkey. "Quiet, quiet, good Bertie." And the animal, pulled on hood to her; indeed, the poor creature was simply excited by that vague terror which possesses nearly all the animal creation at the approach of a thunder-storm.

Meanwhile the sun had just sunk, like a great globe of burnished gold, behind the black bank of cloud which now enveloped the sky; and the swollen waves of the Scheldt, turgid and restless, gave forth that peculiar moaning sound which often presages a hurricane of no slight force. One by one the good people of Antwerp withdrew from their door-steps to the more secure accommodation of their chambers. Lights began to appear at the windows, and the big drops of rain which began sullenly to fall, uttered, as it were, a warning to the last lingerers to withdraw from the street to the shelter of their homes.

Dame Charlot glanced anxiously at her master, awaiting the signal to withdraw; for, with that reverence which at the period of which we write was toward their employers, she would not have ventured to rise without his example. The old necromancer, however, appeared still lost in thought, when suddenly the attention of both master and housekeeper was drawn to an object proceeding at a rapid rate down the narrow street. This was an old and heavy traveling-carriage, drawn by six mules, adorned with feathers and bells, and advancing with a celerity quite astonishing, considering the ponderous nature of the vehicle. The old man and the dame gazed on in open-mouthed astonishment until the carriage was opposite to the street. Struck speechless with surprise at the unlooked-for visitation, the old couple, accompanied round from his reverie, could only stare in silence, and Dame Charlot was quite overcome with awe at the grandeur of this apparition, though both ape and mules uncertain how to act, a young man, of very handsome aspect, showing his head through the aperture of the vehicle (for the carriage was not known), inquired, with a strong Spanish accent:

"Can I have accommodation here for the night for a young lady who is very ill?"

"I do not keep a hostelry," said the old necromancer, bluntly, and somewhat angrily, for he was averse to strangers, and especially to foreigners.

"Pardon, my stranger," but I had thought by the sign which hangs over—"

"The Herr need not mind that; it is usual in this country for all trades to hang out their signs—even doctors and lawyers," said the old gentleman, that is all, and if the Herr needs accommodation, why the Golden Fleece, yonder, there are good apartments and—"

"But," broke in Dame Charlot, timidly, for she was afraid of no one where sex and a woman's sympathy with her sex, "is the lady so very ill?"

The young man uttered a deep sigh.

"Very; and I would pay—pay well, so that we could be sheltered."

"A—h, ah!" said Wintzer, sharply, "that alters the whole case. Pay well, indeed! Why the old man was rich as a Jew), "and if the Herr does not mind paying—"

"Pay!" broke in a gruff voice burst from the carriage.

"No, no, I do not mind paying," said the stranger, hastily; "but let us make haste."

"Yes, yes," said Dame Charlot; "and besides, poor thing, the noise of an inn would do her no good; and here am I, a skilled nurse, to look to her dear. And you will not mind paying me, too?" she added, aside.

"I pay all—everything, so that you make haste," returned the young man, impatiently, from the vehicle, and immediately bearing a young lady in his arms into the old necromancer's dwelling, where she was speedily placed upon a couch in a half-fainting state. "Oh!" exclaimed he, "is there no skilled leech at hand that can assist for, or my wife will die!"

"There is Master Hans Frischen, over the way, a very skilled man," said Dame Charlot, "whom I will speedily fetch if your lordship desire it."

"Fetch him, then; and for heaven's sake be quick!"

Dame Charlot needed no second bidding, for the occasion offered a favorable opportunity for gossip (of which she did not get much in her dull life); besides, she plainly saw, she should now be a person of considerable importance, which is a reflection especially dear to the hearts of all women. Nothing does a woman so like as to appear, even if she is not of importance to somebody. It is her "chief vitæ." All women, even the very best, like to be of consequence. They must be general over some small army, or some individual, or else at once surrender at discretion. So thought the worthy housekeeper, and donning her scarlet woolen hood, and slipping her feet into her slobots, she was speedily on her way to the town Galen. But two minutes had elapsed ere she returned, bringing with her a mild, pleasant-looking man, of middle age, of grave yet attractive demeanor, on whose face the word "Doctor" was as legibly inscribed as if it had been branded there in actual letters. Without a single unnecessary word he saluted all in the room, and then, with the quiet confidence of his profession, advanced toward the patient's sofa. Still silently he felt her pulse, looked at her attentively for a moment, and then turning to her husband, said, gravely:

"An accident to madame?"

"My wife has been shaken by the overturn of our carriage some six hours back," was the reply.

"Ah! and madame's present condition is—"

"You are right," hastily interrupted the young man; "she is within a few weeks of her confinement."

"Oh! oh!" interposed old Wintzer; "I did not bargain for—"

"Silence, pray silence, monsieur," said the doctor, quietly, but authoritatively.

"A baby! oh, dear!" gasped poor Dame Charlot, ready to herself.

"Monsieur," said the doctor, addressing himself to the lady's husband, "I do not apprehend serious consequences, but for the present I prescribe utter and entire quiet. Let madame be at once removed to bed in that room of the house least exposed to noise. Give her presently some white wine, and a morsel of something nourishing, such as a fowl, for example, and let her endeavor to sleep. I will send over some necessary soothing draughts, and will myself come over in the morning. One question, monsieur, that I may know whom I have the honor of addressing?"

"I am Don Carlos Estevan, and a grandee of Spain. Don Carlos, of course, my wife."

The doctor bowed low.

"On whom may I depend to see my orders carried out? much depends upon nursing and—"

Dame Charlot came forward, and making a low reverence, said:

"You may depend on me, Herr Doctor."

The doctor looked at her in some doubt, not unmixed with surprise.

"You? I know you well, my worthy neighbor; you are most excellent, most trustworthy, but this is a case where—"

"I am equal to it, my Herr, if it would please you to try me." And something in the good old lady's look resolved the doctor, for he immediately returned, with some show of confidence:

"Well, be it so, friend Charlot; we will try." And he took his departure with that noiseless and easy gait so peculiar to the distinguished of his profession.

The young wife lay on the sofa in a state half-swoon, half-sleeping, the immediate effects of her fall having departed, and a still languor succeeded the shock. Her husband sat by her side, with one of her hands clasped in his own, and regarded her from time to time with looks of anxious foreboding beyond description.

She was a most beautiful young woman, not, perhaps, of the highest type of beauty, although many would aware it is quite comme il faut that all heroines of romance should be "exquisitely" lovely. Such epithets, however, could not be applied here. Donna Estevan was a true Andalusian, with the large dark eye and black hair peculiar to the ladies of that province. Such ladies are generally somewhat marked by the dark—not to say swarthy—complexion which unusually accompanies them. Moreover, the women of Andalusia are famous chiefly for their arch sprightliness and vivacity, such as it could not be expected the poor listless patient could exhibit under the circumstances. The young pair sat thus alone, for the old man had retired to his laboratory, since, feeling disinclined (from the excitement of the day) for much conversation, he went to rest, he purposed to devote some hours to the composition of certain of his mystic chemical preparations, which, according to the high authority of her appointment to the combined offices of head nurse and cook, had withdrawn to the kitchen in a state of much importance and officiousness.

"Ah!" she said, apostrophizing a fat fowl which she had caught in the yard, and chosen for the basting before a bright fire—"ah, what a night! Only think that ever I should be roasting a fowl for a Spanish grandee! A good twenty pence in the market come Thursday. Ah! master'll make a fine thing of it."

Here there came a loud knock at the door, which made the old woman start prodigiously, the cover, by which she dredged the bird with the draughts; so the dame gave him a couple of apples (a most unusual piece of liberality) and sent him off to some child in the street, about his business. Then she proceeded to lay the cloth for supper, which she served up in the room where the sick lady lay.

"Madame will eat some of this beautiful bird, I know," crooked worthy Charlot, as she removed the covers. "Only see a fine pullet, to be sure, comes expensive; but then, monsieur—"

"Pray have the kindness to leave us in quiet. We are much obliged to you for your attention," interrupted Donna Estevan; "but we would prefer not being waited upon."

"Oh, certainly, if madame wishes it," said the good-natured housekeeper, rather gratified than otherwise, indeed, it was impossible to take offense at the soft, melodious tones of the beautiful speaker; and hastily courtesying, she withdrew.

"Try to take a morsel, Maria, dearest," said the young Don, placing before his wife a small portion of the white meat of the fowl; "just one morsel, for my sake."

"Oh, I cannot, Carlos; I feel oppressed by I know not what foreboding. Can we not leave this dreary place presently?"

"To-night? Impossible, love; but, for my part, I think I shall sleep soundly upon it."

"Kind, yes; but the place is so gloomy, and that old woman so chattering, and that horrible ape—oh!" shuddered the poor lady shivered.

"Maria, dearest, illness makes you petulant. The good people have been in this tempest; besides, the old woman is very kind. It is not normal for people in your condition to have these gloomy fancies, I believe. To-morrow, if you wish it, and the good physician permits, we will remove to another lodging. Come, eat a little, dear wife."

Donna Estevan tried to smile and, to quiet, solicitude of so loving a husband, ate a few morsels of the bird and drank a glass of the wine. Then they engaged in a little conversation, and by the time supper had concluded, both were in a cheerful frame of mind. Thus an hour passed, when Dame Charlot knocked at the door.

"Will madame please to retire to bed?" said she.

"You must go, dearest," said the young man; "the physician ordered it so."

The wife signified her acquiescence; and taking her in his arms, he carried her to an upper room prepared for her. He himself was to rest on the sofa in the room they had just left, from which Dame Charlot would, presently, by the aid of blankets and cushions, manufacture into a couch. Then he kissed his wife and retired, to below leaving the assiduous Dame Charlot to set the affair of her patient to Donna Estevan.

Dame Charlot carried a bottle in each hand.

"See, madame, you are to take one draught before sleeping, and a small sip during the night. Shall I, after having undressed her patient and safely placed her in bed. "Shall I give madame the first, now?"

"No, not yet, thank you, madame," uttered the soft, silvery voice of the Spanish lady. "See first to make monsieur comfortable, and bring it presently. I am not sleep as yet. It is now ten. Return, pray, at midnight, if you have not retired."

"Oh, I shall be all stir and bustle for midnight. I be a first-rate nurse, I. As madame pleases; I will look back at twelve." And she withdrew with the bottles.

Outside the door she carefully set the phials down on a wooden bracket on the landing, to be conveniently at hand on her return. Then she opened the door of an opposite chamber, which was her own, her master's laboratory, and looked in. The old man sat absorbed in some chemical operation, whilst at his feet, intently watching him, crouched Bertram the ape, his inseparable companion.

"Master," said Charlot, "it is time to retire."

"Ah! time, is it, so—I forgot—time in hand," replied the necromancer, without looking round.

"And I also," said Dame Charlot. "I shall sit up for my patient, master."

"As you will."

"Good-night, master."

"Good-night."

And she closed the door and went down to prepare the young Don's bed. Then she took up her watch until midnight in the old arm-chair by the kitchen fire. In half an hour all was still, and the household apparently hushed in repose.

AQUAFORTIS.

THE old necromancer sat in his laboratory with his whole mind engrossed by the operation he was performing, and quite unconscious in which aquafortis played the principal part.

It was a curious old room; and though its chief occupant (which would have been the case passed by visitors as merely an old curiosity shop, and nothing more, yet in those days of thick ignorance and superstition, it was crowded, and well calculated, to impress with mysterious awe such of the credulous public as found their way into its precincts. Indeed, the old man had studiously completed its arrangements with a design to produce this effect. It had but one small window, and was set in a gloomy, somber-work and draped with sombre-looking curtains of dark-colored material, giving it a most lugubrious effect. On a long oak table, before the embrasure, were set out in grim array a variety of chemical preparations, with here and there human skulls were prominent subjects of research. Along the walls of the room were draped with black, on which were figured in white woolen work the signs of the zodiac, and other mystic and cabalistic emblems of mortality. There were a few hangings elsewhere on which were various bottles of chemical preparations, with here and there lizards, adders, and other reptiles preserved in spirits.

The principal table, at which the old man sat, was covered with many bottles and saucers, containing various chemical principals (principally such as nightshade (belladonna), aquafortis, and others, many of which were so powerful as to oblige the necromancer to wear a mask while experimenting with them. On this table were also crucibles, small furnaces, and many steel and iron instruments, forceps, pincers, metal-stirrers, and the like; and in the middle stood a small furnace, filled with burning charcoal. The venerable old man, as he sat at work, looked like some veritable wizard; and, to complete, the picture, the grinning black ape, with his sharp, white teeth, and eyes like coals of fire, seemed a most fitting representative of the evil genii of the gloomy chamber.

Winter lent over a small basin in which he was mixing several metallic substances in a state of fusion, occasionally testing the crystals as they cooled, with the aquafortis.

"Ah," he murmured, greedily, "I shall succeed —I know I shall succeed. I can decipher and unravel this stupendous secret: gold, gold—bright, precious gold! To turn everything into gold! It is worth nights of care and days of toil. Hundreds have failed, but I shall not fail—no, no!"

Thus speaking, he applied the acid to one of the globular crystals which had formed on the side of the vessel. It immediately dissolved, while a look of intense, bitter disappointment stole over the necromancer's face.

"Not yet—not yet," he ejaculated; and with eager haste began, with his shriveled hands trembling with age, to pour and repour some of the liquids before him from one phial into another. All this while the ape Bertram sat regarding him with a peering, inquisitive glance, strangely similar to that of a human being.

The old man, however, heeded not: he was too wrapped up in his dreams of inexhaustible wealth, although his countenance had all the appearance of more than half a century. Why could he not rest contented with the large fortune which he had accumulated by practice on the superstitious purblinds of mankind? Ah, why, indeed, save that the besetting sin of riches is ever craving after more? "Crescit amor nummi quantum ipsa pecunia crescit" is a pithy saying, applicable to nine out of ten of us, unfortunately. So he worked on and on in his madness, caused by the gaseous escapes from his crucible, rendered the room insupportable.

"Where?" he said, wiping his forehead, "it is unbearable."

Then he arose and half-opened the door.

Time sped rapidly, and the clock sounded half-past eleven, when the old man, who had hitherto worked with unrelaxing zeal, was suddenly oppressed with an overwhelming sense of weariness.

"Oh, he muttered, "I must rest, I must rest!" And he collected his phials, locking them in a drawer. In a few moments his head sank forward on his breast, and he slept. But he left the phial containing the aquafortis on the table.

Onward still went the moments, and nothing was heard save the tread of the big ape, who, with restless activity, moved around the room, through the open door and back, staying now a few minutes beside, now a few minutes in the laboratory. The animal was strangely excited, but no one marked him. There was no sound, except the dull, regular breathing of the aged necromancer, to disturb the stillness of the night.

Heavily strokes of the town-clock beat midnight, but all remained still, till in a few moments Dame Charlot appeared with a tray, slowly ascending the stairs.

"Ah! it is time for the draught," said she, "and I am not sorry, for my old bones need rest."

Then she paused at the door of the laboratory and looked in. The old man, unconscious of her presence, and exclusive and excitement of the day, sat in his chair, with head reclined upon his breast, sleeping the tranquil sleep of childhood and old age.

"Ah, my poor old master, so you, too, are tired, are you? Well, you are not much older than I," said the dame to herself.

Then she gently closed the door behind her, took up the draught for her patient from the bracket on the landing, and entered the opposite chamber.

Dame Estevan was not asleep. She lay with her head reclining upon one arm, and a strange look of depression upon her beautiful face, which she slightly raised as the old woman entered.

"How does madame feel now?" asked Dame Charlot, with a look of genuine solicitude upon her honest, exceedingly ugly, features.

"Why madame take her composing draught? It is time."

"You are very kind. I have not the least inclination to sleep; I am wakeful with many thoughts."

"But madame must go to sleep—the Hon Doctor said so; she will rest soundly after this medicine."

And so, indeed, she did.

"Well, good dame, place it on this little table, at the head of my couch; I will take it in a few moments when I shall have commended myself to God and the Holy Virgin."

And she crossed herself.

"But, madame——"

"Pray do as I request you," gently repeated Dame Estevan, "and retire to your own room, for I am sure you must be worn out. Shame on me to keep the aged out of bed till midnight—I will continue, as of the idle and not occurred to her before, that the old housekeeper really was acting a kind part to an entire stranger.

"Madame is considerate, and I am tired," owned Dame Charlot.

And without the sick lady good-night, she placed the bottle on the table indicated, and withdrew, with an exclamation of relief, for, with all her good will, she was old to sit without some repose. Then unbroken stillness reigned throughout the house.

* * * * * * *

It was yet early in the morning, about half-past five o'clock, when the necromancer, with a sudden start, woke up from his sleep very much bewildered, but, nevertheless, very much refreshed. He could not, at first, recollect how he came to be in his laboratory, but gradually the facts of the preceding day dawned one by one upon his memory.

"Ay," he said, "I remember now; I became drowsy, and——" Here he broke off with a start of astonishment. "But my phials—where are they? Oh, I remember; I locked them up." And he eagerly opened the drawer.

"Ah, the phials were there, and he counted them.

"Beladonna, aqua sophans, sulphate of mercury: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight. But the ninth! Where is the ninth? he exclaimed, in great excitement. "Stay! Ah! I left it on the table. No, it is not there." He looked round. The phial was gone.

The necromancer sank in his chair, utterly confounded. What could it mean?

No one had been there, he thought. Dame Charlot would not dare to meddle with his bottles; and if she had taken the phial, why should she want it to be to her, an old, ignorant fool? The very idea was absurd. And the strangers? No, that was even absurd in the highest degree. Some accident —the phial could not be found; and the old necromancer sat down again, stupefied with amazement and consternation.

He had sat thus but a few minutes when he was roused by a most appalling shriek from the room opposite; rapid, piercing, and full of the direst woe, it rang through the house. The hem et the young Spanish gentleman, half-dressed and in a state of the most frantic excitement.

"My wife! my wife! my dear wife! The wretches have poisoned her. She is dead! Oh, heaven! she is dead!" And the distracted husband seized the old man by the throat, and would have strangled him on the spot in the sudden access of his frenzied woe, but, who, attracted by the noise, had hurried from her own chamber, and held back Don Estevan by his shirts.

"Master! master! What is all this clamor?"

"He has murdered my wife! She is dead—dead, do you hear me?" he shrieked, in the fury of frenzy.

"Great God! what do I hear?" wailed out the frightened old woman, while Winter stood aghast, and utterly without power to utter a syllable. Then Don Estevan, seeing an arm of cash, plunged it into the chamber where his wife lay.

She was dead, and dead beyond all doubt. She had been one of the most beautiful of the beautiful sex livid and disfigured: her arms and breast were covered with large blue blotches. That there had been foul play no one could question. The small hands were stiff, and clutched the coverlid with convulsive agony; and in the repulsive corpse before them, not one of the spectators but would have recognized the beautiful invalid of the previous evening.

"Murderer! poisoners! infamous hag! accursed sorcerer! you have killed her with your devilish arts; killed her, and you would have killed me, too, but for my absence. But I will be avenged," said Don Estevan. And with the rage of a madman he grasped them both, but the excited cries of the household soon drew around all the neighborhood, and people poured in from every quarter.

The consternation was indescribable. Folks questioned and questioned without waiting to be answered. There was the wildest confusion, and tumult. Some scoured the raving husband, some appeared inclined to secure (but without daring to do so yet) the old necromancer, while others endeavored to console the pitiable grief of poor Dame Charlot, who was much more liked than feared, and consequently met with the least shade of consideration.

"How did it happen? Who is she? When did she come? Dame Charlot, tell us." Such was the burden of the mob who filled every room and passage of the house, while the dead lay unheeded, and could only sit and wring her hands.

In the midst of the hubbub and clamor, a voice said: "Send for the Hon' Doctor Frichon."

"Ay, and for Hans Frischer."

He was sent for and he came.

In a moment he was surrounded by a clamorous crowd, through whom he walked to the death-chamber.

"Is she dead, Herr Doctor?" "Poor dear, is she quite dead?" rose from a score of voices, and he gave forth a decided answer.

"She is dead," were the words which broke this solemn silence, and a wail of woe from the crowd was this reverence for the dead. It was contagious. Even the grave and lawyerly Jacob Frischer joined in the silence. Then Dr. Frichen spoke.

"She has died by some mineral poison. It will be my duty to send for the police."

A still more ominous silence followed. No one had thought of that, and many remained for a time in consternation.

"Let no one go, all of you," continued the doctor, "except you, Monsieur D'Estevan, and you, Winter, and you, Dame Charlot. The crowd left the dressed the old woman, he accompanied his words with a look of suspicion. Aside for those on whom the woman trembled, she knew not why.

Notwithstanding the natural curiosity of the crowd to see what would further happened, the doctor's words, though quietly spoken, were so authoritative, that they speedily caused them some volunteering to go for the police.

The news had already spread. All Antwerp was in an uproar; and whilst people were on their way to the house, the police, with the chief of them himself arrived, accompanied by the head of the police, and Hans Frischer, the coroner.

The doctor, who was the only calm person in the room, stated what he knew. He had hurried to the house on being summoned hastily, early from the bystanders.

Don Estevan had awakened early, and being anxious to hear of the state of his wife, and finding her still shivering, like a person in her chamber, the situation of which he knew, because he had himself carried her up-stairs on his arrival. There he had rushed out and collared the necromancer. This is all he knew.

"Did you use any last night?"

Again the poor old man admitted the fact.

"Well, where is the remainder of it?"

"Alas! alas! gentlemen, it is most strange; but I fell asleep whilst using it, and when I woke the bottle was no longer to be found."

The mayor and doctor exchanged glances.

"No! he declared he had not moved it.

"Why not?" Did say one, then, rob you?"

"Alas! I cannot comprehend it. No one has access to that room but Dame Charlot."

The doctor and mayor exchanged a second glance, and the latter spoke.

"Who administered the draught to this unfortunate lady?"

"Dame Charlot," said the necromancer.

"Ah!"

"Poor groaned Dame Charlot. "I took it in, gentlemen, to the dear lady, but she would not let me give it to her; she had said her devotions, and I left it on the table by her bed."

The spectators looked at these words in great distress, but Dr. Frichen put on a stern look.

"I remember now," he said, "that I, myself, inquired for the draught, but was told by this unhappy lady, you, Dame Charlot, were particularly anxious I should rely on you alone. And I respected the reason. Your master's love of gold is well known; you have always been in league with them. Poison was at hand, and the Schelcit flows near. I alone left the phial of aquafortis. Ah! you have, you have been disposed of. The case, to me, is clear. You are the murderess of Estevan."

"Oh!" shrieked poor Charlot, "I declare, by my hopes of heaven, I am innocent."

"It is for others to decide," coldly replied the doctor.

"Yes, yes," said the mayor, who began to think it was time to assert his dignity; "the case is clear, and——" Here, interrupting himself, "it is one of grave suspicion. You will both be detained in custody."

And hither, in spite of their cries and protestations, the necromancer and old woman were forthwith conveyed.

The populace had by this time gathered in large numbers, and having (as most often do), changed their opinion, received the unfortunate prisoners with loud hootings and shoutings: cries of "Down with the witch!" "Burn the accursed sorceress!" and the like.

In the midst of the tumult a great commotion was perceived at the outer gate of the city. The unfortunate Don Estevan, bursting from those who held him back, had left the house, leaped, and started through the crowd at a furious rate, and precipitated himself on the prisoners.

It was some moments before the storm of the past night, and the luckless husband sank at once beneath his blows.

His body was never recovered.

DISCOVERED TOO LATE.

Among six weeks have elapsed, and it is a fine day early in September.

Groups of citizens are standing together in the market-place, and around a large building which appears to possess for them some extraordinary interest. Inside, however, in the Town Hall, such the day is the day of the trial of Leopold Winter and Dame Charlot, for the murder of Marie, Countess Estevan, by poison.

"It will go hard with the miscreants, I warrant me," says a stout burgher, in the centre of a group, to which the reader reckoned a personage. "I was impromptue; "and rightly enough, too, I say, for we want no poisoning conjurors in this good city of Antwerp."

"You are in the right of it, Master Van Noordert," replies another personage; "and the more easily swayed, murmur their assent.

"I said I would have nothing of that old witch," shrilly exclaimed a stout, rosy-cheeked dame, with a pair of arms which were simply disgraceful.

"I would not let the roast jack basting, I know."

A sally of laughter followed this sally of the housewife's arms, and a loud, hearty voice cried out:

"Ay, trust a woman to run a woman down if she has the chance. You're wild, as I was wounded comrade; but for my part, I think the spite of Dame Charlot against the old lady was the cause against woman."

The dame who had spoken turned angrily toward the last bold speaker, and he would mayhap have come off worse than the first, but for a loud shout from that part of the crowd nearest the hall, which signified that the trial was over.

"The miscreant!—the sentence!—are they guilty?" cried a thousand voices.

"Ay, guilty."

"And the sentence?"

"The man to be burned alive; the woman to be confined for life!"

"Hurrah! hurrah!" And the air rang with a cheer from the whole of the vast multitude, which speedily spread to the outskirts of the city, as the first unfortunate condemned issued from the door of the judgment-hall, strongly guarded.

The trial had been short, but the evidence supposed conclusive.

The whole day had passed.

The respected Doctor Frichen had testified that he had been called in early on the last day of July to attend a lady who had been taken ill, and was a stranger to all of the male practice. He had inquired for a suitable nurse for her, and was exceedingly struck by the male present, which the strange prisoner volunteered to fill that situation. He had sent in two draughts, being ample medicine for a day. A murmur ! affecting some faint recollection of this, for she sat sorrowfully with her head bent down. Then the prisoner was found with but a few drops left in the bottle, which he tested himself (Herr Frichen), were found to contain aquafortis. The symptoms of the deceased were unmistakable. He also found to contain some of the same poison. From this it was inferred that the fatal draught had been given by the murderess intended to administer a second dose. "Perhaps," added the doctor, "by their counsel he could doubt that the first draught would prove fatal, the second might have been administered to insure it."

It was distinctly proved that the sole inhabitants of the house, except the servants, were Mr. Leopold Winter and Christ Latvee; and the latter was found secreted in the widow of both the unfortunate lady and gentleman supplied ample motive for their murder by man as well as woman, and was duly passed as Winter.

On the night of the murder the necromancer had, by his own confession, aquafortis in his possession. Further, he confessed that, contrary to his instructions, he had left the night. In the morning the aquafortis was missing, and both the bottles (one containing the draught) were found to have contained it. Then the female prisoner stated that, whilst sleeping during the night she went into the laboratory to her master (although she averred that the last time he was a servant, prepared the poison, and then left it to the old woman to administer it for a consideration of part of the gold to be acquired. Thus she became an accomplice. This evidence was deemed conclusive, and the judges were unanimous in condemning the male prisoner to be burned alive, a sentence to be burned alive in the market-place, and his ashes to be scattered to the four winds; and the old woman, in consideration of her sex and age, being, however, in a state of pregnancy, to some extent made a tool of, was awarded the mitigated punishment of imprisonment for life.

Within a week the horrible sentence on the poor old man was carried out in all its awful details, to the last protesting his innocence. Indeed, from the time of the murder until he was actually in the flames, he never ceased to call on Heaven under the influence of a dream. But the populace were under no impression. They had believed him guilty, and when he was brought out to die, they received his protestations of innocence with the aged victim to tears. He died confessing that he had been the victim of many wicked deceptive impostures, but solemnly called heaven to witness that he was guiltless of the foul crime of murder.

Dame Charlot, as soon as she heard that her poor old master was actually dead, fell into a severe, and, indeed, lingering illness, which left her upon her recovery from it, it was found that the mayor and doctor had given, when her sentence was then partially revoked, and as the old woman's character had left her no friends, she was confiscated to the State, the town council allowed the poor old creature (who was humanity to some of her late master's house, under the care of a middle-aged female as her attendant. In this house, then, about three months from the beginning of our story, the two women repaired.

On the very first night of their occupation of the old dwelling, the old dame and her attendant sat in the kitchen before three minutes had the worthy housekeeper had so consequentially boasted of, when, to the surprise of both, the Donna Estevan's last meal on earth. Perhaps the presence of her husband intellect from some faint recollection of this, for she sat sorrowfully with her head bent down. Then the prisoner was fire and watching the smoke curl slowly up the broad old-fashioned chimney. Her friendly attendant was also gazing upon the flames for their early tea, and stole now and then a glance at the poor creature's sadness. At last Dame Charlot broke the silence.

"Gretchen, are you here before?"

Willing to soothe her, Gretchen replied readily: "Yes, dame, I have; why should you think?"

"Because I remember to have seen you there. This is the house given you by the good council, you know."

"Council, council!" repeated Charlot, vacantly.

"Ay, dame; but come, draw up and drink this hot cup of coffee, it will cheer you there, I warrant me." And worthy Gretchen commenced pouring out the beverage. She had nearly finished their meal, when a sudden noise caused both the dame and Gretchen to start violently. Not so the elder woman; she looked on as if body and soul were about to part; with her faculties such as they were fixed on object in an obscure corner of the old kitchen.

There, in the dark corner, was busily engaged in pouring the contents of one phial into another! The old woman's eyes were fixed on the intruder with a devilish satisfaction, quite appalling.

The blood of Dame Charlot curdled in the veins of the unfortunate Dame Charlot. She sprang from her seat, and cried out:

"Bertram! Oh, the monkey!—the monkey! My poor unfortunate master. Thou art the murderer—the murderer!" And pouring out incoherently sentence after sentence, fell senseless on the floor.

The true murderer was found.

The excitement and tumult on the night of Donna Estevan's death, nobody had thought of the ape, who had been left to his own devices. The wily beast remembered that as the chatelain had left many the door on account of the heat, and was away, and the ape accomplished his design.

Hans Frischer, the coroner and son of the laboratory, as we described in our second part.

He was succeeded by Bertram, with the sagacity which distinguishes his tribe when they have been perpetrating mischief, left the bottles he had emptied of their contents where he had found them, and secreted the unlucky phial which had been the cause of all the mischief.

Dame Charlot at midnight found the bottles apparently untouched as she had left them, and unconsciously was the agent of destruction to the poor Spaniard and his wife. What was left of this tragedy.

Still, unfortunately, the second act of this tragedy, in which poor old Winter had played chief part, could not be recalled. The curtain fell on the first act.

Happily the third act was never performed.

Gretchen gave way for the time, and the house was soon full of sympathizing townspeople. The whole of the circumstances found that one of the two phials which he held when he swung round upon the ape was the identical one which had held the aquafortis.

For the second time Antwerp was in an uproar, and the upshot may be easily guessed. The old friend, Dame Charlot, recovered her reason (which, indeed, in most distressing cases are not rare), and she lived to see a hundred years. Gretchen married a young man who became a famous jeweler, to come and set up his trade in Antwerp. Gretchen, by dint of her industry and thrift, and diligence, and so: lived with her worthy young partner, till she died in her hundredth year, when it was found she had left all to him. He, grateful for many years—a misery grouping as empty pixel, with the motto, "Out of mischief seek fortune."

Thus was a monkey the cause of the death of eight human people, and the founder of a whole family's prosperity.

Truly out of evil often comes good.

SUGGESTED BY A PICTURE.

Come down! those shadowed sands invite,
And that soft glory on the Deep;
We breathe an atmosphere of light
Subtle as dew, and calm as sleep.

See, here and there, beyond the foam,
A sail is shining like a gem;
I think the boats are coming home—
Well linger down and look at them.

Not yet; the tide is shy, and stays
Just a few steps out of your feet;
It doubts, it trembles, it delays,
Yet all the while is stealing near.

The boats and we must wait its will;
Oh! please at patience! they to make (While we look them and lie still)
A hundred pictures for our sake.

Oh! happy patience! Not a hue
Can flutter through the changing air,
Or mold its cloud, or touch the blue,
That is not meant for them to wear.

And as they watch the glimmering sand
That warms the film within the foam,
They know the certain wave at hand—
The tender wave that lifts them home.

It comes—they pass—each turning sail
Is first a hope and then a blaze;
Come back, and dream a fairy tale
That hath a close as sweet as this!

CHAPTER XIX.—OVER THE CLIFF.

RAYMOND was well aware that the period of his existence must now be numbered by seconds, unless the heart of this treacherous ruffian should relent, whose sullen face was looking down from the cliff above on the flying spectres.

"There is still time, man," he gasped, "to reach down your arm, and save a fellow-creature from death, who is not fit to die. So help me, Heaven, I will forgive, nay, bless you, if you will!"

"Forgive me, Raymond Clifford!" replied the stranger, scornfully. "Nay, the debt is even still upon your side, and be sure I will exact it to the uttermost. You found a resting-place for me, which, perhaps, will last you (although, I am afraid, the nature of chalk is friable), while you listen to what I have to say."

Hideous: was Raymond's position, closely as the mysteries of futurity were grasping upon him, yet he could not but inquire of that watching, gloating face: "What devil, then, art thou?"

"My name, Gideon Carr," returned the stranger, hoarsely. Then Raymond's face grew white as the cliff to which he clung, and as damp with the dews of the terror of death, for he knew that he could expect no mercy.

"Ay, well may'st thou groan, young Raymond. It was your turn to think what you should say, Mildred Leigh from your brother's arms——"

"He never set you to do this," interrupted the doomed man, passionately. "I am sure He never did."

"You are right, sir. Your brother, being a lunatic, has no power to give away to plot revenge. But when you revenged Alice, you crossed the path of my sister Grace, and you had better have balked a tigress of her meat."

"But would you do murder for her sake, man? My arms are getting still, my fingers ache. God save us from murder heaven. Ah, save me, and yourself, too, by one good deed."

"Ay, it is but natural for one in your position to raise that cry of supreme," returned Gideon, coolly. "But for me, who am safe on the top here, I prefer to take a practical view of matters. You ask me why I would commit what you are pleased to describe as a murder, although nobody else will take that view of it. I parted from you a yonder "barrow," where you so impressed your intention of going by the Beacon for the sake of Grace. I was curious to watch this little story as we came along from that very place, and I think it will do capitally. My last words, as you see there, were: 'I pray, be careful of the cliff; you do walk so very near the edge, my dear Hepburn.' If your body is never found again, as you have now guaranteed it will in the case, when you little thought you were talking of yourself, then I need say nothing; and I am afraid you will suffer the inconvenience of being hinted at as we came along, which result from being denied the rights of sepulture. But if your body is found, then there is my little story to explain your latest mischance. But I am digressing, and you have no time to spare, I'm sure. You would say: 'Why slay me for your sister's sake, since I have not injured you?' But you have, Raymond Clifford; and, like Grace, I never forgive. Long ago, she and I together made up our minds that we would have Cliffe Hall; that the Cliffords of Cliffe should die out, and the Carrs rule there in their stead. Once get you out of the way, and marry Mildred to that poor fool, your brother, and we should have him, through that girl's influence, under our thumb; he would leave his lands to the proper persons; and having done so, would evince—but after a decent interval, so that there might be no dispute about his testament—such evident symptoms of lunacy as to cause him to be shut up—say at the Dune, in custody of his loving relatives. A nice plan, was it not, and yet you and this mine, my niece, chose to thwart it! Ah! if you had heard the vow Grace Clifford made upon that day you fled, it would have made your heart sink, and your cheek grow cold, even when you looked your bride. I always hated you; but when that pink-spoken, honest lad, forsooth, turned out a plotter, and a successful one, too, I thought mischief had come. I do believe, although she loves her wealth, she would give ten thousand golden pieces to stand where I do now, and know that both were slipping on the verge of death. 'Kill him!' cried she, on the very day when we found out your whereabouts, but a few weeks ago I am sure you did, Miss Gideon; and if it can be done, let him die some dreadful death! First take her protector from me——"

An involuntary shudder passed through Raymond's frame, and his face, wrinkled and wan as though with age, entered a new agony.

"Ho, ho! what! that pricks you, does it?" grinned the fiend. "Well, I tremble for your dainty, fair, young wife. You may safely leave her to her relatives young sir. Is she not our niece? Does not even her mother's name bear her mother's account? Did not she, like herself, run away from our good care, and marry in spite of us? Mrs. Hepburn is content to let Gideon's Cave to-morrow, she and the child, too. The spring-tide rises fast, you tell me, in these parts —ay! but that a stranger like myself might very well be caught by it. Nothing, indeed, could be more likely. Well, the tide does catch us; and after a resolute but unsuccessful attempt to rescue them—this is my second little story—I am compelled to swim away in order to save my own life. They, unfortunately, cannot swim. Now, you see, I have confided to you my whole programme, feeling confident that your sense of honor will prevent your revealing the particulars to any human creature. How surprisingly strong you must be in the arms, Raymond Clifford! I had no idea that I should have a listener so long; however, you are perceptibly slipping now. There is a deep sea-pool below you right, down which you will probably glide to your destination. It almost looks like a path, from here." She paused to gloat upon the man's hopeless victim, then continued: "Now, what would you not give, if I reached down my arms to you, and helped you to ascend once more? Is this a practical joke? What would you not give, I say, to grasp the hand of Gideon Carr, the lunch of whose wealth at this moment is more grateful than that of any other hand in Christendom—nay, almost any other in the world, for that matter? Come, what will you bid? Will you give Cliffe? Will you make over all that would be yours, by your brother dying without a will?"

"I will give you all I have," gasped Raymond, "but cliffe is not mine to give—it is my child's."

"Your child's! Is it not your own, remember!" cried Gideon, scornfully. "Listen to this most foolish gulliblenes; rabbits of like warren, prick their ears and run to their holes at the slightest sound. What a hand at bargaining is this unhappy gentleman, who has about a second or so to live! He will give anything, in fact, for the next piece of which I have already in my pocket! The door standing wide open, he wants to haggle with one about getting in at all. Well, Raymond Clifford, one can treat with a person of this character. You say generously, then, Raymond Clifford—you seem to me to be ex extremis. Your last words will be interesting. Have you got any bequest to make, or any message to send by word to one person—namely, my sister Grace. I will send them to her by to-night's post, I promise you, with the details of your decease added."

"Tell her, then," said Raymond, speaking with labored breath, "that I bequeath to her the punishment of her own conscience. You smile; but the hour will come when it will take effect. I know it as surely as I know what fate awaits me when I relax my grasp upon this rock. May that hour, that ancient race, of whom she has been the evil star, cling to her as it has clung to us! May she inherit what we have left! May the curse has pursued us through so many generations!"

"Your good wishes shall be faithfully transmitted," returned Gideon, mockingly. "I will be own to you they are unlikely to bear fruit. My sister Grace is the wisest woman I know, and the last to be affected by the curses of the ancient Cliffords. Why, look you, the Cliffords were always boastful of their genealogy, yet not one of them ever thought of the curse which you are now awaiting you! I do not often joke; but upon occasions of this sort, dulce est desipere in loco; that is to say, it is well to be merry on the brink of a precipice."

"Thou art he, Gideon Carr," replied Raymond, solemnly, though speaking with great effort, "from whom I was warned, of the precipice of Death. Well mayst thou shrink and grow pale. I tell thee, I myself, a dying man, can mark the terrible change which is coming over thee, the token of Black Doom that stands behind thee—close."

Involuntarily, and with a face almost as white as that of his victim, Gideon Carr glanced over his shoulder.

The next moment he was gone.

Beneath him were the marks in the wet cliff where the poor man had struggled and clung, and the falling lumps had given way during that instant, and the body had slipped down the slope to the verge of the waters. Hence a hound had until now been heard save the voices of the two men, in that unequal talk; but now, as though, released from some horrible spell, the thousand sea-birds which had been sitting upon the ledges or hovering above the nests seemed to send forth one great cry of horror and alarm, and up they came swirling from the abyss below, with scream on scream, and circled round in the clear blue like wreaths of snow, as though appealing to high heaven for murder done. The silent warren shone with timorous eyes; from every burrow stared a harmless face, which ne'er till now had looked upon a crime: and what seemed worst of all, the rusty semaphore, noiseless heretofore, began to shake and creak, as if the accusing winds swept by, and bade it point them out the murderer.

Gideon Carr, to do him justice, was not one to shrink from such a conflict, man to man, or even against odds; but he was by nature like his brother, superstitious. Of religion he had none, and was the last man to sigh (if one may say so) of the worst part of religion, which finds divinity in hate instead of love, and clasps pale Fear in its arms instead of Hope. He looked to right, and worse, instead of the dawning of the eternal day. He feared, as Clement said, neither God nor man. But his mind, which could see nothing in the firmament or in the ocean to suggest a Creator, was nevertheless filled with a sense of power and of unlearned. The sight of the dead man, even after the shape of "a coal out of the fire;" the touch of a corpse, would fill him with fore-boding, and the chatter of a jay, with joy; secretly I say, for he was ashamed of these weaknesses of his, and it was only very rarely that he betrayed to others the fact of their existence. It is also fair to add, that, like most people similarly circumstanced, he had been prevented by any portent from committing a bad action, or constrained by any omen to perform a good one. When that stranger was committed, however—as now—which he happened to have in hand, Gideon Carr's face was grey to his superstition; and moved by he knew not what, except that it was no sting of remorse or touch of compassion, he fled precipitately from strange sights and sounds that filled earth and air about Harmouth Beacon, and which his own act seemed to have evoked, with a fleet foot and a wet brow.

CHAPTER XX.—A SECOND WARNING.

NOTHING, except seeing her husband return safe and sound, could have been a gladder sight to Mildred Hepburn on that fatal morning than what she did see within an hour or so of Raymond's departure—namely, the lonely, sympathizing face of Mrs. Carey. The lieutenant accompanied her from the cottage in the slender hope that the two pedestrians might not have started; but finding that they had gone, he returned to the presence of Mildred, whose grief, growing his pains, although not without a good-humored laugh at Mildred's foolish fears. He left a little portmanteau behind him, and said: "Good-by, Mildred," "please to let me put in your room, Mildred."

"What!" replied that poor lady, attempting to be peculiar, "I am not going so valuable that you dare not leave it at home, but have brought it to the fastness of Pampas Cottage, garrisoned so strongly by myself and little Jane the nurse-maid!"

"Well," returned Mrs. Carey, kissing her, "the fact is, it's your husband's wish, and just a few things for a couple of nights, which I have invited myself to pass with you, my dear, until Mr. Hepburn returns. I'm sure you'll be glad to have in such a fright about nothing."

"Oh, I am glad, Mrs. Carey," cried Mildred, "this is more than kind indeed. And, ah! me," she involuntarily added, "how little have I deserved it at your hands."

"Bless us, and save us!" exclaimed the honest lady, "one would think you had done me and the lieutenant some injury, child."

"And so we have," exclaimed Mildred, passionately; "for to mistrust the honest, and to deceive the trusting, is to do both wrongfully. I feel as I have never felt before—so lonely, desolate, friendless—I must tell you all about it, or I shall go out of my mind."

"Stay, my dear," said Mrs. Carey, kindly, but placing a finger upon her friend's eager lips; "you must not tell me anything in a hurry, and particularly when your husband is not here. I have long known—although I do not know if others suspect it—that you have some burden about with you, deep in your loving heart. But I do not blame you for it, and unless I can help you to carry it, I do not wish to know its nature."

"But you can help me, my dear friend, and you alone," returned Mildred, looking before you scores and scores of times. Ah, what have I not suffered from your love and kindness! Like some imprisoned bird, seeing through glass the same shine and the trees, but feels that between him and them an invisible wall of cryptal intervenes. Such has been to me a secret between loving hearts. And yet—although I know my husband would not mind, for he has read so much, I seem to feel that I have told it to him and so much, I seem to wish I had never spoken. Things are better as they are, perhaps. It is such a sad, sad story."

"Nay, then, Mildred, I must hear; come out into the cool fresh air. The open air is best for sorrow, for Dame Nature's hand, though rough, is kindly Mildred, and will soothe it to rest."

"You! dear Mrs. Carey—well, dear Marion, if you will have it so—why, what can you know of sorrow?"

"Not much, thank God, my friend," replied Mrs. Carey, gravely, "and if He seems to you to have been good to me, who know not what He has done for a poor orphaned, friendless girl, how much more gracious and benign should He seem to me? No, dear, as you say, I have no sorrow; there is no room within my heart for sough but thankfulness."

"And, Love. I am sure that there is room for Love," said Mildred, tenderly.

"Yes, dear. It would be strange, indeed, if He, who is Love's self, should have withheld that precious gift." And yet Mrs. Carey sighed. "You know, I hope, that John is dearer to me far than life—my father, husband, benefactor, friend—my all in all; a blessing for which I bless God every day. But we were never boy and girl together like Mr. Hepburn and yourself, and when I marry a child I must be a child myself, I suppose, dear."

"Marry, you," she interrupted herself, smiling, "I am like yonder Pampas grass, that has everything comfortable and sunny about it, with an attendant in white mantle to keep it moist and green, but which has but little or no bud in spring-time."

"Ay, but in autumn, when the flowers fade and die," cried Mildred, "it blossoms in a hundred feathery sprays, and none of them will perish, even though they be gathered from the stalk."

"Yes, dear, I know," said Mrs. Carey, quietly; "they are the memories we have about the house (then, as you say, there are no flowers to be got), although their blossom is gray."

The two women did not speak for a little, but each held the other's hand. Then Mildred led her guest to a sheltered corner, where a seat was cut out in the cliff.

"I think I will tell you my story now," whispered she.

So hand in hand they sat, with their fair faces first in shadow, then in sunshine, then in shade again, as the storm grew to afternoon. Mildred Clifford told her tale from first to last.

"I am anxious, fearful, without reason!" ended she. "Have we not been so full, with a few such as this sunt of mine?"

"Many cases," returned Mrs. Carey, gravely, "and much need for friends. No harm is done at present, but I wish you had told us this before. You hesitate?"

"What! You will not tell him?" cried Mildred, starting from her seat. "Oh, what will Raymond say?"

"He will say I should have no secrets from my husband," replied the other, firmly. "No, sone, Mildred, never. Your secret is not one which you can trust now, and which should have been his and mine alone, but that I say you needed some great confidence to draw forth your own hidden fears. John would have given you helpful counsel, for, though he is trusting and simple about his own affairs, he is both wise and keen when acting for others."

"He could not picture to woman like my sister," said Mildred, with a shudder; "no one else who does not know her—so relentless of purpose, so unscrupulous in means, and actuated by such deadly hate."

"Ay," returned Mrs. Carey, musing, "to be foiled by a child, and she half through a new instrument—that must have been worrying to such a one as you describe. A woman that knows no law nor fear is dangerous indeed. Yet—you seem to dread some physical harm—is it possible that she would incur the risk of——"

"To slay her end," interrupted Mildred, solemnly, "Grace Clifford would dare the gallows."

"Nevertheless, you have done wrong, and very wrong," pursued Mrs. Carey, "to hide yourselves away, and so let her know you fear her."

"It was not I, Mildred, in low and broken tones. "My husband would have defied her to the last. But I—I know her so well."

"And your own child!" cried Mrs. Carey, tenderly. "This woman has done you harm enough already, but to endanger your unborn should be a sufficient triumph to the revengeful. And yet, if you lived under your own roof, you would have to fear it always, and if your aunt was known to wish you ill, it would not be risk she would be running, did she work it out with all the certainty of design. But the blow she aimed at you would scarcely fall before the arm would be pointed out that struck it. But now, if you had told me all this before, Mildred," your husband, your child, yourself might be involved in some sudden catastrophe, the cine of which you would be responsible for so to discover. I do not wish to terrify you, Mildred, but I do think you have taken the very means——" Hark! did you not hear the garden wicket go?"

"I did," gasped Mildred, starting up, and running into the cottage, at the back of which was the garden, in which they had been sitting. I did; and little Milly is playing in the garden all alone!"

Mrs. Carey followed, not without some undefined misgiving, although she noticed nothing beating thick and fast. The visitor, however, was no one more formidable than a curly-headed boy with a basket containing a few fresh eggs and Lucky Bay, bringing with him fresh eggs and other delicacies from Westportown. This after, Mrs. Carey's boy was without the basket, and bore in its place a large leathern bag, suspended from his shoulder.

"Please, ma'am, the letter-carrier have been took ill this morning," observed he, grinning, "and I'm a-doing the postman for him: only, what with driving here and there, and then back again, because of missing somebody out, and likewise the bags being heavy, I'm afeard I'm rather late. Here's a letter for Mr. Hepburn, ma'am, and that's all."

And off trotted the deputy deliverer of his Majesty's mails.

A bill from Westportown, I suppose," said Mildred, carelessly, recognizing the somewhat typographical address; "and yet does not this word in the corner look to you like 'immediate,' Mrs. Carey?"

"It is as like as the writer can make it," returned that lady, confidently. "How unfortunate that your husband did not get it before his departure."

"Perhaps I had better open it," said Mildred; "something may have to be done at once. I hope it is not from Harmouth about the boat, or he may have taken his journey for—no Great Britain, you say?"

"Bavair of the man calling him Stevens, who loges, I believe, with the coast-guard."

"York Well-street—Stevens at Bayeux."

"And Raymond has gone with him alone!" cried Mildred, passionately. "I shall never see his bright and glorious face again!"

It was terrible to see how the light faded out of her own features as she spoke, and how the large and lustrous eyes lost all their light, as the note fell from her nerveless hand, and fluttered to the ground."

Mrs. Carey picked it up, and scanned it closely. "Never be frightened by an anonymous letter, Mildred; it is almost always the weapon of the base and cowardly. Suppose this Stevens is an honest man, after all?"

"No," replied Mildred, with a shudder, "I will not suppose that. Dame Nature, whom you praised just now, has told me otherwise too plainly."

"Still, man to man, your husband is more than a match for him."

"Yes, but unsuspecting——"

"Nay, not so, Mildred," interrupted the other; "look you, your well-wisher, as before. This is not, then, the first warning that your husband has received."

"True, true; and that explains why he now sleeps with a loaded pistol beneath his pillow. I would that he had taken his weapon with him that unhappy day."

"Stay, Mildred; there is need of judgment here; there must be no rash leaping to conclusions. You do not know what schemes, what treacheries are ever working about us, base and wretched designing. I do not think it, of course—let me not offend you by what I say—but has your husband any connection with those who call themselves Freetraders? I do not ask you to betray confidence—ah! John, else." I am not blind to your own anxieties, child, if we have Milly with us, I shall take one of our men from Lucky Bay to help to carry her, if we——"

"Is my friend in danger, Mary, Mildred," my mind seems feeble as my limbs. I cannot think at all, but only suffer. Oh, my husband, my little one, too; yes, you are right, she shall not go with us to-morrow."

"That's a wise woman! Now Mildred is like herself again. But one whole day, and you will have your husband back, I promise you; and in the meantime, fear not for your child. The lieutenant has had a word from me, and will watch the man as a cat watches a mouse. A hundred brave heart-strings will be ever near to him, and "Then I go with you, Mildred, that is certain; nay, but I do. You are rather obstinate, my dear, sometimes, and you must contend with me, now. I have made up my mind to anything, you are Doolity personified—sah John, else." I am not blind to your own anxieties, child, if we have Milly with us, I shall take one of our men from Lucky Bay to help to carry her, if we——"

"Is my friend in danger, Mary, Mildred," my mind seems feeble as my limbs. I cannot think at all, but only suffer. Oh, my husband, my little one, too; yes, you are right, she shall not go with us to-morrow."

"That's a wise woman! Now Mildred is like herself again. But one whole day, and you will have your husband back, I promise you; and in the meantime, fear not for your child. The lieutenant has had a word from me, and will watch the man as a cat watches a mouse. A hundred brave heart-strings will be ever near to him, and no one knows better than you, Mildred, that they are not know for good: but, being warned, his hand is like a vice to grip the wicked. Woe, therefore, to the wicked woman and her child beneath John Carey's eyes! This Stevens is a very wicked, crafty villain, you may depend on it, and whom he has now to deal is keen, although not cunning; and as for boldness, I do indeed believe my husband would, if need be, go to heaven—in the cause of honor or duty—defy a lion."

Mrs. Carey laughed, but, while she spoke, the fire of honest pride gave place to tears in her eyes, and made her pleasant face one glory.

"So, Mildred, without being very brave ourselves, we have brave men to protect fear. Come, you must have some tea, and then to bed; and this young lady, too, must be persuaded to rest. Yes, since such late hours are bad for her complexion."

I think unto the house of sorrow there is no human blessing equal to a breezy-minded woman, tender at heart, but chary of her tears, ready to listen to woe, but not to indulge it, and therefore careful to fulfill the ordinary duties of the house, whatever earthquake may have shaken the pillars of its peace.

The night passed, thanks to Mrs. Carey, without alarms; and when, the next day at noon, the two friends in question met the man who was sent for by a short cut to the cliffs above the Mermaid Cavern, the clouds of evil foreboding had thinned, and but a little sunshine struggled through to flood its way to Mildred's heart. It was a lovely day, for the sea-birds were out in numbers, and were welcoming everywhere the presence of the Spring; the wild flowers had thrown off their winter robes, and all the incense-breathing earth was bright and glad. Now their road lay through lanes with fir-trees, whose branches were already thick with flowers, and where, overhead, the pale tendrils of hawthorn and wild rose were twining to kiss; and now it climbed some hill-top, from whose summit the sea, the cliffs, and the moors, with hail and hamlet, church-tower and low white farmhouse, wood lined with green, were seen.

"This is the third time," said Mildred, appreciatively, when they had reached a considerable height, "that, looking back, I have perceived this man yonder. He pretends to be gathering wild flowers sometimes, but I do not like his following us in this manner. When we pass Mr. Jasper's farm, we must tell him that he must recede more."

"Fool, good, my dear. Do not flatter yourself that the gentleman is so interested in our proceedings," said Mrs. Carey, laughing. "He has been escorted us already, and has taken that path across the hills."

"I am heartily glad of it, Marion; for now that you have put me in better hope about dear Ray-mond, I am ashamed to have given to be alarmed about ourselves. I almost wish that we had got the gentleman to come with us, for then he could have brought little Milly."

The hours, however, more beauties on all sides; and now the banks decrease and become green and rounded as the road diverges from the turf track, and presently is lost upon the boundless down. It was, by-and-by, the music of the unseen sea, breaks in upon the inland harmonies, and the scented air grows fresh.

"Now, my dear, dear Mildred; we must not tarry now; it is long past three."

These words of Mrs. Carey's startled a disinclination evinced by her companion to arrive at their destination; a scared and hare-like look had once more taken possession of her, as though she beheld some object of fear behind her about her.

"Did you not hear some sound like a human voice, Marion?"

"Yes, love; our west winds are full of such cries," returned Mrs. Carey, coolly. "Wave I first came to live in these parts, I used often to open the bedroom window, both before and after the gales, under the impression that some one lay outside in pain. The sea, too, is getting very loud: I think it must be very near high tide."

"Then we ought to be at the cavern long before that, were we not?"

"Yes, if we took Milly to see it; but not otherwise. Why should we trouble to descend the cliff, with this child to carry. We have only to guide Mr. Stevens home. He cannot mistake the only path that leads from the moors, and when he has got up, he cannot fall——"

"There he is, then," replied Mildred, hastily. "How my heart beats—how my knees tremble! But what is he trying down to?"

"That is not he," returned Mrs. Carey, confidently; "it is a larger man than even he."

"Yes, certainly, I can discern it now. It is the very person who has been tracking us all the way, and who has been lurking across the hedges and fields. Marion, my friend, we are betrayed, and it is I who have betrayed you. Save me, Mary Carey, and you forgive me; your husband never will, I know."

"I think he will," rejoined the lieutenant's wife, laughing, "for I have known Andrew, one day for his man. I did not feel so brave as you did about this expedition at starting, so I begged to have a companion, and he volunteered one. It was I who beckoned him, behind your back, to take the fieldpath, but now I do not believe that he saw me. Be vexed, are you, Mildred?"

"No, my friend, my beyond all words can say," answered Mildred, fervently.

So, as a matter of fact, they were now at the cavern, and came forward to meet them.

"Have you seen anything of Mr. Stevens?" inquired Mrs. Carey. "Is it possible that he could have missed us after coming up the cliff?"

"I have seen nothing of him. If your head can stand looking over here, you will see that yonder boat is from Lucky Bay, and, except at low tide, one cannot get round either point. The man must have come overland. He was to have come up here on the Down, we must have seen him. There is no shelter except that way that he can come by."

"But it is now nearly high tide, Robert, and he cannot possibly be in the cavern."

"Not unless he be a merman, ma'am," assented Andrew, touching his hat, and trying, by his air, though in apology for joking before his superior. "My own belief is that he has returned over the cliff, and was landed a good way short of this. He will be down to-morrow or even Lucky Bay by that time."

"Back at Sandsby!" cried Mildred, with clasped hands; "then he may even now be at the cottage! Home, home, for Heaven's sake! Why did I ever leave my child?"

With that she turned, and began to retrace her steps, impatient to hear with comfort the lieutenant's wife was endeavoring to find for her. Andrew, with a look of wonder, from observing words; it was pale and full of apprehension; and they had gone but a very little distance, when, sure enough, they perceived the accursed sea, rising fast, and already devoured the shore, and was sucking, with greedy lips, the very cliff, she hastened after her friend.

CHAPTER XXII.—THE EMPTY HOME.

THE road which the two ladies had taken from Sandby to the Down, above the Mermaid's Cavern, was, for the most part, in companionship with that along the cliff top, was several miles in length, and as Mildred, now, in her anxiety, walked on, as though it would never end. Her eyes were blind to its beauties, or, if they were conscious of them, it was only to calculate how much of the tedious way still stretched before her. She was not long in discovering another object of fear. Carey, or the honest sympathy of Robert Andrews, accomplished her fears. Her maid had parted with her heart before her to the cottage and its precious occupant, and left unguarded, it seemed, seeming that she herself was standing between it and the blessed child. She felt like some unmanned mother, who, having set forth with his forces to offer battle, learns that the foe has got between him and his defenseless town, where the women and children have been left, and, by forced marches, is returning unutterable things; and as, to his anxious eyes, it is something to see the very hedges running, so not a mere heap of smoking ruins, so, when she first caught sight of the little white cottage and fair as ever, with the blue smoke from the kitchen chimney streaming in the wind (the pensive fancy shown that Gooseberry Comfort is aboard), and all its windows open to the sun, her wild lips moved, as though in prayer, to speak to another ear, and with one long sigh she dismissed half her terrors.

"I suppose Milly is in the kitchen, begging for scones," said Mildred, in a low voice, for her own thoughts need endorsement; "cook always spoils the darling. Why do you not speak, Marion?"

"I was looking at that white thing on the roof, in the window at the attic; there is somebody waving a handkerchief.

"Yes, I see it. That is Jane's bedroom; she is dressing, and the child is with her, doubtless; she is always in a hurry when she goes out, that is all."

The mother's tremulous words sorted ill with her confident words, and Mrs. Carey did not reply. As they drew nearer, they heard Jane singing:

"Let me out—let me out, ma'am; he has locked me in."

Without interrogating her further, the two ladies ran forward, and found the attic door closed against them. "He has taken the key with him," said Mrs. Carey, "and locked us out, and you must bust it in."

"Stand back, Mrs. Robert Andrews," cried the lieutenant's wife. "Can you break this door open at once, without a moment's delay?"

"I can, ma'am, I rather think I can;" returned the coast-guardsman, with a twinkle in his eyes, "if you'll please to stand back from them, at any phase."

Then, raising his foot—the earliest battering-ram in the long roll of warlike instruments—he brought the sole of his boot down upon the simple lock. Away flew staple and screw-heads, as though impelled by a charge of powder, and the door flew in. Little Jane, sitting on her own bed, in stays, with bare-pence-halfpenny tight boots on, and all her pocket-handkerchief in the other!

"I couldn't clip it, ma'am," sobbed she; "indeed, indeed, I could not. Who would have thought of my harm in a horgan-grinder, with money hanging all round and round, and one of 'em a playing on the piano!) And poor dear little Milly so pleased—I felt quite obliged to give him what I could spare; and I ran up here for the money having first promised something amazing with children, and he pretending to be so kind; and he must have followed me with me, unless I'm in a dreadful notion' till he locked the door upon me, and then went down and carried off that beautifullest child! Oh! 'ere you seen anything of her, and where is the wicked villain, though, my family, ma'am? It ain't, it ain't, indeed!"

"What! the man take my child away, girl?" asked Mrs. Hepburn, hoarsely.

"Oh, missis, two hours ago, ma'am. You see, cook she went down to Sandby after some shrimps for, leastwise, after George Brown, for it's no use telling lies in a time like this, and I must tell 'em. Milly were left quite alone; and while we was a-talking in the garden she should come and tell him Lucky Bay but this here man with the money, and offered a sight of it—such a sight as I never before seed! And when he had shown it to me and made me look at it, I watched him with the little darling on his shoulder, and he gave me a sixpence, telling the road across the Downs to Westportown; but though I screamed and hollered, and acquire my head out at the hill and shouted, this answer my questions truthfully and sensibly; thereby you will be doing what you can to regain the child as has been happened, and if you ever, to your recollection, see this organ-man again——"

"Never, never, never!" answered the girl, hysterically.

"You do not think it possible that it could even be anybody you have seen before, in disguise; now, for instance, to me upon the terrace a while ago, and spoke to me upon the lawn—that Mr. Stevens, for——"

"I did not see the gentleman not to remember him, ma'am; but he was a tall, fair man, with a cruel face (though I didn't think so at the time), and he had gray eyes and grizzled hair."

"That is Stevens," said Mrs. Carey, thoughtfully.

"Ay, and more than enough," groaned the wretched mother. "My Milly has been in his power these two hours."

"Ay, but he has the organ to carry and the child to carry," reasoned the lieutenant's wife. "Do you, Robert, take the road to Westportown, and make inquiries; but first, Jane, tell us, briefly, no matter whither he has gone. Give my husband's card to the chief constable, and tell him to spare no expense. Be off, my lad, at express. Your mates have been lost already."

"Ay, ay," the coast-guard replied, and the willing giant was upon his way.

Mildred sank down on the floor, and, huddled together like some poor wretch who feels the teeth of the frost, there she sat, shivering. Her own sorrow was so great that she knew not what had happened the corroboration of her worst forebodings, or the particular direction which the hawk is in the air, so she shrank beneath this unmistakable sign of the displeasure of her Aunt Grace. Mrs. Carey dared not leave her in this condition (since the nurse-girl was more than useless), nor, had she done so, could help have been rendered to the child. Mrs. Robert Andrews at Sandby would have done the bidding of the lieutenant's wife, or even listened to her, so bitter was the grief of the poor mother; but Jane—Jane, or some messenger of his, upon the westward road, would have found nothing but a few silver birches, thin and bowed, and the wild waste of down, and around, that wailing sea, ever moaning more. Once only she whispered to the girl: "Did Milly go with this man willingly?"

"Yes, ma'am, she did so, and though of course it was the dancing figures which mainly pleased her, the pretty little dear child seemed sorry to say to him from the first."

"Sorry to say farewell," mused Mrs. Carey.

After many a weary hour, the coast-guardsman returned. He had seen figures in the distance like child-stealer; but the constables were on the alert and the alarm had been given far and wide, and he had seen the figures in a cart, in which had been so fatally attractive to the stolen girl, and had been forced to a dirty scare half a mile away.

Mildred listened to what he had to say, without the blank despair upon her face taking any impress. She knew that, by the time the police-force could scarce have been brought to her. Later in the evening, as they sat in the little parlor with the door open, Mrs. Carey observed that she could knit without them, and the gloom was dear to Mildred's eyes, and Jane ordered the truant cook. "Having a few hours," exclaimed she, "Your mistress thought you had a walk with Mr. Brown in the Good Intent, and the wind, having carried you down in quite good time is contrary when coming back, that they had been delayed three long; also, when they did land, and had recovered your senses, you were hurried her," and she had been obliged to——

"We know all," interrupted Mrs. Carey, sharply, and making an imperious sign that she should leave the room. Jane, after a few minutes, she herself arose, and going into the kitchen, said: "Your mistress thought you were about to speak just now of her poor child's being stolen; but if there is any new misfortune, tell it to me between here and the door, my bad things about Mr. Hepburn."

"Nothing, ma'am, not about him."

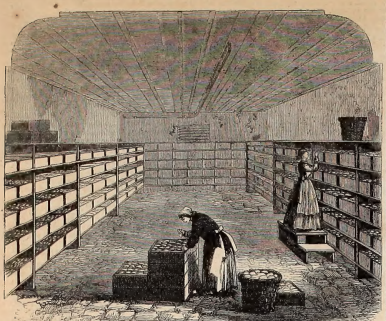
With a great sigh of relief, Mrs. Carey listened to the narration of the unfortunate, impetuous, egotistical, didactic, as it is the manner of her class to be, poor Jane, whose errors were any conscious of being in disgrace, as though they were the highest virtues in a nurse-girl.

Having heard all, she returned to her childless friend.

"Am I not right, dear Mildred, in supposing that of the bitter draught you have to drain, the bitterest drop is that which you have poured upon whom you have been warned, and against whom you have been armed? Is it not so, Mildred?"



"Yes, that my Milly should be in his clutches shows all too clearly how weak are we and the hapless mother. "No other could be half so cruel; no other ever frightened my lost darling by his very looks before."

"Ay, so I thought, my love. Now, Milly was not frightened at this man, who seemed to have a kind way with him, according to Jane's story. I thought that this had in it some seed of hope; and now I have just heard——"

"Just what?" cried Mildred, clasping her feverish hand.

"Something that makes it quite impossible that the man who stole your Milly could be Stevens."

AN ENGLISH METHOD OF RAISING POULTRY.

1. THE EGG-ROOM.

HOW THE ENGLISH RAISE POULTRY.

We travel by steam, cook and wash by steam, do almost everything that comes within the range of human effort by steam: why not eat by steam likewise? We have almost reached that point; at least we provide for our tables by steam, and are only awaiting some new development of ingenuity to enable us to dispense entirely with the necessity of getting dinner, the expense of marketing, and the sundry inconveniences of boarding-houses.

Even the process of poultry-raising is in some places carried on by steam, and so definite are the results, that the old adage, "Don't count your chickens before they are hatched," has lost all its force. In England the business has been reduced to a perfect system, and large establishments are devoted to it as a special and profitable branch of industry. In this country we still leave these matters to the fowls themselves, allowing each hen to determine the size of her own family, where she shall make her nest, etc. On this page we give illustrations showing the interior arrangement of one of these establishments, in which everything is done by rule and is reduced to system. Let us glance at the various apartments as they are here presented.

1. The Egg-room.—The eggs keep best when deposited in a dry, clean place, equally sheltered against extremes of heat and cold.

Perfect order reigns in this department in the arrangement of the boxes, each of which bears the date of its arrival in the room, so that the age of any box of eggs can always be accurately ascertained. An account is also kept of the delivery of each box disposed of; and by a simple, series of entries in a book kept for that purpose, the transactions of this department may at any moment be ascertained at a glance.

A corner is reserved for eggs selected for hatching, and means are provided for preserving them until the season arrives when they become scarce and dear.

2. The Seed-room.—The arrangements of this room demand much care and foresight, so as to secure the preservation of grain and meal, &c., from the various sources of injury to which they are liable, and the depredations of vermin.

The bins for keeping a small stock of bran and meal in are double compartments. They present some peculiarities of construction. Each compartment has two distinct covers—one, of wire gauze, which may be locked, while the wooden one is left open, thus affording ventilation and security at the same time.

3. The Kitchen.—The kitchen adjoins the seed-room, for convenience, and is appropriated to cooking the various articles of food given to the poultry. It contains a furnace, boating two coppers, and the cooking is performed by steam, and hot air from the furnace is conveyed by pipes to other parts of the building where it may be required, such as the hatching-room, the hen-house, etc.

4. The Hatching-room.—On one side of the room, and partly at one end, the nests are arranged upon a double dresser placed against the wall, near together, but not touching each other.

The nest-baskets are of osier, measuring on the inside, in length, fifteen inches; breadth, twelve inches at top, and nine inches and a half at bottom; depth, ten inches. They have each a cover, and are accompanied by a piece of flannel of the same size as the cover.

A table with drawer, a thermometer, a register-book and writing materials, and a little cupboard, completes the furniture of this room, which can be warmed and darkened to any degree required. Its position secures the necessary quietude.

On the outside of the hatching-room, in the southern face of the building, and protected from the weather by an overhanging gallery, two rows of twelve coops each are inserted in the wall, in which the sitting hens are placed to be fed.

The arrangement is shown in the engraving of the hatching-room, where the coops are on the left wall. By this plan, the persons charged with the care of the sitting hens have no need of going out of the hatching-room to take the birds to be fed, or to fetch them in when their repast is concluded. Each coop affords a space of sixteen inches in height by fifteen inches in breadth.

During incubation, a screen divides the hatching-room into two parts, so that the going and returning, while conveying the sitting hens to the coop and returning them to their nests, are not a source of disturbance or annoyance to the others.

2. THE SEED-ROOM.

In this room every operation is carried on with the utmost quietness.

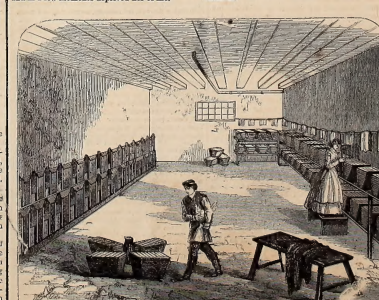
The food is all prepared for the hens before they are put into the coops; these must be kept scrupulously clean.

The system is said to prove successful in every respect, so far as a constant supply of chickens and pecuniary results are concerned, and doubtless some enterprising Yankee will soon introduce an improved method in this country.

THE CAT IN A WATER PIPE.

ANIMAL instincts and passions oftentimes closely resemble human traits intensified. In adapting means to ends in the display of cunning and shrewdness, the animal frequently exhibits a remarkable facility, imitating very closely the reason and skill of man himself. The following incident illustrates this fact quite distinctly: The association of dogs together for the purpose of hunting is by no means an unusual occurrence, so that, by combining their efforts, they are more certain of their prey than if each one pursued it alone. In many towns of Southern Europe there is an immense number of dogs wandering about without owners, greatly to the annoyance of strangers who have occasion to visit those localities. At Palermo, among these idle wanderers, were two particularly distinguished for their animosity to cats.

One day they were in pursuit of a cat, which, seeing no other place of refuge near, made her escape into a long earthen water-pipe, which was lying on the ground. These two inseparable companions, who always supported each other, pursued the cat to the pipe, where they halted and consulted what was to be done to deceive and get possession of their enemy. After they had stood a short time, they divided, took post at each end of the pipe, and began to bark alternately, to give the cat reason to suppose they were both at one end, and to induce her to come out. This really astonishing cunning soon had a successful result, and the cheated cat left her hiding-place. Scarcely had she ventured out, when she was seized by one of the dogs; the other hastened to his assistance, and in a few moments deprived her of life.



3. THE KITCHEN.

CANNIBAL FORKS AND COOKING POTS.

THE practice of cannibalism, so frequent fifty years ago, is gradually disappearing before the progress of civilization and Christianity, and is now rarely known. It seemed to arise from a savage instinct that delighted in thus taking revenge upon an enemy, and it was often attended by wild orgies too gross for description. The vessels used in the preparation of a cannibal's feast were not employed for any other purposes, being strictly tabu. Our illustration on page 237, shows some of the cooking-pots and forks of the Fijis, as described by Mr. Williams, a missionary among those people. They are simple and rude in their construction, the pots being made of clay, hardened by baking, and the forks of wood and bone.

A CEYLON OIL MILL.

HUMAN ingenuity always keeps pace with man's necessities, and the more numerous our wants, the more readily we devise means of satisfying them. The contrast between the rude and simple contrivances of barbarous nations, and the almost intelligent devices of modern civilization, indicates this progress the race has made; and as we look at the implements used by uncultivated nations, we can hardly believe them sufficient for the ordinary purposes of life. Our illustration shows a mill used in Ceylon for expressing the oil of the cocoa-nut, a flourishing branch of trade in that country. It consists of the trunk of a tree, hollowed into a mortar, in which a heavy, upright pestle is worked round by oxen, yoked to a transverse beam. The natives erect these mills under the shade of the palm groves, near their houses, and though they are rickety, creaking affairs, they serve their purpose quite effectually. Of course they would not comport with Yankee notions of thrift, but the Cejlonese, being less progressive, are quite content with this approximation to machinery.

4. THE HATCHING-ROOM.

WHY is a stock gambler like a railroad train? Because he may be expected to smash up at any moment.

Mrs. Castleton's First Quarrel.

"DEAR me, how stupid you are, Philip!" said the elegant Mrs. Castleton pushed back her untasted cup of coffee with most unladylike emphasis. "Do you suppose anything would tempt me to disgrace both you and myself by attending Julia Winter's party in a dress I have ever worn before? No, sir: you can go if you see fit, and dance attendance upon ladies whose husbands are not too parsimonious to allow them the privilege of being well dressed."

Philip Castleton passed his hand wearily across his brow, and, with a look full of grief and tenderness, replied:

"As you please, Anna; but if you only knew how complicated my affairs are, and how many distracting losses we have had, you would not think of another moire-antique, or a new set of jewelry. Diamonds would become you, darling; and nothing would please me more than to purchase Ball & Black's most elegant set, but it would be at the cost of my reputation and my honor. Surely my wife would not advise such reckless extravagance as that!"

"Don't let's talk any more about it, Philip; I shall not attend. And now I must go to the nursery."

She was gone in a moment, seemingly unconscious that her husband lingered for the usual parting kiss and caress.

"Parsimonious!" he whispered to himself, on his way to the office. "Another word for stingy! What has come between us? A dreadful something, which bids fair to blight both our lives."

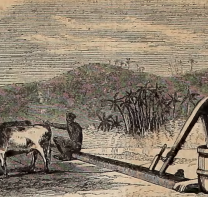
Anna Castleton had been married seven years and up to this time had discharged, faithfully and conscientiously, the duties of a wife. Her love for her husband was unbounded; yet the mysterious something, which Philip endeavored to penetrate, and which threatened to destroy their domestic happiness, was a dark cloud in the shape of "bad advice."

"You can go to breakfast, Lida; baby and I will have a romp. Oh, dear, dear! why have I allowed myself to go so far with Philip? He does really look careworn; and from the bottom of my heart I wish there was never such a thing got up as a fashionable party. Don't you, baby? How ridiculous in me to care about it! Surely my husband's love and respect are more to me than all the world beside."

Ah, good angel, why did you not remain to strengthen and bless the repentant woman?

"Lida said you were in the nursery, so I ran right up. What is the matter with you? had a quarrel with your husband? Of course you have. Not grieving over that, I hope? Why, Frank and I have a row regularly every day. I tell you, it is the spice of life. Now, what was it about?—do tell me. 'Can't afford it?' That's all in your eye! Are you foolish enough to believe such nonsense as that? It seems to me the men are all getting as mean as s——. Why, Frank actually had the impudence to tell me this morning—just because he couldn't find the hair-brush—that if I couldn't have things in better order, he would dismiss Mary, and make me do my own sewing."

"What did you do?"



"Why, I snapped my fingers in his face; and told him, that, for every servant he dismissed, I should get two more. He'll be pleased enough to-night. Come, now, dress yourself, and go take a ride with me."

While Mrs. Castleton is making her toilet, let us glance at her visitor. A little woman, of sprightly, fascinating appearance, very engaging in manner, dressed in exquisite taste, and a leader in the beat (!) society. It is little wonder that she dazzled and blinded Mrs. Castleton.

"Ain't this a beautiful shade, Anna? I think it will light up splendidly; and then, trimmed with point lace!—oh, I shall take it by all means! and the little fingers moved caressingly over the imported fabric. "Fifteen yards! That won't be so expensive, after all. Why not have one like it? Oh! I forgot, your husband can't afford it." And the merry laugh had just enough of mockery in it to drive her sensitive companion desperate.

"Measure off eighteen yards, and send the bill to Castleton Brothers," impulsively said the victim.

Mrs. Reid endeavored to persuade her to select her lace and trimmings, but in vain; she had gone just far enough, she thought, to convince Philip that she was not a child, and would not be treated like one.

A CEYLON OIL MILL.—SEE PAGE 236.

"Here's a bill for you, Phil, I guess," said Castleton, senior. "Moire-antique! It is but just, Philip, that you should tell your wife to hold up a little now. I have no doubt but we shall pull through with careful management; but we must be economical at present."

"I know it," replied Philip, sternly, "and this is the last time such a thing shall happen."

Evening came, and, at the usual hour, Philip stepped into the dining-room; but with no word of tender greeting for her who stood with averted eyes before the fire. Every article around them gave evidence of elegance and refinement; the beautifully set dining-table, perfect in all its appointments, with its sparkling glass and shining silver, was pleasant to look upon, for Mrs. Castleton was the very essence of neatness and good taste. Everything looked warm and genial except the lord and lady. They ate in silence.

"Stop one moment, Anna," said Philip, as she prepared to leave the room. "Look at this bill, and see if it is correct."

"Perfectly so," she replied, with affected nonchalance.

"Very well; it is receipted, you see." And he put the bill into her hand. Not a word more, for Philip was not only sensitive, but proud, and his heart-strings might have snapped before he would have uttered one reproachful word. 'Twas dreadfully hard work for Anna to keep the tears back—for, remember, this was her first attempt at rebellion. That evening was one long to be remembered; for never before, during their seven years of married life, had they spent an evening at home without doing all in their power to amuse and entertain each other.

Mrs. Reid had at last succeeded in sowing the seeds of discord; and no fault of hers if they did not bring forth rank and abundant fruit.

Oh! how such women are to be detested, and low carefully avoided. It really does seem incomprehensible how ladies of good common sense can be imposed upon by little mischief-making butterflies of Mrs. Reid's stamp. But this is no fiction, dear reader, for the events actually happened as narrated.

THE CAT IN THE WATER PIPE.—SEE PAGE 236.

Anna waited until ten o'clock for Philip to join her in her room, and finally retired. About an hour after, she heard his step on the stairs; but he passed the door, and went into the spare chamber. If Philip was proud, so was his wife, and thus the shadows deepened.

Weary and unrefreshed, Mrs. Castleton sat down to breakfast, but no Philip.

"Mary, call Mr. Castleton."

"Sure, marm, he is not in his room, and cook says he was just going out as she opened the basement blinds."

Mrs. Castleton's cup of coffee was again taken away untouched. Oh! the long, weary day—would it never end? Mrs. Reid rolled up to the door in her luxurious carriage: "Would Mrs. Castleton take a ride, and do a little shopping?" but Mrs. Castleton was out. She had had all night and day to reflect; and her native good sense was triumphant. She could now see plainly where she had grieved and insulted her husband; and, vowing to confess her fault and beg him to forgive her, she fell asleep.

"Phil, one of us must go to Chicago, and stay a few weeks," said Castleton, senior, "and I think it had better be you. You understand that branch better, and if you can get ready, start this afternoon."

"The sooner the better," thought Philip. He went home, ran up to the room, and there, on the bed, lay his wife, fast asleep. Oh! how sorrowfully he looked at her, and how he longed to take her in his arms and love her as of old; but pride conquered. He wrote a line and pinned it to the cushion. It ran thus: "Mrs. Castleton. I start for Chicago immediately; shall be gone a few weeks.—Philip." He packed some necessary articles in a portmanteau, and with one long, lingering look, he tore himself away. Up to the nursery he flew, kissed Baby Philip good-by, down stairs and off across the river to Jersey City, into the car, and never stopped to reflect upon what he had done, until steam and rail had carried him miles away from his home.

It was almost dark when Anna awoke. "Ah!" she said to herself, "it is most time for Philip, and this dreadful affair will soon be settled; but what is this?" as her eye rested on the little note. "How could he be so cruel? It must be a wicked joke! What shall I do first? write to him? No. I should never live to get the answer. I will send for John" (that was Castleton, senior). Accordingly, a dainty little note was dispatched, begging John to come up, without fail, in the evening. John came, and marveled much what had come over his dignified sister-in-law. Her eyes were red, and her whole appearance indicated a severe mental struggle of some kind.

"Now, John, tell me, quick," said she, grasping both his hands, "has Philip gone to Chicago on business? and did you know he was going?"

"Why, certainly, Anna. I sent him off in a hurry; but what is the matter? It can't be possible that you and Philip have quarreled?"

"Yes, we have," the heart-broken woman related the whole story, never sparing herself in the least. "And now, John, what shall I do? I shall go crazy if this is not settled immediately. Will you let me go to Chicago? Now do; that's a dear brother."

He looked at her attentively a moment, and decided that it was the only proper course to be pursued; for he saw that such an intense mental strain must produce fatal consequences, if not soon relieved.

"Certainly, Anna, you shall go; and Phil was a brute to leave you in such a shabby style. I'm ashamed of him. You are not afraid to trave alone?"

"No; not to the antipodes, if I could be sure Phil still loved me."

"Phil stops at the S——n House; and I will give you a letter of introduction to the proprietor."

It was all arranged, and the next day, at the same hour precisely, Anna Castleton started. It seemed to her she could not go fast enough; but Chicago was reached at last, and when the carriage drew up before the principal entrance, Anna's heart was in her mouth. What if she should meet him at the entrance? She went to the parlor, sent for the gentlemanly proprietor, gave her letter, and in a moment more was seated in her husband's room. There, on the floor, lay his portmanteau, shirts and collars, brushes and combs, crammed together in true masculine style.

"Poor fellow!" whispered she. "What if he will not forgive me?"

She arranged everything in perfect order, then made her own toilet. She had little to do with, for her baggage had not arrived; but she dressed her beautiful hair with most exquisite taste. Every footfall made her start, but, finally, the gong sounded for dinner. In a moment more she heard the well-known step. Standing behind the door, Anna waited. In walked Philip, took off his overcoat, threw himself into a chair, without once glancing round. In a second more two little white hands covered his eyes, and two dear, rosy lips were pressed to his own.

"Philip, will you forgive me?"

"Forgive you, darling? Yes; a thousand times."

And, close pressed to her husband's bosom, Anna explained all. We might as well come away now, dear reader, for 'tis hardly fair to listen to all they said; but one thing is certain: no mischief-maker will ever again have the power to make trouble between Philip Castleton and his wife. Married ladies take warning.

CANNIBAL COOKING POTS.—SEE PAGE 236.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A GORILLA.

The following story is told by an African traveler:

"I had often heard marvelous accounts of an animal said to bear a close resemblance to man, and I naturally felt a hunter's desire to see with my own eyes, and, if possible, add the skin of it to my collection of curiosities; and for this purpose had made up my mind to go forward through the thicket, even if I went alone. Ordering my guide, in a tone that admitted of no question, to keep at my heels, as he valued his life, I resolutely advanced a few paces, though, if truth must be told, not half so courageous in feeling as I seemed in action.

"But at the end of those few paces I came to a sudden stand, for I saw a dense thicket, some fifteen or twenty yards ahead, agitated by the moving of some heavy body within it, while almost immediately there appeared, in plain view, a monster of such hideous appearance, that I felt the blood freeze through my veins and gather about my heart, as if appalled by some horrible visitant from the other world.

"In shape he was like a man, but like a man deformed; with a monstrous big chest and body, small head, planted down between his shoulders, large, long arms and huge hands, and short, thick bow-legs, terminating in hands instead of feet. He stood erect, like a man, was nearly six feet in height, and was covered all over, face and all, with short, black hair. His head was small in proportion to his body, and had a human conformation. Fierce, glittering gray eyes, set deep in the hollow, cavernous sockets, rolled and glared demoniacally. The forehead was low, and retreated sharply. There was but little nose, with high, prominent cheek-bones. The mouth was immense, with huge massive jaws and short, thin lips, that parted angrily only to display a formidable and ferocious set of teeth, the canine being long and sharp-pointed.

"I stood on the defensive, wisely determined to reserve my fire for the approaching crisis of my fate, hoping and praying I might be successful in putting an end to the monster.

"'No run now, master!' said the African, in low, thick, almost inarticulate tones; 'no 'scape him debil by run. Him swift as tiger—strong as elephant. Must kill!'

"'Shall I fire now, Mocha?'

"'No fire him come nigh; den fire through heart.'

"'Mocha, be ready!' I said, when the monster had stopped to roar and beat his breast within ten paces. 'I am about to end this suspense—I am about to fire.'

"I took deliberate aim; but, in spite of all I could do, my arms shook so that I was afraid to pull the trigger, and twice I lowered the weapon to get more steadiness of nerve. It was as if some fearful spell were on me; and at the third trial it seemed as if the fingers of my right hand were paralyzed and would not obey my will—a fact for which I have never been able to account.

"The monster again advanced, and now not more then five or six paces divided us, and he appeared as if about to make his final desperate rush. Delay now would be death—an awful death—and summoning all my will, I pulled both triggers in succession.

"Only one barrel was discharged by the act, the other missing fire; but one ball went straight to its mark, and lodged in the breast of the gorilla. It did not bring him to the earth, however, but made him wildly furious; and, gnashing his teeth, and uttering most unearthly shrieks and yells, he bounded forward for his revenge. Quick as lightning the gallant Mocha threw himself before me, and struck with his spear—but it might as well have been a reed. One blow of the ponderous arm of the brute turned it aside all shivered, while the hand of the other stretched the poor fellow bleeding and senseless on the earth. In his fall he came back against me with such force that I went down also. At that moment I had not a single hope of life, and knowing myself utterly defenseless, despair took complete possession of me, and I made no effort to rise.

"This, and I believe this alone, was my salvation—for seeing us both still, and probably thinking us both dead, the furious brute seized my gun, and, first fairly denting the barrels with his teeth, he struck it against a tree with a force that shivered the stock and bent the iron nearly double. Then, throwing it down, putting his hands over his breast, and uttering the most infernal howlings and shriekings of rage and pain, he hastily disappeared in the dense jungle, leaving me to thank God that I had so miraculously escaped unharmed."

PASSAIC COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY'S RACES,

At Paterson, New Jersey.

THE meeting of this society was held at Paterson on the 5th of June, for the purpose of inaugurating the spring races, or American Derby. The weather proved favorable, and immense crowds of people witnessed the exciting contests of speed between some of the finest horses in the country. On the first day three races were run, the most important one being the Jersey Derby, a race for three-year olds, carrying one hundred pounds. There were forty-five entries for this race, only nine of which came to the post.

The race was won by Mr. Alexander's Kentucky horse, Merrill, in 2:55.

The main feature of the second day was the steeple-chase of about three miles, two of which were over a fair hunting country, with thirty-two jumps. Four horses contended in this race, only one of which succeeded in clearing all the obstructions, and, of course, winning the race in 8:18½. The race was a very exciting one, and the manner in which Nannie Craddock, the winner, leaped over ditches and walls elicited unbounded applause and admiration.

On the third day the opening sport was a hurdle race of two miles, over eight hurdles, for which there were five starters, the winning horse on the previous day and Zigzag, the second best, being among them. In this race Zigzag was the winner in 4:13¾.

These races were conducted with great order and propriety, and a freedom from those disgraceful scenes of drunkenness and shameful excess which often characterize the English Derby, and which have brought the pastime into disrepute in this country. As we improve our stock, racing will become more and more a permanent institution; and everything that can elevate its character and make it unobjectionable is a step in the right direction.

Our illustration shows some of the prominent features of these races.

The manner in which Zigzag and Nannie Craddock leared the hurdles on the home-stretch is distinctly shown; but it is impossible to convey by a picture any adequate idea of the enthusiasm with which the thousands of spectators watched the contest between the noble thoroughbreds that were striving for victory.

The hurdle was some three feet high and the ditch by its side six feet wide and four feet deep, over both of which the mare bounded in a single graceful and successful leap.

The contest between Kentucky and Richmond in the three mile race on the last day was one of the brilliant features of the sport, and elicited unbounded applause.

The sale of the pools at these races was active and spirited; and, as several of the horses had strong backers, large prices were realized.

Altogether the races were exceedingly satisfactory to the lovers of the turf, and nothing occurred to mar the pleasure of the occasion.

ITHACA AND ITS SURROUNDINGS.

THE traveler in search of natural beauty, attractive scenery, and wild solitude, need not hesitate long as to the direction in which he shall turn his steps. Every portion of our country, every county of our State, possesses natural beauties and salient features of surpassing excellence, that are unappreciated because they are not distant, and are often overlooked for the simple reason that Fashion has not stamped them with her exclusive seal. From time to time we have given illustrations of our home scenery, and this week we present a view of Ithaca, and some of the objects of interest near it, that ought to be more widely known. Ithaca is a beautiful town of some 8,000 inhabitants, situated at the foot of Cayuga Lake, in Central New York, and has long been noted for its natural attractions and the refinement and enterprise of its people. From the number of shade trees with which the streets are adorned, it is frequently called the Forest City. It is regularly laid out, and contains a large number of elegant private residences, while its churches and public edifices bear witness to the good taste and spirit of its citizens.

The Cornell Library, recently chartered by the Legislature, and erected and endowed by the munificence of Mr. Ezra Cornell, at an expense of $100,000, is situated here. It is a splendid building, containing a large Free Library, a Hall for Public Assemblies, a Farmer's Club-Room; Historical Society Room, etc. The engraving shows a front view of this building.

The Firemen's Monument is a handsome marble structure, erected by the firemen of Ithaca, on an elevation in the cemetery, commanding one of the best views of the town and lake. It stands on a lot set apart as a free burial-place for the brave men who peril their lives to protect the property of their fellow-citizens.

In the immediate vicinity of Ithaca there is a series of water-falls, unequaled in wild beauty and romantic grandeur, which words cannot adequately describe, and which would amply repay any trouble and expense in visiting them.

Well's Falls, a beautiful cascade, is only one mile distant from the city, and is a favorite resort in the summer season, inviting by its cool retreats to relaxation and rest. Fall Creek has likewise a series of six romantic water-falls, one of which is given in our sketch.

A little further out, we find Enfield Creek, with its ravine and main fall. The lovers of nature could not find a more charming resort; nothing can exceed the exquisite beauty and wildness of these scenes, and many travelers have pronounced them the most charming in the State. Nature is seen here in her own mood, and the same unadorned grandeur upon which the savage gazed a century ago exists to-day, untrammeled and unpolluted by the encroachments of art. The Pulpit Fall is a wonderful conformation, resembling, as its name implies, a pulpit, over which the water rolls with an indescribably fine effect.

Taghcani is a perpendicular fall, of 215 feet, and is much frequented. It would be difficult to find a spot having more attractions, or one more worthy the tourist's attention. The lover of solitude can find here all the charms of retirement; those who admire the picturesque will here see it presented in every possible phase; while those who wish to escape from the heat-burdened city could not select a point possessing so much to please and invigorate. We need not go abroad in search of novelty or interest; there are localities at home, accessible in a few hours, that combine all the elements of natural beauty, but that remain neglected and unappreciated. We believe, however, that the day is not far distant when Americans will give to American scenery the attention and prominence it so well deserves, and will be as proud of the natural beauties of their country as they now are of its political advantages.

BURIAL OF AN INDIAN PRINCESS.

A DAUGHTER of Spotted Tail, one of the chiefs among the Sioux, died recently at their rendezvous, on Powder River, some 260 miles from Fort Laramie, Dakotah Territory. She was an interesting girl, eighteen years of age. She always had been friendly toward the whites, and being often at the garrison with her band, became warmly attached to them. After the recent outbreak between her people and the United States Government, and she had been obliged to isolate herself with her people from her former friends, she began to decline in health, and gradually pined away, until she died of a broken heart. She declared she could never enjoy life if she was to be deprived of the opportunity of seeing her white friends—many of whom had known her from infancy—and remained a prey to melancholy until she died. As her people, numbering several thousands, were soon to start on a journey to the fort, to hold a council with the United States officers in reference to a treaty of peace, she requested that her body might be taken to the garrison, and be deposited in its final resting-place near the fort. This was done accordingly. The colonel, with his staff, rode out to meet the chief, who is a noble specimen of an Indian warrior, and the funeral took place at sunset.

"Colonel Maynadier," says the army chaplain, "informed the chief that I would perform the burial service, in accordance with the Christian usage, if he desired it. After a few moments, he assented. According to their custom, four posts, about twelve feet long, were inserted in the ground, on the top of which a scaffold was laid, on which the coffin was to be placed. Four Indian women laid her in, covering her with a buffalo robe, and depositing her wearing apparel, with all the treasure she possessed. The colonel deposited a beautiful pair of gauntlets, to keep her hands warm during her journey. I then proceeded with the burial service, which was interpreted faithfully, and the expressive 'Ugh!' uttered by the dusky warriors expressed their approval of the sentiments. The coffin closed, and, a beautiful red blanket covering it, it was raised to the scaffold. The heads and tails of her two white ponies, which had been killed immediately after her death, were nailed to the posts, and the idolized daughter was prepared, according to their faith, to ride through those fair hunting-grounds to which she had gone, appareled as she had been on earth. It was an affecting sight."

A SAD story is connected with the name of the writer of the beautiful song, "Ever of Thee," which has been sung and admired by so many in this country and in Europe. Foley Hall was a gentleman by birth and education. Wealthy in his own right, with large expectations, he led a heedless life, not choosing his associates, but allowing himself to be drawn into the society of the vicious. His property soon disappeared, and he was left without resources sufficient to buy his daily bread. His musical talents had been highly cultivated, but, as he never heeded them, he scarcely knew to what degree they could be made available. In his distress, however, he wrote the charming song. "Ever of Thee." A London publisher gave twenty pounds for it; that amount, with such a spendthrift, would not last long. He wrote other songs, but the money not coming in as fast as he wished, in a weak moment he forged the name of his publisher, and although every effort was made (even by the publisher) to save him, it was all of no use, and poor Foley Hall went to Newgate, and died broken-hearted before his trial came on.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

"IF I am not at home from the party to-night, at ten o'clock," said a husband to his better and bigger half, "don't wait for me."

"That I won't," said the lady, significantly; "I won't wait, but I'll come for you."

He returned at ten precisely.

AN excited father called in haste on Dr. Abernethy, and exclaimed, in an excited manner:

"Doctor! doctor! my boy has swallowed a mouse!"

"Then go home," quietly replied the doctor, "and tell him to swallow a cat."

THE late Mr. Thackeray had a nose of a most peculiar shape, as may be seen by his portrait. The bridge was very low, and the nostrils extremely well-developed. On one occasion, at a party where Douglas Jerrold was present, it was mentioned that Mr. Thackeray's religious opinions were unsettled, and that a lady of his acquaintance was doing her best to convert him to Romanism.

"To Romanism!" exclaimed Jerrold. "Let us hope she'll begin with his nose."

THE American Union says, that in a certain school, "away down South in Dixie," a young lady of Philadelphia has been appointed schoolmistress. She sends the following "rules," provided her by the trustees, for the government of the school:

"No Swearin
"fitin
"quarelin
"nicknamin
"goin inter the water
"reslin and jumpin
"pinchin
"stickin of pins inter each other
"pullin of hair durin books
"courtin in school
"writin of loveletters in school
"crackin of walnuts, unless dried
"whisperin

"Those rules must be observed, for a violation of those rules will be punished with the lash, accordin to the verdic of the trusties."

A PARADOX.

As William drew his Susan near,
He whispered to his bride:
"Though queer it sounds, I love, my dear,
To live by Suey's-side."

THE clergyman in a certain town, as the custom is, having published the banns of matrimony between two persons, was followed by the clerk's reading the hymn, beginning with these words: "Mistaken souls, who dream of heaven!"

"JEFF, why am you like de gum-tree?"

"I guve it up, Sam; I can't tell you."

"'Case you stays green both summer and winter."

ADDRESSED TO A LADY.—My first is truth, my second is the reverse, and my whole is yourself,—Love-ly.

ADAM SHOEMAKER a number of years ago came to Huntington Furnace, and seeing there for the first time a pair of snuffers, he asked:

"What's them for?"

"To snuff the candle."

The candle just then needed attention, and Adam, with his thumb and finger, pinched off the snuff, and carefully poked it into the snuffers, saying:

"Well, now, them's handy."

WHY is it probable that Moses wore a wig?—Because he was sometimes seen with Aaron (hair on) and sometimes without.

WHY is Martin Luther like a dyspeptic blackbird?—Because the Diet of Worms disagrees with him.

WHY is the treadmill like a true convert?—Because its turning is the result of the man's conviction.

WHY are women extravagant in clothes?—Because when they buy a new dress they wear it out on the first day.

A MAN who has been traveling in the "Far West," says—but he probably misrepresents the matter—that when an Idaho girl is kissed, she indignantly exclaims: "Now, put that right back where you took it from!"

"THEY say cotton is declining," exclaimed an old lady, as she removed her spectacles, and laid down her paper. "I thought so," she continued, "for the last thread I used was very feeble."

"NOTHING can be done well that is done in a hurry," oracularly declared a certain pompous politician of New York, one day lately, on the steps of the City Hall.

"How about catching fleas?" asked a wag at his elbow. The politician was floored.

WHEN should an innkeeper visit a forge? When he wants a bar made (barmaid).

A VENGEFUL individual in the exuberance of his rage at some one who offended him, said:

"I'll have revenge! By Jove, I'll give his little boy a tin horn."

MOST ennyboddy can write poor sense, says Josh Billings, but thare ain't but few that kan write good nonsense—and it almos takes an eddykated man tew appreciate it after it iz writ.

WHAT are you always to-morrow you can't be to-day? Older.

WHY does a lady's gown become longer when she puts it into a carpet bag? Because, when it is pulled out she will find it in creases.

IT was observed of a gentleman who possessed great learning, but was extremely silent in company, that his mind was a library of the most valuable information; upon which a lively female wittily remarked, that if it was a library, it was not a circulating one.

A REAL ESTATE STORY.

A GENTLEMAN of Boston, who had determined to retire from the cares of business and indulge himself in a mania for amateur farming, had a very attractive estate (on paper) presented to his notice by a broker. There was the usual "substantial dwelling-house, large barn and outbuildings, unfailing spring of water, thirty fruit trees, rich pasture and arable land," etc.; situated, of course, "in the immediate vicinity of school-houses, churches, and all the advantages of civilization."

The merchant was charmed with the description, and was on the point of purchasing, when he happened to meet an old farmer acquaintance, who, he suddenly remembered, lived in the neighborhood of his contemplated investment. After the usual inquiries on the merchant's part in regard to weather, prospect of crops, etc., and on the farmer's as to the proper method of disposing of the "coopeons" on some Government bonds, the former asked:

"Do you know G——'s place, up your way?"

"Know it! Yaas; guess I do; lives 'thin two mile o' my place. Dreffle shif'less critter, tho'; hadn't got much of anything on his farm, except a heavy mortgage. Goin' to sell him out putty soon, I guess."

"Indeed!" said the merchant, thoughtfully: "mismanaged, I suppose—don't attend to his business. Splendid piece of land, though, is it not?"

"Waal, might be for some purposes; our s'lectmen did think of buying it once for a cemetery, but the sile was so orful poor and sandy that nothing ever came up that was planted in it, and they were afraid there'd never be any resurrection there!"

The broker lost his sale of that farm.

EXECUTIONS AMONG THE JEWS.

THE Hebrews had no executioner. When a man was guilty of homicide the execution devolved on the next of kin, by the right of blood-revenge; in other cases, criminals were stoned by the people, the witnesses setting the example; and when the king or chief ordered a person to be put to death, the office was performed by the person to whom the order was given, and this was generally a person whose consideration in life bore some proportion to that of the person to be slain. Thus Solomon gave the commission to kill Joab, the commander-in-chief, to Beniah, a person of so much distinction as to be himself immediately promoted to the command which the death of Joab left vacant. In fact, the office, even of a regular executioner, is not by any means dishonorable in the East. The post of chief executioner is, in most Oriental courts, one of honor and distinction. Thus, when there was no regular executioner, it came to be considered a post of honor to put a distinguished person to death; and, on the other hand, the death itself was honorable in proportion to the rank of the person by whom the blow was inflicted. It was the greatest dishonor to perish by the hands of a woman or a slave. We see this feeling distinctly in the narrative where the two princes much prefer to die by Gideon's own hand than that of a youth who had obtained no personal distinction. As to the hero commissioning his son to perform this office, it was, perhaps, partly to honor him with the distinction of having slain two chief enemies of Israel, as well as because the rules of blood-revenge made it necessary that the execution of those who had slain his own brethren should either be performed by himself or a member of his own family. It seems very probable, from all that transpired, that Oreb and Zeeb had slain the brethren of Gideon, after they had taken them captive, in the same way that they were themselves slain.

A NOTABLE PEDESTRIAN.—A St. Louis paper, referring to the expected arrival of Mr. Fr. Schaefer, a noted German foot-traveler, in that city, from La Crosse, Wisconsin, says; "He is now about thirty years of age, considerably deformed, but of an enthusiastic mind. He was born in Carlshafen, in Kurhessen, and at the age of nine years became so interested in the study of history that he determined to see the world himself. He was poor, but this did not deter him. His first trip on foot and alone, with no money and no baggage, save what his knapsack contained, was in 1847, when he was very young, and continued through the German States and Russia. Afterward he continued on through Europe and Great Britain, and thence into and through Africa. Then he took up Asia, going through that country. Not long since he came to the United States, landing in Boston, traveling on foot to Washington, and from that city, West. He goes from St. Louis, across the country, through Utah, to California. Schaefer is feeling good, and enjoys his migratory habits exceedingly well. His ambition appears to be to travel over every part of the globe on foot, and he bids fair to accomplish that object now. His expenses are very small, and these are made up to him by friends whom he makes wherever he goes. His portfolio contains, among other things, the autographs of crowned heads, distinguished literary, political and scientific men wherever he has been, and is a curiosity, with sketches and testimonials, which have been given him by all he has met. The energy of the man entitles him to success in his travels."

PERILS BY THE WAY.—A writer in the London Reader says, that in that city the population is indefinitely augmented by hourly arrivals from all parts of the world. The metropolis is clasped, intersected and undermined by railroads. Broad streets are building for the reception of the swaying multitude, the river is made to yield up a portion of its bed for the construction of a new highway, and gigantic hotels, springing up in all quarters, are unable to supply accommodation; for the increasing crowd is daily becoming more perilous to human life. Last year 140 persons were killed in the streets.

HOW MANY INCHES IN A BUSHEL.—The standard bushel of the United States contains 2,150·4 cubic inches. The "Imperial bushel" is about 68 cubic inches larger, being 2,218.192 cubic inches. Any box or measure, the contents of which are equal to 2,150·4 cubic inches, will hold a bushel of grain. In measuring fruit, vegetables, coal and other similar substances, one-fifth must be added. In other words, a peck measure five times even full makes one bushel. The usual practice is to "heap the measure." In order to get on the fifth peck, measures must be heaped as long as what is to be measured will lie on.

Ye Pimpled, Blotched and Ulcerated Victims of scrofulous diseases, who drag your unclean persons into the company of better men, take AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, and purge out the foul corruption from your blood. Restore your health, and you will not only enjoy life better, but make your company more tolerable to those who must keep it.

Woman's Dress.

LIKE diseases, there are some public dissensions which at times become epidemic. The time for the reappearance of the sea-serpent question, or doubts as to which century the year 1800 belongs to, can be calculated with almost the precision of the orbit of a comet. It appears as if the puzzles of one generation were transmitted, like other hereditary characteristics, to the next, which again agitates the questions already solved, till they, with many perplexities, have to be laid at the door of another period of gestation. Among these periodical visitations may be reckoned that of the most proper attire for the fair sex. For some years past this matter has come before the public at times and in a manner equally surprising and amusing. It has popped up and been conducted for a time with all the skill and acrimony of a religious conflict, not alone when there was a lack of excitement in public matters, but while the nation was deep in the most death-struggle for existence. Then it has faded away, only, however, to be revived, after a decent interval, in some new form or under some new aspect.

The origin of this dress-reform, however, have had this singular advantage in conducting their quarrel with mankind: that, whereas other whimsical questions have been confined to the columns of the newspapers, they have been able to bring their cause before the courts of justice, plead their case fully, and obtain a decision, to a certain extent, in their favor. It happened in this wise: One day last week, Police Officer Pickett saw a crowd of people in front of a shop in Canal street. Instead of advising the crowd to "move on" and not obstruct the sidewalk, as it was his duty to do, he proceeded to examine into the cause of the collection of the crowd, and finding it arose from curiosity to see a lady in Bloomer costume, who was inside the shop, he entered her, and conducted her to the station-house, as was not his duty to do.

After release from that hospitable spot, which did not, however, take place without some indignities of treatment, for which he thinks the officers ought to have been censured, a second arrest of the peculiarly dressed lady was made, in another part of the town, and it was for these unwarrantable arrests that complaint was made before the Police Commissioners. The fair complainant was Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker, well-known as a surgeon and nurse in the army, and the wearer of a medal testifying to her eminent services during the war. She pleaded her own cause, and, we must say, disproved the universal truth of the proverb which applies to those who are their own clients. We may as well here state that Mrs. Walker's application was refused, and the Commissioners ordered the policeman to refrain in future from molesting her, "because she was not a weak woman needing protection" (we should rather think not), while Mr. Acton seemed to have supposed was the reason for the policeman "taking care of her."

What we are most concerned here with, however, is the voluble defense which Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker made on her own behalf. The report omits to say whether it was made under oath, but it appears probable that it could be said on behalf a "Bloomer costume was there and then said by its advocate and, almost, martyr. Our readers are, no doubt, fully acquainted with the general peculiarities of this dress, and it is needless for us to give a description of the one worn by Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker on this memorable occasion, further than to say that though the trowsers were of the masculine, the coat or frock of the epicene, and the head-dress of the feminine gender, the general aspect of the dress was undoubtedly feminine, and the attempt to show that the case was one of a "woman dressing in man's clothes" was a total failure.

We frankly concede the decorations of the female head as absolutely beyond the control of man; as to the "coat or frock reaching a little below the knees," it might be worn to retain a neutral position; but when, together with the assumption of trowsers, a new code of ethics is introduced, we demur at once to the positions assumed by the fair wearers. As a mere harmless eccentricity, the dress might have been allowed to pass without remark; but when we are told that grave questions of modesty, decency and morality are depending upon its adoption, it may be worth while to examine the ground for so extraordinary a claim. Up to the external aspect, we are told "that long dresses are inconvenient for walking in, as they collect dirt, etc.; that they are unfit to ascend Bunker Hill monument or the dome of the Capitol with;" and that the weight of the dress causes a drag on the body, prejudicial to health. It is quite true that good taste in dress is not universal, and that some of our fair friends will not adapt their dress to the occasion. There is certainly nothing in the fashions of the present day more ungainly than the charming creatures to wear trailing dresses in the streets, or "going up and down dirty stairs." Judging from our own observation, we should think the tendency was rather in the opposite direction. Again, there are certain costumes which are properly adapted by modest women for particular occasions. Thus, the ball-room full dress for a morning walk in the country, or to go to church at Newport in a riding-habit or bathing-dress, would be intolerably bad taste and very inconvenient to the wearers. If Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker has invented a dress in which, without shocking her notions of propriety, she can walk the streets—always supposing some of those horrid men to be present—or descend a coal-mine, or ride on horseback, we are disposed to bear all the merit she deserves, while condemning the taste which leads her to display herself in such a dress in our crowded streets. As to the dreadful accidents which have happened to ladies in hoop skirts, if caught in a gale of wind, the active imagination of Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker leads her to contemplate a terrible exposure of an ankle with an act of wilful immorality; but as we have never heard of any virture having been betrayed through the pranks of a gusty day, we shall continue to think that modesty and chastity are virtues dwelling in the mind, and not dependent upon dress, they will be found flourishing with sweet fragrance even when not obscured by the vulgar and gaping curiosity of a crowd.

There is yet another merit claimed for this new dress, which, we suppose, should receive the attention of our readers. It is a "protector of moral reputation"—whatever that may mean —and Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker assures the world, in her own words, from daily practice, "that many reputations would have been morally saved" if the assailed parties would only have stood in the dress she and she gives one notable instance "where a lady, whose moral reputation was so assailed that she could scarcely sit up in bed, and who was saved by adopting the dress, which she has worn ever since happy ever after. We scarcely like to call this pure cant, but it is something very like it. What is a "moral reputation" in a woman so distinguished for modesty that it might have supposed that the gallant doctress meant to hint that her costume was the only one to defy calumny and scandal? We are not, but in that case we are staggered by the strange refuge which her patient took, till, we presume, an armor of proof could be welded for her. But if Mrs. Dr. Mary E. Walker means to assert that female virtue and honor are only safe in proportion to the length or impregnability of the dress, she libels pretty nearly every woman her; and if she does not mean that, what does she mean? According to this doctrine, our grandmothers, whose pride was to show a handsome petticoat when the dress had been grossly immoral, and Turkish women, who are so bundled up that only their eyes can be seen by strangers, must be the most moral of their sex.

"After all," as a recent writer has well observed, "propriety of dress is only valuable because it is the outward sign of propriety of mind," and this incessant gabbling about the danger of exposing the ankles is an indication rather of such mental disease in connection than of that purity of mind without which the fairest of her sex is but as "empty brass and as a tinkling cymbal."

The Height of Impudence!

We have had rare occasions for commending the discrimination or wisdom of the Austrian adventurer, and his wet-nurse, Marshal Bazaine, in Mexico. But they showed both taste and discrimination in once-and-forever expelling that political harlequin, Gen. Santa Ana, when, a year or two ago, he presented himself at Vera Cruz, with many fawning and obsequious protestations of devotion to Maximilian personally, his empire, his principles, and, in short, all that was his. Every thing by turns and nothing long, attaching himself to parties only to betray them, professing principles one day only to deny and flout them the next, Gen. Santa Ana has become the very type and embodiment of all that is false in public conduct and all that is heartless in public character.

Maximilian did well to turn this harlot of politics, without ceremony, from the shores of his ephemeral empire. He probably had heard how the Dissembler betrayed the Government of the United States, which, in a moment of weakness, and without a full appreciation of his character, during the late war with Mexico, permitted him to return to that country, with the assurance that he would dedicate himself to the task of effecting a peace! Instead of which, he appeared at the head of a superior force before Gen. Taylor, at Buena Vista, where he was ignominiously beaten. Yet, we believe that Gen. Santa Ana was in earnest when he prostrated himself at the feet of Maximilian, and avowed that the aim of his life and the height of his ambition was the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico, with a prince of one of the royal houses of Europe on the throne. In the whole of his public career, tortuous, contradictory and crowded with political targiversation and villainies, there is only one consistent purpose—we cannot dignify it as a principle—apparent: and that is the establishment of a monarchy in Mexico.

Of Republicanism, Santa Ana never had the slightest infusion or remotest conception. The pomp and glitter of courts, and ambition of irresponsible power, absorbed his soul, and even when the so-called head of the republic, his administration, in all its circumstances, was only a servile copy of that of the Viceroys.

There is something exceptionally consistent in the fact that in 1854 he sought to unite all the Spanish American States, under the protection and influence of Spain, which, ultimately organize a great Latin empire in America, as a counterpoise to Republicanism and the Anglo Saxons. Napoleon only echoed Santa Ana when he clap-trap expression of "Latin race." How this man labored and intrigued to effect his unholy end, as we may add, has been proved by a coup de main against the centre of American politics. He failed then in his plans of monarchy, as he will fail now in his hypocritical attempts to gain power in Mexico by professing to be what a whole life has shown him not to be—that is to say, if we may deduce any settled purpose from the history of a life so erratic, and marked by so conspicuous a disregard of political integrity and true statesmanship.

The recent manifesto of Gen. Santa Ana against Maximilian is but a coup de main of pique, and an impotent attempt at revenge. His affectation of attachment to liberal principles is the very height of impudence!

The Science of Pictorial Journalism.

WE very seldom, as our readers well know, dwell upon our own efforts to produce the best illustrated periodicals in the country, but the article we republish from the New York Evening Post has been called forth from the best motive relating to our establishment. We give it as showing the enormous labor, perseverance, enterprise, tact and capital required to conceive and carry on a first-class Illustrated Newspaper, without any reference to the numerous other serials which emanate from our office. It is evident this is the view taken of it by many of our contemporaries, who have republished the article in question, accompanying it with commendatory remarks, expressing surprise that so many and so diverse illustrated publications should be issued from one establishment.

HOW SHALL WE SPEND OUR LEISURE HOURS?

THE old saw with which our spelling-books made us familiar, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy," contained a great deal of sound philosophy, and possessed a practical truth which is as true in the entire satisfaction. The necessity of healthful and agreeable recreation, especially to those who, during the business hours, are closely confined in the counting-rooms and workshops of our large cities, is universally admitted; but the question arises, how shall this recreation we may allow without injury to character and morality.

The out-door sports, such as boating, ball-playing, etc., so popular and beneficial, do not meet all the requirements of the case. Business hours are vastly too much for them, and when, by the force of circumstances, we are compelled to engage in them. Let us instance a single example, the type of bachelordom, and closely examine some of the conditions of its existence.

A young man has completed the labors of the day, and looks about for some pleasant manner of passing the hours before it is time to retire to rest. Libraries are open by night, books are readily obtained, but he is neither mentally nor physically in a condition to enjoy or be profited by reading; he needs relaxation, and to fascinate and entertain his senses and will have it. He is a craving of his nature, and he would not be true to the best instincts if he resisted it. If he have refined tastes and sensitive feelings, he may be at a loss which way to turn. Attractions of some character, he knows, will meet him on every side; the gilded saloon will offer him a welcome, and vicious haunts of every grade will open their doors to him in every way; but, as yet, he has no relish for such indulgences, and instinct from them his disgust. He is ignorant of the character of the delight and what he seeks; but he cannot enter these without compromising himself in the estimation of many good people, whose opinion he is unwilling to slight—not that playing billiards or bowling is in itself reprehensible, but the association of society which he can upon it, and denounce it as vicious.

While we respect the motives of such persons, we believe they are mistaken. Men become vicious from two causes, viz., the natural tendency of the passions to transgress propriety, and the allurements vice holds out to indulgence. What is needed, therefore, is a healthful, proper entertainment toward these to themselves harmless, the removal of all gross and objectionable features from these sports and games; and amusements that might pleasantly and profitably occupy the leisure hours, that now are either spent listlessly or injuriously.

The case is not a hopeless one. A little time direction will prevent one of the first of our public benefactors, and do more to elevate the tone of morality and improve the physical condition of our citizens than any agency now in existence.

Some of our prominent clergymen, who dare look things in the face, and who are willing to grapple with our social difficulties as they find them, well knowing that any valuable and permanent reform must begin at the bottom of the system, and not on its surface, have freely recommended what it sometimes termed "Muscular Christianity," or the full development of all our bodily capabilities, as the best and most fitting preparation for any moral and spiritual reformation. They would drive a fine and fast horse, take a turn at the oar, bat a ball, etc., for the exhilaration of the exercise most lightly, and then go before their people and preach all the better for the physical good been brought in close accord with their fellow-men.

We would combine the amusements of which we speak with instruction; would have reading and lecture-rooms connected with our places of recreation; would establish cheap concerts, and make them available media. The children of evil are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Our harmless amusements are too often fitted out most attractively, that the sense may feel at home in them, and there is no reason why other people may not be established, where the attractions would be open and the danger less.

We need not dilate upon this view of its own weapons, and recognizing the great cravings of our being, must greatly them temporarily or they will gratify themselves in their own fashion. That straight-laced feeling that would frown upon our recreations, because they are sometimes perverted, is unworthy of a society like ours, and a nation of reform. We cannot elevate the degraded strata of our society by preaching to them, but by showing them a better way than their own, and aiding them in following it; and we cannot save our young men from evils by simply denouncing evil, but by furnishing them with such diversions as will effectually overcome the desire of wrong-doing. What is right in itself, we must render expedient in general estimation, and enlist on the side of virtue and manliness all those associations in our power to veil as much power.

It may be that, in doing so, we shall be compelled to abandon long-cherished ideas of our profession, and entertain wider and more liberal views, but it would be far better to sacrifice our dogmas and creeds than, by retaining them, ruin our friends.

A WASHINGTON correspondent, signing himself "Citizen Hayseed," is aggrieved on account of our republication of certain observations on the "The Situation," attributed to Gen. Grant, and not published by him. The opinions of so important a personage as Gen. Grant, are certainly of great interest to his countrymen and the world; and nothing can be more creditable than that any criticism of Gen. Grant on the conduct and attitude of Gen. Lee, must be free from anything like personal unkindness or hostility. Our correspondent will find few, besides himself, to regard the cold-blooded and negative Lee, as "the eminent rival and superior of Gen. Grant." Such a parallel may seem to be anybody's rival, but the matter of superiority is quite another question.

WHAT is a bale of cotton? is frequently asked, and the answer is not a simple one. Bales of cotton vary in their weight considerably, and the estimate in pounds depends on the source whence it comes. Thus (says the Times of Ardr Journal) the average weight of the Egyptian bales, the largest of all, is 402 lbs.; American, 423 lbs.; Surat, 300 lbs.; Smyrna, 350 lbs.; Madras, 300 lbs.; Bengal, 300 lbs.; China, 240 lbs.; West Indian, 200 lbs.; Brazilian, 160 lbs. Now, the variable amount of a bale of cotton has often led to very erroneous estimates with regard to supply and stocks, and it is time to be regretted that some permanent decision on the matter should not, long before this, have been arrived at by those nations, the interests of whose consumers require them, ought to give them, a legitimate and preponderating influence in settling trade customs.

THE coal-fields of the countries possessing coal will be recognized if we consider them by some simple unit of measure. Let this be 100 square miles. In this case, Russia will be represented by 1; Spain, 2; Australia and Tasmania, 3; Westphalia and Bohemia, 4; Belgium, 5; France, 10; Rhenish Prussia, 10; British Provinces of North America, 17; British Islands, 40; Europe, 75; Pennsylvania, 126; Appalachian coal-field, 656: the entire coal-field of the United States, 2,200. Whichever way the figures are taken, they clearly represent the enormous coal-producing power of North America.

MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS's medical attendant has published an account of the ex-President's "Prison-Life," in which he gives us reports of many of the sayings of that personage. He reports that, although to some of the Southern visitors Davis had fled to Mexico, Mr. Davis said their flight was "an absurd conception—a evasion of duty only to be excelled by suicide. They had been instrumental in bringing the evils of military subjugation on the people, and should remain to share their sufferings. * * * The scheme of a political settlement in Mexico was preposterous in practice. * * * No sensible people will be imagined that all the requirements of a new colony than a body of interested politicians, still sore and smarting from a defeat which they had incurred defeat."

GRAPES IN CALIFORNIA.—A correspondent of the Tribune tells us that within a few years the vineyards of California will yield a greater value than its gold mines. The latter give about $50,000,000 annually. This prediction is the effect that the grapes will rise to $150,000,000 in annual value. The writer refers to the product of vine growing near Santa Barbara, planted twenty-four years ago by Gen. Vallejo:

"It matures over three feet in diameter, and it has been trained over an immense arbor so as to give full expansion to its vigorous growth. In favorable seasons, incredible as it may seem, it has been known to bear over 16,000 lb of grapes, and its yield is always large enough to give comfortable subsistence to the family in whose possession it has remained for a number of years."

THERE is an impression abroad that the graduates of West Point, in the army of 1865, from the Southern States, went almost solidly for the republican. This is an error. The total number of graduates in service on the breaking out of the war was 820. Of these, 485 were from the North and 335 from the South. On the latter, 197 resigned to join the rebellion, and 138 remained faithful to their flag.

A CORRESPONDENT suggests the following programme of music for Barnum's next dog show:

Overture ..... "The Dog(e) of Venice."
Barkarolle ..... "Spain for Land! The New-found Land."
Waltz ..... "Quel chien de maître."
Song ..... "Poor Dog Tray."
Scena ..... "Tobi fur low tobin."
Quadrille ..... "Tail Piece."
Song ..... "Oh! I'm not I's Cur'r."
Finale ..... "Our Native Boys."
Symphony ..... "The Strange Bark."

BARON LIEBIG, in his "Familiar Letters on Chemistry," says of wine:

"As a nourisher," says he, "or means of refreshment when the powers of life are exhausted—of giving animation and energy where man has to struggle with days of sorrow—as a means of correction and compensation when superannuation arises in carnivora and the organism is deranged in its operations, and as a means of protection against transient organic disturbances, wine is surpassed by no product of nature or art."

TOWN COSSIP.

THE "dog-days" have come—not the period of burning ardor and sweltering heat, but the time when every rugged urchin and merciless biped may make a raid upon the unprotected canines, and, in accordance with the due forms of law, consign them to the hands of the executioner. This St. Bartholomew's massacre of the canine race of the institutions of the metropolis; and for the next ninety days every unlucky Blanche, Tray, or Sweetheart must restrain its promenades to very narrow limits, or be hurried remorselessly to the pound, whence it will not be likely to return. If the love of the poodle "poor Indian" is still bewailed, and some of the faithful dogs could enter the expected hunting-ground, the slaughter notice at this late, "before or not the Society for Preventing Cruelty to Animals will interpose their good offices remains to be seen.

Professor Agassiz presents a good opportunity of viewing mundane scenes from the regions of the clouds, in the ascension he has made by the balloon constructed during the season. Under the Professor's skilful guidance, one can enjoy all the novelty and grandeur of an aërial voyage without the apprehensions of danger which to terra firma more informally than he would choose; and if the scientific aeronaut be to be called upon in addition with these entertainments, their expectations are not likely to be realized.

The week is affording more than the ordinary variety of sports and diversions. On Tuesday the grand excursion of the squadron of the New York Yacht Club took place, and was a very elegant affair, resulting in the entire satisfaction of all concerned. Unfortunately, Neptune was in one of his angry moods, and seemed inclined to resent the trespass upon his domain, more than to the discomfiture of the fleet who desired to witness the ceremony. But good sailors care not for stiff breezes and a rough sea; and, despite wind and waves, the review came off finely, while good music and a fine entertainment rendered the festivities of the day in the highest degree enjoyable.

The Rokoken races stretched a large share of attention during the four days of their continuance, and afforded fine sport. The favorite horses were not always the winners, and good points were shown that animals not suspected of possessing great merit.

A most delightful and enjoyable affair was the annual picnic of the Caledonian Club, which was held on Friday. These Caledonians know how to enjoy themselves immensely and impart pleasure to their friends and guests, and on this occasion came up fully to their previous reputation of good fellows, for the good things said and the agreeable things done; of the genial, hospitable host that actuated every member of the club; of the festivities that graced the day, only those present and participating can form any adequate conception; and, to say, the picnic was highly successful, is to afford national enjoyment, and in every sense it was a success.

And thus our summer days glide cheerily by, leaving pleasant memories in their course, bringing with their burdens they impose the light and happy hours that break up the dreary of life and enable us to bear the bondage of constant anxiety and labor. And besides, these delights are accessible to all. They require no time and incur no tedious witness them, thus maintaining the grand democratic feature of American society and institutions, that makes the people both the source and the object of power, in whatever direction they may put forth.

We are reminded by the constant cries under our windows that the season of berries and early fruits has come. Where can these tender fruits be had? Let the speaker only possessed such powers of articulation (barring the lisping, screaming, hissing and gurgling), as high keys and low keys, and all other keys that measure the compass of the human voice, be united in one of the pestiferous peddlers, brunchetis would be unknown, and doctors might starve. And yet a cheery voice is not the same street-cry, pealing along patiently from early morn to late at even there is not much for it to do, except the due to landlords and other impecunious commonalty, because of their wares, performed in their mechanical jobs, yet ever tramp, tramping, except when compensation comes in their course. It would be cruel to treat the history of these people—to learn how they live, and what are their means—without some such an inquiry as this; but, then, the recollection of many sweet morning slumbers, and the consequent disappointment, the horrid din and unearthly yells, powwow nothing but regard, and we would not be guilty in contact with any of Comanche savages as these civilized barbarians.

The fancy of the country fire such a country resorts have not as yet grown away many of the peculiarities of our native soil, who are still thronged with youth, beauty and fashion—if the persons who compose the gilded throng can be called fashion. Their every prevailing style of head-dress, especially, seems just now to be the beauty the prettiest women will be the last of the fashionable absurdities that give to a lady some resemblance to the fabled guardian of Tartarus, where, by the way, we would contain them—the waterfalls, not the ladies.

Mr. Quarantine Geary and his accomplished daughter, Miss, have returned to this city, after a very successful tour through the principal Southern cities, having been five months. They will spend the summer at home, and resume their popular ballad concerts early in the fall, attending their travels throughout the Southern States.

The weather is beginning to tell upon the theatres. Broadway is plagued by good houses at the Winter Garden, the very name of which is part of the attraction this warm weather.

Wallack's always has a fashionable and good attendance, it being as pleasant as a drawing-room, with the additional charm of dramatic sensation.

The great excitement of the week, however, is the Barnay Brothers, whose performances exceed anything we have seen for years. They are performing at the New Bowery, where they are drawing—no other description—fashionable audiences. Some of their acrobatic feats are really terrific. We confess that we do not like this style of performance, as it tends to unstrung nerves and strengthening a craving for horrors, which in time will be satisfied with nothing less than murder. We ask to the severity of pulling vitriol and camphene into your eyes, and other similar diversions. Nevertheless, so far as the Barnay Brothers are concerned, their feats are not dangerous, and we would advise every show to what an appalling extent skilful and daring may will sport with their own life and limb.

BOOK NOTICES.

We have received from Messrs. Thekker & Fields the first No. of the Children's Friend and Young Folks, both of which, as usual, are filled with a variety of pleasing and entertaining matter. As everybody reads these publications, it is quite unnecessary for us to say that the illustrations are very superior. Some of the engravings in Our Young Folks are particularly excellent, while the whole work is certainly a pleasing young folks. When we state that Bayard Taylor, H. W. Longfellow, Whittier, Lucy Larcom, Mrs. Whitney, Mrs. Stone, and other writers of note, are contributors to this number, it will be unnecessary to assure assurance that it is interesting, and fully maintains its previous reputation.

FRANK LESLIE'S CHILDRENS' FRIEND for July is very profusely illustrated, and full of most interesting matter for children, as distinguished from "Young Folks."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—In excavating the lot in rear of No. 16 Centre street, a few days since, the workmen came upon two skeletons, placed only a little under the surface. One of the skeletons was that of a man, surrounded by with its head toward the North, upon its face, and the arms crossed in front of the breast. The other, but seventeen inches below the surface of the ground, was that of a woman, extended upon its back. The body had been plentifully sprinkled with lime, in order to hasten decay. There was the appearance of great decay. This skeleton was that of a very tall, strong person, as shown by the large bone, which is considerably above the usual measurement. About six years ago, the graveyard was disturbed, and the bodies No. 13 Carmine street, as they then were, caused an exhumation from the rear of the lot, where the first skeleton was found, and it is now quite a tall, strong person. The people are interested to know the age of the skeleton, so that the former cannot be removed from the premises. The Board of Health are also very interested as a protection against discovery or not, cannot now be determined. The fact is, that the most singular circumstance that the tree should have been so intelligently found exactly over the head of the skeleton, that, one dark night, three distinct cries of murder were heard by persons living in No. 16 Centre. The other skeleton, buried near by, is that of a male, between six and seven years of age. The skeleton of a child is now above ground, and exhibits within a neat, white coffin. The child was buried about two years ago, and even by the lime with which the body was also plentifully covered, the flesh is not consumed. The body was only twelve inches below the surface, and lies in a natural position. The former is about two feet, and the child only four years. The frame house on the rear of the lot, fronting on No. 16 Centre street, was built by Lorenzo Carmine, and has a garden. It was occupied for some time as a boarding-house, but is now vacant. The lot is 25 feet by 100. The former owner, who died about nine years since. His widow continued the boarding-house business for a short time, and then removed. Since it has been given to a merchant doing business in the vicinity of Carmine and Centre streets, who has since died. Of course there is no little speculation going on in regard to the mysterious circumstances of the recent discovery. It is well known that no graveyard was ever known to be at this spot, and that the bodies, in former days, only an old stage barn for horses was ever known to be on the premises. The inhabitants of the house at the having been injured in life, and as the location is in the heart of the city, it is supposed that the murderers of the murderers would have assumed the risk of carrying their victims to the nearest cemetery.

—Several meteoric stones fell at Nashville, recently, near the railroad depot. They were of a bluish gray, and were about the size of a hickory nut. Geologists say that nothing similar has been found in any part of the world. They specimens have been sent to the East for further examination.

—Secretary Seward has made to establish a "Reperatory" in Germany to spread "light and knowledge" among the people. There are to be seven officers, the President at $2,500; an Assistant at $1,000; Janitor at $1,000; and a Messenger and Porter at $1,000 each.

—One of the Methodist ministers at the Boston Conference took occasion to announce from the pulpit first year's preaching consisted of a new hat and a bonnet of his wife. Rather a fair record, fortunate, having received about twenty-five dollars annually.

—At a baby convention in Massachusetts fifteen mothers were present, and the prize of $5 for the finest each baby got one vote.

—Literary promises to become quite a literary city; its excellent State library, its famous Female Academy (the Falmyra Female Seminary), its several attractive institutions; but, in addition thereto, and a circle of memorable institutions, there is to be a monument to the memories of letters—Alfred B. Street, our Flemish poet of the Mohawk Valley; Fenimore Cooper, the novelist; student, and author of the new and interesting "Life of Literary Bachelor." Fenimore Cooper, the novelist; humorous poems are so much relished in the locality that they are preserved in the State library.

—One of the Fenians captured by the United States steamer Michigan, on Lake Erie, proved to be very desperado, known as "Stonebouse Jack," and the Governor of Canada has offered a reward for his apprehension, charging him with murder and robbery at Pittsoie, on the 1st of May last.

—The disaster which occurred on the Norwich Railroad, Monday morning, resulting in one being blown from one track to another by a heavy wind, causing a collision with a freight train. A fireman was killed and another employe of the road badly injured.

—The Jacinto Portal says that one hundred acres of good land, lying within three miles of Cornith, Miss., were sold a few days since at auction, for the trifling sum of $1,000. Here we come per acre.

—The cemetery at Greenwoodville—the charnel-house of the South—is the largest in the country; it contains 15,000 graves.

—The Chapel Hill (N. C.) University celebrated its eighty-ninth Commencement on the 6th inst. Hon. Alexander Vance was present, and addressed the literary societies, the degree of Master of Arts was given to Gov. Vance's son, and the Supreme Court of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Church. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on Judge Reade, of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, and on Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

—David Adams and his son, a lad of eighteen, were indicted for assault and battery at the recent term of the Court of Common Pleas of Wood county, Ohio. After the finding of the bill, the father and son started went to the neighboring woods, and a neighbor, accidentally passing, found them engaged in a fight, the bodies down, and, after much effort, brought the boy to his feet. The father was dead. The arrest and indictment had so preyed on their minds that they received upon suicide.

—It is understood that the Canadian Government will shortly make a demand on our own for the extradition of Gens. Sweeney, Spear and other Fenian officers. Canadian spies are reported to be busily engaged collecting information against Americans who aided the Fenians in getting status, etc., across the border.

—A contract has been entered into by parties in Savannah with the United States Government to raise the old Confederate steamer Yadkin, sunk in the Ogeechee River in 1862, after being fired into while flying from the Monitors, and planting with what few guns she had on board. The sunken steamer Water Witch captured from the Confederates on Vernon River, and subsequently scuttled, is under contract to be raised by the same parties.

—The Boston public library contains 123,000 volumes. Its largest contributors are the Government, which gives large $100,000 worth of books, and Theodore Parker, who left 11,000 at his death. Since the year 1862 nearly 70,000 books were lent, or an average of 700 per day. The greatest number taken out in a single day was 1,046. The Superintendent reports a constantly increasing demand for books, and that they are called for strongly to the more substantial and useful class of works.

—The guerrilla Harper and his gang have resumed their old tricks in the mountains of Kentucky. On the 18th inst. a detachment of Federal troops left Franklin for Hardin County, with the purpose of recovering the Harper place Capt. Mey and two other guerrillas. While on the way they were attacked by the rebels under lead and forty men, who succeeded in summarily rescuing their prisoners. Information was also received that the rebels sacked part of the town of Bowling Green, broke open the jail and liberated the prisoners.

—A dispatch from Little Rock, Arkansas, states that it is believed that John H. Surratt, one of the Lincoln assassins, is in that State. He has been there for some time past.

—The Legislature of Massachusetts has passed a law giving the right of suffrage to every male person who, not having visible means of support, live without work and support by the contributions of others, or by visiting stop shops or houses of ill-repute, or lodging or grocery, or who shall be convicted of being a common or in the open air, and not giving a good account of themselves, or who shall have been receiving alms. A person known to be a pickpocket, thief, burglar, sutler or bawd, common prostitute, or who shall have become a lawful employment, is declared a vagrant, and arrested accordingly.

Foreign—The Fenian movement appears to have had some effect in obtaining a concession, if not justice, from the British Cabinet. They have introduced a bill for the relief of the Irish peasantry, the terms of which are that they shall be exempted from the rents for a year. Formerly a landlord could summarily dispossess a tenant who refused to pay rent. By the new enactment which the poor fellow might have been behind in his rent, but he could not be turned out, and the tenant would have a lien on the estate for the value of the improvements. Should the rents not be obtained by foreclosure, the bill makes any distress for rent, unless the tenant is in fault, illegal, and subjects the landlord to fine. The object of legislation as this reflects no credit on the conduct of the English in the past. But if it be carried into future, more will be done to quiet the malcontent Celts than all the coercive measures ever passed, or all the years of imprisonment.

—Englishmen in Canada patriotically would plainly green spectacles on their nose lest it be construed into shaking "their sympathies for the Fenians."

—It is said that Victor Hugo lost $75,000 by the financial panic in London, and that cash out to make so rich a man as Hugo one of the "Miserables."

—Hungary is in a state of revolution. Servia was in the gig-place society, and late a rebel General—has been restored from exile to his former position. Kossuth and Deak appeals to the Texans for aid to support his family.

—An order has been received in England for twenty thousand rifles for the Canadian militia.

—A fatal duel was recently fought in the environs of Paris between two students, in which one of them was killed on the spot; the other had his breast pierced by a bullet. The doctor's horror, when he saw the wounded, took fright, threw him into a ditch, and left him for dead.

—Borings for copper near Frankenhausen, in Central Germany, have struck a reserve of the largest and most beautiful caverns in all Germany. Two are 800 ft. and 900 ft. long, 300 ft. wide, and 150 ft. high. Three caverns have nine pounds of water, and several horses were found there.

—The sepias which surmount the colors of the French army, formerly made of copper, gilt by galvanism, are now made of aluminium, thus lightening the weight of the flag by nearly 2½ pounds.

—Dore has completed one of his pictures refused by the jury of the Paris Salon has led an artist named Bonfils to blow out his brains with a pistol. He wrote to his brother: "The members of the jury do not know me; I have suffered from the most cruel misery for years. I live no but, and when a man hasn't talent at forty, it is time to die."

—The London Spectator notices the formation of a company called the "Cash Payment Association," intended to do away with the evil of difference between the cash and credit prices. Every person who pays ten shillings becomes a member, and receives a ticket entitling him to buy ready money, he may obtain goods from seven to ten per cent. cheaper than he could otherwise purchase them. Tradesmen give the pledge to the association, being themselves members, and the benefits to customers are obvious.

—The Berlin newspapers have the following curious paragraph: "A Hungarian girl, born at Oedenburg, officiates as Minister to the Court of Persia, and is giving some curious representations in the Prussian capital. She is a Hungarian by birth, and a Jewess by hands. She sews, embroiders, executes the most delicate needle-work, and is a perfect mistress of the art of shakes knots, all with the tongue, apparently without the aid of the fingers, which are employed only as one. Part of the works thus executed are destined for Persian ministers, and the Queen of Persia hesitate to leave such marvels until they witness them.

WHY DOES ITALY DESIRE VENICE?

THE quarrel between Austria and Prussia over the province which they forcibly wrested from Denmark, has brought another ardent combatant in the field, Italy, who has openly determined to fan the embers of discord and bring on war; not that the Italian people have any love for the original grounds of quarrel between the German States. It has, however, a "cause" or its own, and the present scene a fitting opportunity for pressing it.

There is an ardent, longing desire in the new Italian Kingdom to possess themselves of the Austrian province of Venetia, and this desire is shared by equally sovereign, statesmen, and people. So strong is this longing for the possession of Venice, that we have seen Italy almost willingly engage in, or, perhaps, even provoke a war with Austria, for the sole purpose of gaining it. Hence there be this wish and determination to secure it at any cost? Why does Italy covet Venice?

There are two principle reasons to which the answer may be found. The first is derived from the geographical position, and the second from the past history of the Venetian people. We will endeavor to explain both as briefly as possible.

Italy is a peninsula, projecting into the Mediterranean at any map of Italy, and this will almost explain the reason why Austria cannot consent to cede Venetia, over which it will be forced to very much reconsider on the map. At one time the kingdom of Piedmont had very little to do with this boot—it was only, as it were, locking in at the top. But since the year 1859, it has, to continue the figure, thrust its foot down; it is now in possession of almost the entire boot, and the little area remaining to Piedmont has become the important kingdom of Italy.

If our reader will again look at the map, he will see that the top of the Italian boot is still divided. Only a portion of the territory belongs to King Victor Emanuel, the other portion consists of the province of Venetia, still in possession of Austria. The cession of this province would complete the natural geographical boundaries of Italy. Without it, Italy would seem like the extremity of the country from sea to sea—from the Mediterranean to the Adriatic. Thus, Venetia would be a standing danger from Italy as a state; for Austria, pre-wing upon all the forces of Italy, would have, in a moment's notice for attack, than if compelled to leave the Italian plains to defend her own soil in Venetia.

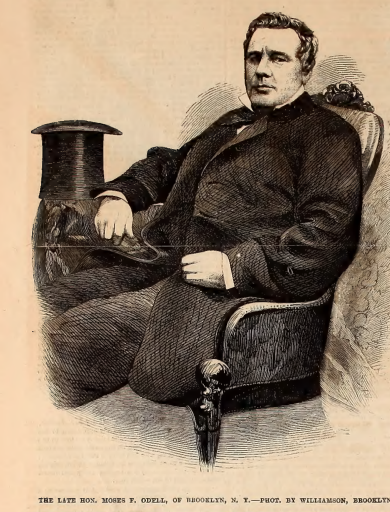
Probably our readers will think there is good reason, in the view for the Italian desire to possess Venice, but there remains the additional incentives of past associations. Venice is historic ground. Besides its strategical connection; its people are Italian, and their sympathies are all upon the side of Italy. Rather than Austrians will employ to which they are forced to believe. Their nationality is a thing of the past, but their patriotism is in its origin. We need not here revert to the ancient and glorious history of the Venetian republic, which lasted from the close of the 122 Degree, extending from the 5th century to the 18th. In other years Venice was once constituted, under the presidency of Daniel Manin. Venice was at last betrayed by the Austrian power, but for four months its brave people and their leader kept the Emperor's troops at bay. They were finally compelled to capitulate in August, 1849.

We have given the reasons to show that the sympathies of the Italian people must, naturally, be with their brethren in Venetia, and that Italy must have a strong determination to retain its hold. Venetia is a valuable province in itself, and with the cities of its capital, and the port of Venice is, besides, invaluable to an inland state. The population of Venetia numbers over five millions by immense fortresses, four in number, and known as the Quadrilateral; but of these we shall speak in a future number.

CANNIBALISM.

In a book recently published by Mr. Baker, in London, giving an account of his expedition to the sources of the Nile, he relates the following story of the Makkraka tribe, who live in the mountains of a black named Denkumores, who had been in Paris and London, and who, on his return, introduce knives and forks. He had visited them with a trading party and found them cannibals of the worst sort:

"They had a very good people, but possessing a peculiar taste for dogs and human flesh. They accompanied the Europeans to the mountains, and assisted to eat the bodies of the slain. The traders complained that the Makkrakas, in their skirmishes, not satisfied upon killing and eating the children which the party wished to purchase, but would actually cut up the dead bodies by its ankles and dash its head against the ground; and, after having killed the children, would eat the stomach and intestines, and trying the two ankles to the two hands, and the head to the breast, and the body to the shoulder, and then returned to camp, where they divided the flesh among themselves, and feasted on it.



"Mr. Baker states in my own service had been a witness to a horrible scene between two of the natives. The natives had been in a battle, and every from the West, together with a great number of Dinka prisoners, who were taken to the camp of Makkraka. One of the slave girls attempted to escape, and her pursuer, a native of Makkraka, overtook her, and killed her. She fell wounded; the ball had struck her in the side. The girl was unable to rise, and lay on the ground with the point of yellow fat exuded. No sooner had she fallen, than the Makkraka commenced to cut her up by the shoulder, and the fat they tore it from the wound in handfuls, the girl all the while crying out for mercy, and begging for the disgusting prize. Others killed her with a spear, and cut her up by the shoulder, and tore the flesh, and splitting the body with their knives, used a scissor, and tore the intestines from between the ribs, and the spine to the neck. Many slave women and their children were killed during the battle, and each plunderer from the spot and took refuge in the trees. The Makkrakas seeing them in the trees, ran after them, and pulling the children from their refuge among the branches, dragged them down, and in a short time a great feast was prepared for the whole party.

"It was a lingering distress of that paragraph, but the statements were true, as Mr. Baker, by Dinkas, and by several men in the employ of a friendly Turkish officer, who had been present at his own camp, entirely believed by the narrator, by no means one of the most credulous of mankind.

WEIGHT OF PEOPLE.

WHAT is the average weight of a man? At what age does he attain his greatest weight? How much more does a woman weigh than women? What would be the weight of fat people—and what of very fat people? M. Quetelet, of Brussels, some years ago, deemed such questions worthy of study, and made a number of researches of man. He got hold of everybody he could, measured them, and weighed them—the babies; he weighed the boys and girls; he weighed the youths and maidens, he weighed men and women; he weighed old men and old women—in short, he omitted nobody. He had no particular theory to disturb his facts, he had no axe to grind, and he ground it not with. All the infants in the Foundling Hospital in Brussels were weighed every month. Similarly, all the recruits were compared with others obtained at random from conscription lists. The results of the average returns show that a citizen of the world, on the day of his birth, is supposed to weigh, about 7½ pounds and a half—a boy baby a little more, a girl baby a little less. At the end of a month, the baby has gained a pound and a half, while other proportions of weight are added to the sum of the whole. Between the ages of one and ten the pounds of people according to age, and found that the typical man at twenty years of age is about 140 pounds, and that the typical woman of twenty has one pound less. At the age of twenty-five the man has reached their heaviest bulk at about thirty-five, when they begin to decrease in weight until they are sixty. Then the women slowly fattened on until fifty, when their average weight is about hundred and one pounds each. Men and women together, the weight, at full growth, averaged almost exactly one hundred and forty pounds.

CAN SNAKES POISON ONE ANOTHER?—It is generally believed that when one venomous snake bites another, the poison is just as fatal as it is to a human being. M. Guyon, a member of the Paris Academy of Medicine, however, denies this. He says that his attention was first directed to this subject in 1853, and that since that time he has made a number of experiments with serpents, and found that, when they bite one another, the venomous properties are not fatal, as previous have. He asserts that travelers who have resided in the tropics are to the contrary of this, have either been mistaken or have related myths.

THE LATE HON. MOSES F. ODELL, OF BROOKLYN, N. Y.—PHOT. BY WILLIAMSON, BROOKLYN.

MOSES F. ODELL.

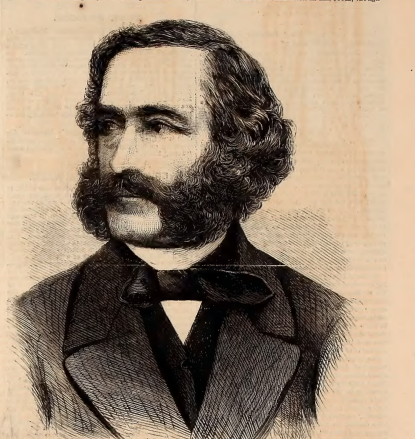
THE harvest of death gathered from our prominent public men has of late been unusually abundant. Of the number who have gone, few were more esteemed than the subject of this sketch.

Moses F. Odell was born in Tarrytown, N. Y., in 1818, but his family soon afterward removing to this city, he received his education here.

Early in life he received an appointment in the Custom House, where he soon proved himself a peculiarly valuable public servant, and for merit was promoted step by step, until he was made Assistant Collector, which post he held during the administration of President Polk. Being a Democrat, when the Taylor administration came in, Mr. Odell was removed from his post and put to another desk. He was, however, shortly replaced, notwithstanding his politics, the Collector finding him indispensable. He continued to hold his place under Collectors Bronson and Redfield, until he resigned under the latter. During this long tenure of a responsible, laborious and often irksome office, he gained and retained the esteem of the merchants of this city, and achieved a reputation for clear-headedness and the ability to transact a great amount of business in a manner satisfactory to all with whom he came in contact, and which has made him a great favorite with the business community of New York. Under the administration of Mr. Buchanan he held the post of Public Appraiser in this city.

When the war broke out Mr. Odell warmly supported the policy of the Government. When others of his own party scouted the idea that the war could be prosecuted to a successful termination, he stood firm. He never wavered. He never had a doubt as to the result. When others faltered, he looked forward with a hopeful mind, and the end has proved that his judgment was correct. In 1862, he was renominated for Congress in the Third District, and triumphantly elected.

While in Washington, a warm personal attachment existed between Mr. Odell and President Lincoln. No visitor at the White House was more welcome than Mr. Odell. He sought no political preferment at Mr. Lincoln's hands. When Mr. Johnson succeeded to the office of President, Mr. Odell was appointed Naval Officer of the port of New York, which position he held up to the time of his death.



In his social intercourse, Mr. Odell was known as a Christian gentleman, who took a lively interest in all benevolent enterprises. He was especially partial to Sunday Schools, and while actively engaged with public duties, both here and at Washington, found time to take part in their exercises.

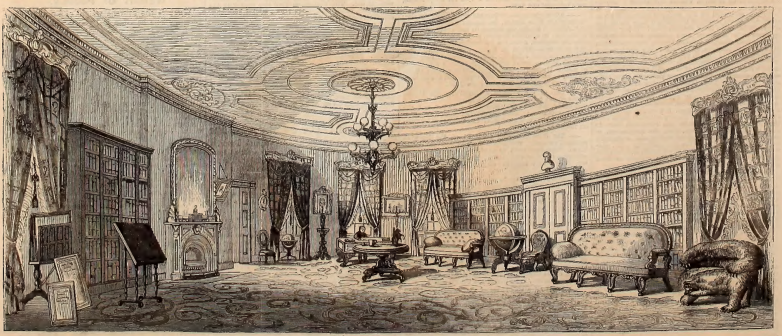
At the late annual Sunday School parade, the dying man had himself carried to the window, so that he might look for the last time upon the little friends in whose welfare he always found time to interest himself.

He had been prostrated with illness for some months, his disease being cancer in the throat, which gradually ate his life away, and on the 19th ult. he breathed his last.

HON. JAMES HUMPHREY.

WE give this week the portrait of another prominent man who has fallen a prey to the great destroyer in the full vigor of his days. The Hon. James Humphrey died at his residence in Brooklyn on the 15th ult., after a very brief illness, respected by the community in which he resided, and lamented by all who had made his acquaintance. Mr. Humphrey, who was fifty-four years of age, was born in Fairfield, Conn., and was the son of the late Heman Humphrey, D. D., President of Amherst College, where Mr. James Humphrey graduated with honor and distinction. He removed to Brooklyn in 1839, and became a prominent member of the bar. He was for some time associated with the firm of Butler & Barney of New York, and about the same time he took up his residence in the Fourth Ward of the City of Brooklyn. In 1840 he was elected Alderman of the ward; was reelected in 1842. In 1850 and 1851 he served as Corporation Counsel. In 1858 he was urged to accept the nomination for Congress, and was at that time regarded as the leading man of the party. He accepted the nomination, and was elected by a plurality vote. In 1860 he was renominated, but the district being largely Democratic, he was defeated by Moses F. Odell. In 1862 he was again beaten by Mr. Odell. In 1864 Mr. Humphrey was the Republican candidate, and was elected by a handsome majority. He was regarded as a most useful and hard-working man in Congress. He was a good scholar, a genial companion and amiable gentleman. Mr. Humphrey was a member of the Church of the Pilgrims, of which the Rev. Dr. Storrs is pastor.

THE LATE HON. JAMES HUMPHREY, OF BROOKLYN, N. Y.—PHOT. BY WILLIAMSON, BROOKLYN.



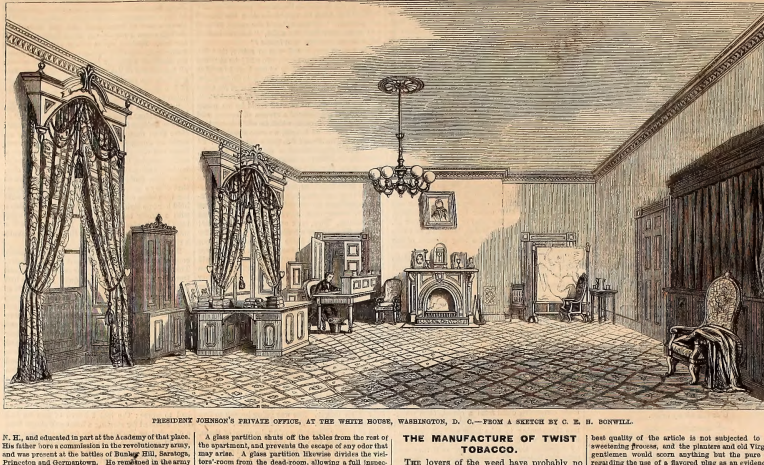
THE PRESIDENT'S OFFICE AND LIBRARY.

WHILE in a certain sense the President belongs to the people, and is their servant, he is not always accessible to every person whose interest or curiosity might prompt him to seek an interview with the chief of the nation. He may or may not deny himself to visitors; and those who are favored with an audience, will find themselves ushered into the President's private office—a sketch of which we present on this page.

There is nothing remarkable about this apartment, so far as its size, furniture, etc., are concerned; but if we could illustrate the aspirations, the hopes, the ambitions, and all the varied feelings that have been carried into it by the multitudes who have gone there to solicit favors, we would furnish a picture of surpassing interest.

Adjoining the office is the Library, a still more private apartment, to which but few gain access. Here is the desk of the private secretary, and here the President confers with those whose business is sufficiently important to demand especial consideration. The collection of books is not very large, but well selected, containing such works as are suitable for consultation. There is not much ornamentation in this room, though the walls are graced with portraits of Mr. Lincoln, Gen. Grant, and others; and on the mantel and other places, are various articles and curiosities, that, from time to time, have been presented to the President.

The Library is a pleasant, cheerful room, overlooking the Potomac and a considerable region beyond, and those who have never seen it can form a correct idea of its appearance from the illustration.



THE PRESIDENT'S LIBRARY AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, D. C.

HON. LEWIS CASS.

ANOTHER of the prominent men of our country has passed away at a ripe old age, leaving a record of no mean proportions.

Gen. Cass died in Detroit on the 17th ult., at the almost patriarchal age of eighty-four. He was born in Exeter, PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S PRIVATE OFFICE, AT THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, D. C.—FROM A SKETCH BY C. E. H. BONWILL.

N. H., and educated in part at the Academy of that place. His father bore a commission in the revolutionary army, and was present at the battles of Bunker Hill, Saratoga, Princeton and Germantown. He remained in the army for a number of years after the war, and resigned in 1801, when he removed to Ohio. Here young Lewis commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in 1802, and immediately commenced practice with marked success. His political life commenced in 1806 with his election to the Legislature of Ohio, when the schemes of Aaron Burr began to culminate in open treason.

Mr. Cass was one of the committee to which the matter was referred, and drafted the letter that enabled the local authorities to arrest the men engaged in the plot, while on their way down the river.

In 1813 he volunteered his services in the force which was called out to join the army under General Hull, and marched to Detroit, where he was elected Colonel of the Third Regiment of Ohio Volunteers. He was the first man, with his detachment, to invade Canada. Being promoted to a Brigadier-General, he joined Gen. Harrison, and was present in the pursuit of Proctor. After the campaign terminated, Gen. Cass was left in command of Michigan, and soon after he was appointed Civil Governor of the Territory, and from this time Detroit became his permanent residence. In 1831 Mr. Cass was appointed Secretary of War by President Jackson, which position he held some five years, when he resigned on account of ill health, much to the regret of Gen. Jackson, who tendered him the mission to France, where he added to his fame by adjusting some complicated questions that for some time had disturbed our diplomatic intercourse with that country. His celebrated protest against the "Quintuple Treaty," which provided for the indiscriminate right of search on the high seas, had the effect of preventing the final ratification of that treaty by France, and thus rendered its provisions inoperative. On his return to the United States, he was put in nomination for the Presidency, receiving a large number of votes in the Convention, which finally fixed upon Mr. Polk. In 1845 he was elected to the Senate of the United States, which place he resigned on his nomination to the Presidency in 1848. When Mr. Buchanan came into office, Mr. Cass was appointed Secretary of State, and continued in that capacity until 1860, when he resigned in disgust at the lack of energy displayed by the President, retiring to Detroit, where he has ever since remained. Gen. Cass was possessed of great wealth, having purchased a large amount of real estate when he first went to Detroit, which has since become immensely valuable. In manners he was simple, and in his intercourse with society frank and affable. He was remarkably temperate in his habits, and doubtless owed his long years and good health to this fact. His private character was above reproach, while, as a statesman, he ranked among the first in our country.

THE MORGUE.

Our authorities have supplied a want long felt, by opening a Morgue, or receptacle for the unknown dead, and those who are killed by accident, and are subject to the coroner's control. On our front page there is a view of the building itself, and also of the visitors'-room, and the room in which the bodies of the dead are placed for recognition. The Morgue is in charge of the Medical Board of Bellevue Hospital, and is modeled after La Morgue of Paris.

The principal room is a large square apartment, well lighted from two sides, having stone walls, and a tile floor, some three feet beneath the ground level. On one side are arranged four marble slabs, or sloping tables, elevated about three feet from the floor, upon which the corpses, dressed simply in underclothes, are intended to be placed. Four pendent india-rubber water-pipes, descending from the ceiling above these tables, keep up a constant flow of water upon the bodies beneath, preserving and disinfecting them. Upon hooks overhand, immediately in rear of the tables, the outer clothing of the deceased will be hung conspicuously. If any friends of the missing person desire a nearer inspection, they can be admitted, on making proper application, into the inner room. Next the ceiling, above the door of communication between the two rooms, a patent lamp, over which is a flue leading to a chimney, will be kept burning day and night, and is warranted by its inventor to completely disinfect both apartments by creating a draft and carrying out the foul air.

A glass partition shuts off the tables from the rest of the apartment, and prevents the escape of any odor that may arise. A glass partition likewise divides the visitors'-room from the dead-room, allowing a full inspection of the bodies, without the necessity of entering the apartment. As soon as a corpse is brought to the Morgue, it is stripped and carefully washed and examined. The clothes are also washed and put aside. If the deceased be known, the body will be held inspected until friends can be notified to present themselves and fulfill the formalities of law. In the case of the unknown dead, the bodies will be exposed from two to four days, when, if they remain unrecognized, they will be buried. After the burial of the corpse, the clothes will still remain on exhibition for fifteen days. They will then be done up in packages and put away for preservation.

An exact record of the number of bodies received, the circumstances attending death, and the disposition made of them, will be kept, and always be open for the inspection of parties interested. The Morgue is under the charge of Mr. John H. Manahan, the gentlemanly Warden of Bellevue Hospital, who will afford every facility to all classes concerning friends whom they may miss, and hope to identify.

THE LATE GENERAL LEWIS CASS.

THE MANUFACTURE OF TWIST TOBACCO.

THE lovers of the weed have probably no idea of the various manipulations necessary to produce the article suited to their taste. After the growth of the plant and its preparation for market, an expensive and tedious process, the manufacturer takes it in hand, and subjects it to such manipulations as fit it for the consumer's use. After the leaves are stripped from the stalks, they are tied in small parcels, and usually packed in hogsheads on the plantation. The first process in the factory is the careful separation, leaf by leaf, of the parcels as they are taken from the hogsheads for the purpose of securing uniformity of color and quality. This process is called sorting the leaf, and is performed by boys and girls. In the right of our sketch we have shown the original pressed mass, as it appears when the hogshead is removed, and likewise a pile of leaves that have been assorted. The tobacco, being carefully separated and assorted, is put into a large vat, and steamed to render it pliable and uniform in quality, after which it is moistened with a decoction of liquorice, sugar and other ingredients, that improve the flavor and increase the value of the lower grades. The heat quality of the article is not subjected to this sweetening Process, and the planters and old Virginia gentlemen would scorn anything but the pure leaf, regarding the use of a flavored plug as an evidence of a depraved taste.

After the tobacco has been thus prepared, it is passed to the stemming and twisting-room. Here the stem is quickly and dexterously removed, and the leaves are then formed into rolls, resembling large cigars. The manipulation of the rolls requires more labor and skill than any other part of the manufacture, and none but the most experienced workmen are thus employed. Each hand is expected to roll from a hundred to one hundred and twenty pounds per day, and he receives extra pay for all he puts up in addition to his allotted task. Good workmen often make fair wages by their extra labor. When the rolls have been made, they are placed in the pots and pressed. After pressing, the twist is conveyed to the sweat-room, and placed in rows on shelves, where it undergoes a moistening process. It is there dried by artificial heat, after which it is ready for packing, which is done in cases resembling cheese boxes, with the exception of being higher and larger. The packing is done very carefully, each layer containing the same number of pieces.

The process of making the common plug varies but little, and is as follows: The rolls are laid on an iron frame, divided into grooves by thin strips of metal, like a grating, each groove having the size of the plug that is to be formed. Over this frame, containing the rolls, another one of wood, so constructed as to fit into the grooves, is placed. Several frames thus arranged, with sheets of sheet-zinc or iron between them, are then put into a strong iron box or pot, and subjected to powerful pressure, which flattens the roll into its final shape. The rolls, now converted into plugs, are immediately taken to the drying-room and arranged on shelves, and, when sufficiently dried, are again pressed.

The excellence of any brand of tobacco depends greatly upon the skill in flavoring and the care in drying; and the proper attention to each of these processes is a secret that every manufacturer carefully guards.

The final operation is the packing into boxes or cases. The plugs are carefully laid in the bottom of the box in regular layers, and when the box is partially filled, a pressure of several tons is exerted upon it; then a few more layers are put in, when the pressure is repeated, and so on, until the box is entirely filled and closed.

The stems that have been removed from the leaves are also packed into large bulls, and shipped to Germany, to be used in making snuff and smoking-tobacco.

The hands employed in the tobacco factories are all negroes, and they have a habit, which has descended from generations, of singing dirges and melodies in a peculiar tone, which both impresses and amuses the listner. Many of them have fine voices, and their simple, fervent songs are a marked feature of the operation, which no visitor can ever forget.

Before the war, Lynchburg contained some seventy tobacco factories, which were noted for the superior quality of their products; but, owing to the high tax and other causes, there is but one in operation at the present time, of which Mr. Geo. A. Burks is the proprietor. Our illustration gives a view of the different parts of the process, and will convey a clear idea of the manner in which the weed is prepared for use.

These sketches, showing the process of manufacturing tobacco, are from the pencil of one of our corps of Artists, now traveling in the South, and obtaining material for future illustrations.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN RAILROADS.—For the ten years 1855-6, the average cost of operating the railroads of Great Britain, was $3,926 per mile, and the average earnings, $11,990. These figures show, when compared with the same statistics, covering the same ground, a very economical management. The average earnings per mile of the railroads of New York, in the same period, were $9,327 per mile, and the average cost of operating, $6,078. We thus have in the one case an average cost of 32 per cent, and in the other of 50 per cent. The United Kingdom has one mile of road to every 11-9 square miles of territory; New York one mile to every 3-4 square miles. But New York has a far greater number of miles of the iron track in proportion to population. The United Kingdom has 564 inhabitants to the square mile; New York, 84. The cost per mile of the English roads has been three times greater than the cost of our own.

O'ER THE BONNY BRINE.

BY HAROLD HENGE.

Eu! but thy passion is Rarely barbaric,
Maiden, whose fashion is
Greek as Alaric.
Saintly the Southern Cross
Shines through the lattice,
Valling the bridal hue
Thee and the dais,—

O'er birtle of beryl,
Whose undulous fold
Is samite with bezants,
And flashing with gold;
Over breasts swart and full,
With crescents of sheen
Slashed round the sides of them,
On bodice of green;

Purpled sleeves crimson dashed,
Heavy with tissue
Of treasures that all are
The town of the lion;
Vainly they sparkle, though—
O'er the bonny brine
Copnes a fond remembrance,
Lady-love, of thine.

As a sword well-tempered
In a braid flood,
Circles from the muscles
Keen, and true, and good,
So my soul, attempered
In that love of thine,
Bears thy lover harmless
O'er the bonny brine.

MY NEXT-DOOR NEIGHBOR.

I HAVE not forgotten my dear mother's early lessons of wisdom when I was a little child at her knee. One wholesome piece of advice she gave me made a wonderful impression upon my tender mind. It was this: "Never talk about your neighbors." But since I have grown older, and I hope somewhat wiser, I do not consider the admonition to mean exactly what I thought it did when a child. I did not dare then to tell my mother what my little friend Nellie Mason carried in her bright tin pail for her school dinner, though I was sadly tempted to do so sometimes; nor even how her wicked brother Joe, when drawing us home in his sled, would upset in a huge snowbank, and run away laughing, leaving us to pick up our pails, our books, and ourselves, as we best could. Now, I can better understand that the homely maxim is only intended to correct all improper meddling with other people's affairs when they do not in any wise concern ourselves. So I think, kind reader, you will excuse the prep I now take at my next-door neighbor, as I am quite sure you will agree with me that in some of her affairs at least I had considerable concern.

Mrs. Smith rented the house on my right, and immediately moved into it with her husband and six children. A little black-eyed girl of five or six summers was at once at my door with the request:

"Please, ma'am, will you lend us your broom and mop, and mother would like a drawing of tea for supper."

"Oh, certainly," I said; "your mother is tired with her journey, I know, and cannot unpack much to-night. Tell her I am glad to oblige her in any way in my power;" and smiling the action to the words, accompanied the tea with a plate of warm biscuit, Bridget had just taken out of the oven. Little Susie lingered there all alone with one of the happiest faces in the world, but Bridget shook her head wisely as she said:

"Indade, ma'am, it's none of my business, but I'm after thinking you'll be just getting into a fine scrape with them children."

In the course my husband said to me:

"I hope you will go in soon and see our new neighbor. We have hired Mr. Smith to work for us. He seems like a clever man, though a little down-hearted. 'I know the heart of a stranger,' and any little kindness you can show them now will be most welcome.

Accordingly, the next day I made a friendly call. Mrs. Smith gave a cordial greeting. She had made many apologies for her own dishabille as well as the disorder of her house. She was a comfortable-looking woman, masculine in appearance, with a keen black eye, and her voice was loud and shrill. Mr. Smith was a meek, patient-looking man. He had a stoop with his shoulders, as if some heavy weight was upon them, and his eyes were always cast down. Joseph, the eldest child, of twelve years, was sickly and timid like his father, while the next was the exact counterpart of his mother. The three little girls were made my acquaintance, asking all manner of questions, the mother at the same time looking unconcerned, so that in one call I learned more of their family matters than under ordinary circumstances I could have found out in many months. Mr. Smith, she said, was a very bashful man. She had to do all the talking, and indeed all the managing, too.

"You will not believe me, Mrs. Morris," she added, "but I really think if it was not for me that man would be cheated out of his eye-teeth. As sure as I live, I have saved dollars and dollars for that man, just as good as thrown into the fire if it had not been for me. Susie, hold your tongue this minute, I say!) I make it a point to pay just about half that a man asks, to begin with, but, dear me! Mr. Smith would buy near one flat down without counting. The fact is, he never stands up for his rights; works early and late. You see he is poor as a crow. I really believe he would wear the skin off his hands to help other folks, instead of helping himself. (Stop asking your questions, I say!) Dear Mr. Smith has his own way about one thing. He will go to church on Sunday. Now I like to go to church. It's pleasant, after being shut up all the week, and then it's comforting, too. But I can't always go. I often tell Mr. Smith I do not see the need for him, for if them that preaches did as well as he, they'd be better off without their preaching, than they are now. (Susie, I'm saying, stop, or I shall drive me crazy!) There's Joseph now. I tell him not to let the other boys tread on him. What if he can't play ball with them? He knows it's times as much as Bill Shearer, whose father is as rich as Croesus, and has sent him to the academy these three years. No, Joseph, you need not run; tell the boys you don't want their pity. They're just imposing on you because you're poor and sick. Keep your head upper lip, and Joseph, maybe, you'll be at the head of the heap after all. Do be naughty, Mrs. Morris,' she said, as I rose to leave, in the midst of a long account of her old home and neighbors.

"What's the use, I say to Mr. Smith, of neighbors, if we don't use them. I make it a point always to be neighborly, and now, if there's anything in the world that you want, just send in."

To Bridget's inquiry, "How I would be after liking the new neighbors?" I only replied:

"They seem friendly and sociable."

But I must confess I could not forget her prediction, for help fearing that in the end it might prove too true.

The next morning Mrs. Smith returned my call, accompanied by the five children, and most of the others were over before she left. Their curiosity knew no bounds. Not a room was unvisited. Not a drawer or cupboard neglected. Mrs. Smith talked all the time, now dragging some seemingly child from a closet, then pronising candies or sugar as a reward for obedience, now threatening to take their ears off, declaring their noise would drive her crazy, and then flattering by repeating their little sayings, as if they were prodigies indeed. Nor were Bridget's quarters by any means unmolested. Her kitchen door, as white as sand and soap could make it, her pantry, her basket, and her knitting-work, all bore sad marks of the intruders. Bridget looked grim at this time she set her face as a flint against them. Woe to the luckless one who ventured upon her forbidden ground! Not a crumb, not a drop of dipper of water, anything she could lay hands on, was sent after them sans ceremonie. The screaming of five children mingled with the baby's crying, foaming with rage, and then the war of words would suggest to my mind the apocalyptic vision at the sounding of the seventh trumpet.

No argument of mine had power thereafter to mend Bridget a hair's-breadth from the stand she had taken.

"Indade, ma'am," she would reply, "I'll have nothing to do with them, nor any of their kin or kin."

Did I speak of Mr. Smith, of his meek and patient ways, she would only add with a significant shake of the head:

"The more's the pity; the more's the pity, ma'am."

At times I secretly questioned whether her course would not be the wiser one for me, but not being old in connection with it, the children were in and out at the door of my room instead of hers; and thus in trying to keep the peace, my time had been lost, and my whole heart faint. To confess the truth, there were times when I envied a mother her innocence. I had a choice house-plant, which after much careful nurture, repaid me with a blossom of rarest beauty. I placed it where the sun occasionally kissed its fair petals, and the passing breeze stole fragrance from its dainty cells. What was my astonishment, when looking for the sun, to meet some yeast for her mother's bread, to see the flower in her hand, which she had ruthlessly plucked at the door. Then I was in the midst of giving the trespassing hand a smart blow. Her screams ring in my ears now! Mrs. Smith was at once on the scene, and I, who had been so humane at first sight, she pounced upon Susie like a tiger on its prey, while Bridget, with her arms akimbo, made the whole house ring with her bright peals of laughter. Altogether, I think, upon the stage it would be called a very funny scene. Mrs. Smith dragged the screaming child home, but with a flashing eye, and a voice above the din, exclaimed:

"I'm glad she's hurt, for it's time she got a great fuss over a little, good-for-nothing posy."

Mrs. Smith was an inveterate borrower. What she was prompted to borrow, on the day of her arrival, was scarcely intermitted for a single day in the year: "Ma wants to borrow your castor oil and mustard," or "Ma is out of starch, will you lend her a patch ?" "Ma wants your umbrella, one's in broke"—these and similar items were the burden of every call. Mrs. Smith's own resources arose from her former home call to see her, she was ever a-coming and a-going. Her chief word set. "Well," said Bridget, "I've been tell of the patience of Job, but bliss from head to foot wouldn't begin to be much a-peeler!"

At times Mrs. Smith was highly and fashionably dressed, when her tout ensemble would impress a stranger as dignified and distinguished. But she was usually careless about her personal appearance. I remember one time, as she stood at her door, directing her boys who were at work in the yard, Harry Sears, a young relative and member of our family, would have mistaken her for some time. Her black hair hung about her face, loose and dishevelled; her forefinger gesticulating with great effect, as she laid down the rules of proceeding, her manner and tone of voice indicating the highest excitement. "I declare," said the young man, as he turned away from the sight, "I never look at her without thinking of a hyena!"

The second boy, Frank, was so active, that Mr. Morris often employed him to do odd jobs at "The Works." Having occasion at one time to send in haste for some tools, he told Frank to go for them, and ask the master to send a charge for them to him. This was the beginning of Frank's fall. Finding that a boy of his years could be so easily obtained, he commenced a system of buying and charging to Mr. Morris, which he adroitly kept up for some time. At length, one day, he went for a party, and for Frank this was a rare chance. At one store he purchased a cheese, at another, crackers, and at still another, nuts and candies, all upon the strength of Mr. Morris's party! Suspicion was at last excited, and the truth came to light. But Frank, poor, utterly refused to believe it; but upon Frank's confession, her impetuous anger knew no bounds. "So, you have come to this, young man, after all my teaching and painstaking. Now, look out for your head, sir! I shall not have a hatter round your name for this, or send you to State prison for life! Poor boy! I don't suppose, after all, you knew where this harm was; but look out, sir! They will after such a rascal as you. Haven't I told you a hundred times never to tell a lie? Your father will whip you within an inch of your life!" After berating him in this fashion for a time, she broke into hysterical sobs, wringing her hands and calling herself the most miserable of all beings on the face of the earth. Frank, now thoroughly alarmed, made his way to the depot. With tears, he told the story of his poor mother, sick and dying at a distant city, and that she longed to see him once more. The kind conductor took him on board, with a promise to find him through ——— Early the next morning, Mrs. Smith came over with her baby in her arms. She had started Mr. Smith late in the evening in search of Frank. She had walked the house all night, she said, and could bear it no longer. She was going herself to find her dear boy. Would we look after the children at home? Joseph could take care of them, and we could then we would see that no harm came to them. She had told them to be good and make no trouble. Here was a dilemma! I knew well enough those children were in the house to eat; Besides, it was a mid-winter, and the children might burn the house down in trying to take care of themselves, so I would be done! Mr. Morris proposed that I should ask the children to take dinner with us, and at night he would go over and watch with them. This in my private reviews would be quite out of the question. It was with something of the martyr spirit that we entered upon the proposed plan. We, however, did Susan, for once, did nobly. A terror had come over them on account of Frank, which awed them into submission and kept all our wishes. When Bridget brought in the dessert for dinner, a favorite pudding upon which she prided herself, there were no plates for the children. "There wasn't crame enough to make pudkin' for the children," she said. They were Mrs. Smith came home, and, sure enough, Frank was with her. She was in raptures that she had found her lost boy again. Mr. Smith was very glad, she said, couldn't bear to have him come away. They wanted him to live with them always; but she couldn't think of that, and he must go home without him. He had promised to be a very good boy, and never do anything wrong again. She didn't think he would. He was a child that never lied, never better.

One morning soon after this, the omnibus stopped at Mrs. Smith's door, and a fair young girl alighted, who proved to be a niece of Mr. Smith, from a distant part of the country. She had not seen her uncle for years, and never before had been in the city.

"Well, well," said Bridget, "I pity her; it was near broke my heart to see a sad house among wolves. An' shure, she'll not stay there long."

But she did stay, and, like David's harp, her presence had a magic power over the evil spirit to drive it away. She was very lovely in appearance, kind, sunny-tempered, and friends, seemed like some tender exotic transplanted to the bleak regions of the north. Her words were always low and sweet, her face always bright, her home lessons, uncriticised, shining or striving to please her; they were so happy to be with her, and their love so unbounded, that they would have become to them a law. Joseph, under her gentle instruction, was soon able to read and write. He would sit beside her by the hour together, conning his lessons without a thought of weariness, if now and then she could assist a word, or help him over a hard place.

But more affecting than all else was it to see her with her uncle on Sabbath mornings, as they walked quietly to the house of God. I could never look at her then without thinking of those words of Jesus: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." Never they appeared to my heart.

To Mr. Smith her face was as the face of an angel. A beam of its glad sunshine rested upon his; he walked more erect; he ventured to speak a little of his past and his earthly trial had taught to cast his anchor within the vail, while with good words of cheer she helped him onward. As for Bridget, "Shure, the heart was worn side of her heart; she sought out and brought to light whatever was good there, and, with pitying kindness, covered or excused its defects. I cannot tell how it was, but a wondrous change came over the entire household. The influence was like the dew upon the tender herb, noiseless but all-pervading. Not only in Mrs. Smith's family, but to their next-door neighbors, Miss Gresham was an angel of light.

In the transparent light of her example I could better discover the incongruities of my own character. Humiliating lessons she gave me, in regard to the management of my own family, as well as the manner of intercourse with my neighbors, though never a word upon these subjects passed her lips. Bridget would sit by the window and watch her, as she told stories to the children under the shade of a tree, or joined in their sports with all the delight of the youngest among them. Now and then she would wipe her eyes with the corner of her apron, till, at last, breaking out in a convulsive sob, she would exclaim:

"Oh, ma'am! I'm so bad. It's no for the like of Bridget to be seeing and good as Mary."

Poor Bridget! I think she need not despair. More than once afterward, I saw her giving an apple or doughnut to the children; and when Susie was very sick, she watched with her many a night, carrying to her the most delicate morsels more tenderly than any one else could. Above all else, when Mrs. Smith would overleap the restraint that Mary's presence imposed, and retort upon her with some unjust or biting sarcasm, she would hold her lips tightly together, plant her foot down with a firmer tread, and with newfound energy busy herself about her work. Is she not in a fair way to be adjudged "greater than he that taketh a city?"

But Mary's visit came to an end, and the family soon after moved to another part of the country. This was their holiday every year or two. Relieved from the control that Mary's quiet goodness had inspired, Mrs. Smith again found her own batch of her tongue and temper. "Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" But with the children the effect of Mary's example and instruction was more lasting. They were far more affectionate to each other, more respectful and obedient to their father; Smith was a happier man; he enjoyed the society of his children. After Mary had gone they transferred much of the warm love they had lavished upon her to their father, and from yielding all the management of them to their mother, he no had before, he took his proper place as head and responsible guardian, and the relation ever had imposed. Frank went on from bad to worse; the last I heard of him he had left home, and was leading a fearful and aleigh from a church door, during service, on the Sabbath, and had in prospect a term of service in the State prison.

The coat of mail in which our friend Harry had encountered himself in regard to neighbors, had one vulnerable point, and, if I mistake not, Cupid's dart discovered it. I suspect he will soon be asking for the hand of absence from home a while, and that when he returns it will not be alone. Bridget, still blunt and outspoken, though much more guarded in her tongue, has made the mastery, declares that Mary will have to say to Harry, what a shrewd Irishman did in the old country to the wife of his choice:

"But I," said the humble girl, "once had a relative hunge."

"Ah!" says the lover's reply, "I don't know as I ever had a relative hung; but I have some that ought to be!"

"There is a moral to every human tale."

Mrs. Smith was left an orphan at an early age. She grew up uncared for and unloved, ignorant and self-reliant, for years, a wanderer among the narrow gangway, on the wharves, and in the streets of New York, the mother of invention. The drummers used to cover their drums, and the fifers their fifes were concealed in them, when they were not in full use. When regiments marched no music was played, but on the occasion the Colonel determined to have a band to his regiment. He drums were covered and drums to take the head of the column and to go a little ahead. The face of the drummer was one of whom had a dog in his drum—may be conceived. The Colonel's dog in the drums were heard to howl. The Colonel got angry, and bowed to know why the drums of his regiment howled. The drummer said the dog was to beat. The moment the drums began to beat, immediately the dog began to howl and to bay, to the astonishment of everybody but the Zouaves. Everybody looked at the drummer, who, looking—no sign of a dog anywhere; and yet, the more the drummers beat, the more the dog howled. At last a squeak, first of a whine, rolled over and over on the ground, got up and took to his heels, howling louder than ever. Roars of laughter greeted this explanation of the mysterious howls. The Colonel ordered the drummers to march off the ground, one by one, and to roll his drum as he came. If a barking dog followed, he was to consider himself as the dog put on shore. Only one dog got on board, the whole regiment kept quiet all the rolling. The dog could not be saw the Third Zouaves shore Toulon. He made his entry into Paris at their head.

WHEN Sir Thomas More was Lord Chancellor in the reign of Henry VIII. he ordered a gentleman to pay a sum of money to a poor woman, whom he had wronged. The gentleman said: "Then I hope your lordship will grant a long day to pay it." "I will grant your request," said Sir Thomas, "and that long day shall be Doomsday, which is the longest day in the year; you shall be the widow that day, or I will commit you to the Fleet Prison."

THEY SHALL RETURN.

Break, break upon my breaking heart, O Sea,
My woeful heart, that beats upon thy shore,
Break, break and crumble, to depart with thee,
My freighted shallops that return no more.
Nay, saith Time's monotone,
Nay, saith Time's rolling drone,
Bear thou thy sorrow still,
Whether for good or ill:
They shall return.

Roar, roar upon my rueful heart, O Sea,
My rueful heart, that groans upon thy shore,
Fain to forget, and to depart with thee,
Like my lost shallops, to return no more.
Nay, saith Time's monotone,
Nay, saith Time's dreary drone,
Wait thou thy Maker's will,
Whether for good or ill:
They shall return.

Wait, wait upon my woeful heart, O Sea,
My writhing heart, that may not yield nor flee,
My dearest hopes shall not depart with thee:
Return—return—give up mine own, O Sea!
Nay, saith Time's monotone,
Nay, saith Time's weary drone,
Wait thou His day, until,
Whether for good or ill:
They shall return.

META.

Francis Dunbar lay in the shadows of the great maples, watching the little figure wending its way across the field. It came nearer, and closing the book he had been reading, he half raised himself from his recumbent position to get a better view of her.

Short brown curls gave a piquant expression to the fresh, sparkling face, whose red lips softly caroled little snatches of song; while one round, dimpled arm and hand curved themselves upward, and balanced on the curly head a shining tin pail filled with sparkling water fram the spring below.

He knew that she was a sort of upper-servant in Squire Oldfield's family, where she had been brought up from a little girl, being himself betrothed to Margaret Oldfield, the squire's only daughter; he knew, too, that his admiration for the artless little Meta was wrong, very wrong, and stately Margaret would open wide her proud black eyes did she even dream of it. At the thought he darted a stealthy, searching look toward the windows of the great white house that overlooked the tall trees in whose shadow he lay concealed, as he called out:

"Come here, Meta; I must have a drink of that nice fresh water."

She turned at the sound of his voice, and the blushes came and went as she advanced shyly toward him, and with a quick, graceful movement, swung the pail downward, and placed it beside him.

One more rapid glance toward the house, and his eyes looked admiringly into her own as he said, laughingly:

"Here is the water, Miss Meta, but how am I to drink it?"

The blushes were yet more vivid as she murmured a half apology, and started off for the required article.

"You need not take the trouble, little one; I can find something here that will do just as well," and drawing her back, he fashioned an odd-looking cup out of the hanging maple leaves, making comical efforts to procure a drink, for the sake of listening to the arch, rippling laugh that lighted up the nut-brown eyes and purled from between the parted lips at his repeated failures.

She thought him very handsome as he stood there, his hair falling in clustering rings on his white forhead as he bent over the pail, his blue eyes glancing every moment into hers with a merry affectation of dismay at his poor success. He at last assured her that he had had sufficient, and when she would have raised the pail to return to the house, he determined to brave even Margaret's pride, and carry it himself; for he had grown strangely careful of those little brown hands of late.

But the girl had a finer and truer sense of their respective positions than himself; for she shrank from his out-stretched hand with a low-murmured, "If you please, Mr. Dunbar, I would rather carry it myself."

He took no notice of the timid words, nor the questioning eyes raised to his, but lifted the pail from her hand without a word, wondering, as the sharp handle lined itself on his white aristocratic palm, how that little figure could support the heavy weight.

She made no motion to follow him, but stood still and silent; returning to her side, he said, looking down into her face:

"Meta, why do you not wish me to carry it? Are you afraid that I will do too much for you? If so, see! I will take my payment now;" and bending down, he pressed a daring kiss on her lips.

She drew her little figure up proudly, and the look of scorn she bent upon him was worthy of even the squire's stately daughter, as she moved away, leaving the mortified young man standing there, more humiliated by that silent rebuke than he could have been by the most passionate expressions of anger. He raised the pail and followed her, feeling that nothing would be too mortifying, if it would only assure her of his heart-felt contrition. A colored domestic was the only personage that greeted him as he opened the kitchen-door, and he had the full benefit of her surprised glances as he deposited his burden without a word. A half hour afterward he saw Meta pass the door, and though he felt assured that she must know of his close vicinity, she did not even deign to glance toward him.

As he sat there, almost hating himself for his blind folly, a white arm stole round his neck, and Margaret Oldfield's love-lit face looked into his own. He pressed a tender kiss on her fair brows and drew her to a seat beside him. Sitting there in the summer twilight, with Margaret's hand clasped in his and Margaret's eyes looking into his own, he forgot his interest in the little girl who had so unexpectedly resented his audacity.

He had met Margaret in the city the year previous, and charmed by her grace and beauty, he had solicited her to become his wife; and obtaining the assurance of her love, he had followed her to her country home to gain the sanction of her father. The squire, who placed entire confidence in his daughter's judgment, and who was from the first prepossessed in her lover's favor, readily gave his consent to the union, and since then affairs had glided smoothly on, save when an occasional lover's quarrel marred their even harmony.

The disposition of Francis was haughty and unyielding, but Margaret's was equally so; and it chafed him to think that he was sometimes compelled to subjugate his will to another, even though that other was the woman whom he had asked to be his wife.

In the days of estrangement Margaret would realize with aching heart that her disposition was totally unfitted to mate with his; he needed a gentle, yielding wife, who would rely on his judgment unquestioningly, and such she could never be. But a loving reconciliation would banish all such unpleasant misgivings; and every week saw a couple of its days spent by Francis at the squire's old farm-house, where pretty Meta, with her bright, winning face, always crossed his path.

Since that little episode in the maple grove Meta had avoided him, and he missed her bright face even more than he cared to acknowledge to himself.

It was then that Margaret's cause suffered most; for in his anxiety to express his sorrow and implore her forgiveness for his fault, Meta was almost constantly in his thoughts, and it irritated him to see how persistently she shunned him. But he would not be deceived by her seeming coldness; for he could not blind himself to the deepening flush in the rosy cheek, as she caught his eyes fixed earnestly upon her, nor fail to catch the trembling light in her own, as they met his for one brief instant, reading the interest he had created far better than she did herself; and in the exultation of the thought, he, wealthy and high-born, realized that the squire's brown-eyed little servant-maid held a place in his heart that the squire's beautiful daughter had never filled.

With an ardent, impulsive temperament, he was thoroughly selfish; and stifling all manly pleadings for the fair girl whom he had wooed and won, he determined to disregard the sneers of his aristocratic relatives, and win little Meta for his wife.

The opportunity he had so long sought at last presented itself. He came face to face with her as she was flying across the lawn, intercepting her quick passage as he placed himself directly in her path.

"Meta," he spoke low and hurriedly, "there is something I wish to say to you. Wait till your mistress has retired to-night, and then go to the willows, at the back of the house, and you will find me waiting for you there. Will you promise?"

He was looking at her with eyes that said not, "Will you?" but, "You will;" and, like a bird charmed by a serpent, she stood trembling and uncertain, till his passionate reiteration compelled her assent.

That night, when most of the old squire's household had sought their respective apartments, and unsuspecting Margaret, with a heart full of happiness, had parted from her lover at the foot of the stairs, a little figure, wrapped in a large mantle, stole cautiously out of the back door, and glided swiftly and silently down the path that led to the foot of the old willow. She did not shrink when a tall figure came toward her out of the thick darkness, for the brave little heart would not fear anything from Miss Margaret's betrothed, who must be, like her, good and honorable.

The pure, upturned face, with the light of the stars falling soft upon it, possessed, in its perfect trustfulness, a talisman that was its surest safeguard; and Francis Dunbar, with all his faults, would never have brought a blush of shame to a face like that.

There was reassurance in the low tones that spoke her name, and tender respect in the voice that plead forgiveness for the past, and the little heart fluttered wildly as, taking her hand in both his, he asked her to be his wife. It was so sudden, so unexpected, she could not at first understand; but when he drew her close to him, and looked down into her face, waiting for her answer, she did not think of Margaret or the great wrong she was doing her, but let her head rest just where he had placed it, with a feeling of perfect happiness stealing over her. He had said he loved her, and that thought was sufficient to make her forget that she was nothing but Meta Gray, a poor little servant, and he one of fortune's favorites, as far above her as society ever places wealth above poverty. But her love spanned the distance, immeasurable as it seemed, and her first thought was not for that, but for Margaret; and with a quick, frightened movement, she drew herself away. He quieted her with loving words, telling her how wrong it would be to marry one he did not love—and Margaret would not wish it: she would readily give him up when she saw how it was; and trusting little Meta again suffered her head to droop on his shoulder as she listened, thinking all the time how different must be her love from that of her young mistress: she would not want to give him up, not if fifty Miss Margarets stood in the way; and she clung closer to him at the bare thought.

A sudden flash of light gleamed across the path, and, looking up, they saw that it proceeded from Margaret's chamber.

"Oh, let me go!" Meta hurriedly exclaimed. "What if she should want me, and I not there!" and, breaking from his hold, she almost flew up the garden path.

He was at her side as she reached the door, and, opening it softly, the two stood in the wide, old-fashioned kitchen. They did not see the white, shrinking figure that, at the sound of the opening door, crouched, affrighted, into a shadowed recess; so he drew her closely to him, murmuring, tenderly:

"Give me my good-night kiss, Meta, before you go. You forgot that when you ran away so fast."

He bent his head, and she put her two arms round his neck, drawing his face down to hers, as she whispered, earnestly:

"You will not tire of me when I am your wife, Francis?"—love had so soon made the term familiar—"when you see how ignorant I am, and Miss Margaret so much above me?"

He saw her fear, and his tones throbbed with feeling as he answered:

"Never, darling! You have a true, loving heart, that is more to me than learning. Be always as you are now, little Meta, and you will hold me forever."

The boon he craved was not denied him then, and her lips murmured a low good-night, as she stole softly away. He followed her a moment after, and when the ticking of the old clock was the only sound that broke the silence, another figure glided across the oaken floor, and reached its room just behind the others.

Poor Margaret! The light revealed an ashen face as she sank powerless into a chair. Her head had ached badly; she remembered seeing some camphor in the kitchen closet, and knowing just where to seek it, she had gone for it without a light, and in the quiet darkness had come upon a deeper, life-long pain.

Ah, well! She had been dreaming a beautiful dream, and fate had showed her the awakening. It was cruel; but better now than later. And the wretched girl bowed her head in anguish.

That night, when the hours had sped far into the morning, and pretty Meta lay buried in happy, dreamful sleep, there was a noise of hurrying feet, and anxious faces flitted through the great house, for its master was dying.

Young Dr. Fredericks hastened over at the imperative summons, to find a score of frightened watchers gathered round the old squire's bedside. At the first entrance of the physician, he desired that all should leave the room save his daughter and Francis.

"Doctor, I know that I have but a little while to live;" and the feeble eyes searched the physician's shadowed face, and then rested, with a look of fond affection, on the kneeling figure of his daughter. "My child, tell Meta I wish to see her; what I have to say is for her as well."

The pallid face was lifted as Margaret rose to do her father's bidding.

She stood at Meta's door, waiting for her to appear.

A frightened voice had answered the sharp call, and Meta, with clothes loosely thrown on and a startled look in her brown eyes, stood in the open door-way. She shrank back guiltily when she saw Margaret's pale face confronting her; for in her half-awakened state she imagined that Francis had told her all, and that she had now come to upbraid her.

Margaret read something of her thoughts, and despite her deep pain, she looked scornfully down on the timid, shrinking girl that followed in her footsteps. A moment more, and Margaret knelt in her old place, the squire's withered hand on the head of his motherless, and soon to be fatherless, child; and little Meta, left alone, standing in the furthest corner of the room, half-blinded by the light and the unexpected scene, where nothing seemed familiar.

The old squire's voice, cheated into momentary strength, rose clear and distinct:

"I need not speak of the years of my life, made wretched through one base act of the past. I need only tell of one innocent girl dishonored, a happy home made wretched, and you know my crime. Yonder poor girl has been a living reminder of that one fatal misstep. I speak of this, so that you may know her even at this late day as my child. Margaret," and his hand strayed tenderly over the bowed head, "forgive your poor father for the weakness that has kept back this confession till the last moment, leaving you to bear the disgrace alone, when he is at rest for ever. I know you are good and upright, my daughter, and I trust to you to see that she shares the fortune I leave to both."

Thus far Francis had been a silent listener; but roused into anger by the squire's devoted love for one child, that refused to speak a single kindly word of sympathy to the one he had brought to a life of shame, he could no longer control his feelings; and, without a thought of the shock his words might produce, the rash, impulsive young man strode across the room, and twining one arm around the shrinking figure of Meta, he hotly exclaimed:

"You have denied her a place in your affections, and your fortune she does not need. I love her, and shall make her my wife, giving her an honorable name, and helping her to bear the shame you have heaped upon her."

The old squire raised himself with an expiring effort, and glaring wildly upon the two, he shrieked out:

"My child! my Margaret! thou, too, art forsaken. God forgive me!" and falling back with a low moan, he was dead.

The first streaks of approaching dawn came dimly into that solemn room, falling with a sickly light on the pale, stiffened form of an old man and the kneeling figure of a young girl, crushed and heart-broken beneath the weight of a double woe.

Verily "the sins of the father shall be visited upon the children."

I'LL CALL TO-MORROW.

It is never quite safe to be churlish or impolite. A Boston manufacturer once lost some extensive orders from Russia by want of attention to visitors; and the following incident, said to be literally true, is told of a Philadelphia trader, who subjected himself to great mortification by impoliteness to Washington Irving. He had been much annoyed by many idle calls, and became a little crusty.

About this time the owner was one day standing in his door, when up came a rough-looking man, in a well bundled overcoat, wearing coarse, unpolished boots, and carrying in his hand a whip, who thus accosted him:

"Good-day, sir. Are you the owner of this establishment?"

"Well, I am," replied the other, with a look which seemed to say, "now you want to try it, don't you?"

"Have you any fine carriages for sale?" inquired the stranger, apparently not heeding the boorishness of the other.

"Well, I have."

"At what prices?"

"Rather cheap!"

"Ah! yes? Can I look at them?"

"You can do as you please, stranger. They are in there."

The stranger bowed politely, and passed in, examined the vehicles for a few minutes, returned, and said:

"There is one, I think, will answer my purpose," pointing toward one; "what is the price?"

"Two hundred dollars."

"Is that the lowest?"

"Yes."

"Well, sir, I will call and give you my decision to-morrow."

And the stranger walked away.

"Yes, you'll call to-morrow! Oh, yes, certainly," replied the owner, in a tone of irony, not so low but the stranger heard him; but he kept on his way, taking no outward notice of it. "Fool me, will you?" and the owner commenced whistling.

The next day came, and with it the stranger also.

"I have come, according to promise," said he.

"I see you have, sir," replied the owner, a little abashed.

"I will take the carriage, sir," and to the astonishment of the other, he pulled out an old wallet, well filled with bills, and deliberately counted out two hundred dollars.

The owner was completely staggered. Here was something new. A cabman with so much money! He took the money, looked at it and at the stranger, eyed him from head to foot, and even examined his boots attentively. Then he counted his money over and held up each bill to the light, to see if it was counterfeit. No, all was good. A thought struck him—he would find out the man's name.

"I suppose you would like a receipt?" said he to the stranger.

"It may be as well."

"Yes, sir; what name?"

"Washington Irving."

"Sir!" said the other, actually starting back with amazement, "did I understand your name was ——"

"Washington Irving," replied the other, an almost imperceptible smile hovering around his lips.

"Washington Irving—sir—my dear sir," the owner stammered, confusedly, "I—I—I really, sir, beg ten thousand pardons, sir; but I mistook you for a cabman sir, I did, indeed."

"No excuse, my friend," replied Irving. "I am no better than you took me for. You did perfectly right;" and having at length succeeded in getting his receipt, amid a host of apologies, he politely bade the humble carriage-maker good-day, and left him to the chagrin that he had mistaken for a cabman the man whose lofty genius had commanded the admiration of the world.

The friend who related the anecdote, asserted that it was a fact, and was told by the veritable owner himself. It doubtless proved a lesson to him not to judge men by their dress.

One Generation of Men Wiser than Another.—One day the Caliph Almansor, one of the vainest of Arabian monarchs, was conversing familiarly with the famous poet Fazelli, with whom he delighted to talk when retired from the cares of his empire.

"Thou thinkest," said he to Fazelli, "that I am not wiser than my father. Why is it so? Doth not every succeeding generation add to the wisdom of that which precedeth it?"

"Dost thou think thyself wiser than the Prophet?" answered the poet, bowing his head reverentially.

"Assuredly not," answered the Caliph.

"Dost thou think thyself wiser than Solomon?" asked the poet, bowing still lower.

"Assuredly not," again answered the Caliph.

"Dost thou think thyself wiser than Moses, who communed with Allah himself?" a third time asked the poet, bowing to the ground.

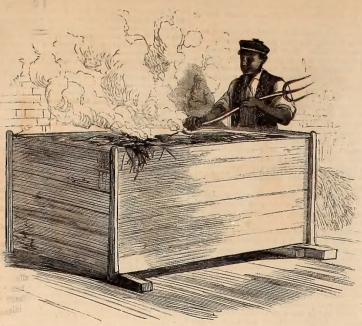
Almansor was for a moment thoughtful, and held down his head.

"Assuredly not," replied he at length; "I were foolishly presumptuous to think so."

"Then how," resumed Fazelli, "canst thou prove that each succeeding generation is wiser than another that is past?"

"The aggregate of knowledge is certainly increased," replied the Caliph.

"True, O my King," replied Fazelli; "but knowledge is not wisdom. Wisdom points out the road to happiness and virtue; knowledge is only an acquaintance with a mass of facts, which are not necessarily connected with either wisdom, virtue, or happiness, the only objects worthy the pursuit of a wise man. The knowledge of things has certainly increased; but, O King, remember that wisdom is always the same—as much so as the Great Power by whom it is dispensed. Thou mayest, perhaps, know more of the moon, the stars, the earth, and the sea, than thy father; but of thy organization, thy soul, thy passions, appetites, the power to direct them, and the Being who bestowed them upon thee, thou knowest no more than the meanest of thy father's slaves."



"Thou sayest true," replied the Caliph, bowing his head, reverently. "Allah, teach me humility!"

"Great King," said Fazelli, "lament not thine ignorance. Everything we cannot comprehend furnishes proof of the existence of a Being wiser than ourselves."

A Jew had ordered a French merchant in Morocco to furnish him with a considerable quantity of black hats, green shawls and red silk stockings. When the articles were ready for delivery, the Jew refused to receive them. Being brought before the emperor, who administers justice himself, he denied having given him the order, and maintained that he did not even know the French merchant. "Have you any witness?" said the emperor to the Frenchman. "No." "So much the worse for you; you should have taken care to have had witnesses; you may retire." The poor merchant, completely ruined, returned home in despair. He was, however, soon alarmed by a noise in the street; he ran to see what it was. A numerous multitude were following one of the emperor's officers, who was making the following proclamation at all the cross roads: "Every Jew, who, within four-and-twenty hours after this proclamation, shall be found in the streets without a black beaver hat on his head, a green shawl round his neck, and red silk stockings on his legs, shall be immediately seized, and conveyed to the first court of our palace, to be there flogged to death. The children of Israel all thronged to the French merchant, and before evening, the articles were purchased at any price he chose to demand for them.

The name Milicent means a "violent striker." The first syllable of the word is the same as our word mill (a fight), milice (militia); Latin, miles (a soldier); old Norse, melia. The words mall and maul belong to the same family. The last syllable, cent, is the Teutonic sent; High German, sind (violent, vehement); so that the two words signify a violent miller or fighter—in fact, an Amazon.

Nor a star hangs out in silence,
Guiding us to-night;
O'er the wild and cruel ocean
Gloams no beacon light;
Close and threatening howl the surges,
Singing melancholy dirges,
Death's pale hand our frail bark urges
O'er the breakers white.

Larboard foam Temptation's billows
Howling from the shore,
And we hear Despair's wild surges
Breaking starboard more.
Cold and gray the heavens o'er us,
And the melancholy chorus
Of the storm that howls before us
Mingles with the roar.

Soon for us the wailing night wind
May be sighing, too,
And the billows kiss our faces,
Staining ruddy brown.
Will no ear of mercy hear us?
Will no beacon-light now cheer us?
Gleaming through the darkness near us,
Still Death's hand we view.

The Spectre of Cliffe;

OR,

THE FAIR LADY OF THE SHROUD.

By the Author of "Lost Sir Massingberd," &c. &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.—IN THE CUTTER.

UPON the same morning that the two ladies created the sensation above described, Mr. Stevens took his departure for the same spot, the coast-guard cutter, but several hours earlier. The cutter was on its return to Marmouth, and it was arranged by the lieutenant that his guest should be disembarked in Mermaid Bay, where the Cavern was situated, as near the time of low tide as might be, there to remain until Mrs. Hayburn, or some other person in default of her, acquainted with the short-cut homeward, should join him.

To return to Lucky Bay, or even Sandby, by the cliff-top, was a very long round (including the whole of the walk taken by Mr. Stevens on his victim the previous day); and the sea-passage, of course, was longer still. Moreover, the boat could seldom come near the shore in consequence of the reefs and rocks. The cutter, however, had a fair wind for her voyage, and sped along at a great pace, all on board, as is the manner of such fast-sailing craft, and showing her very best to the sun, as a fine day shone her sailors. Not, I regret to say, Mr. Stevens sea-sick. Upon that churning sea, with its patent double action of wave and wind, the most landsman, and the most lost both heart and stomach, this gentleman sat as unmoved as though he possessed neither, and swept the land with a telescope lent him by the boatswain.

Was it not well understood that he was there to see the beauties of nature, the conformation of the chalk-cliffs, and the interesting habits of the sea-fowl? The crew had orders to give him the fullest information, and to afford him the best opportunities of observing whatever was most curious. Under these circumstances, they were rather surprised, as they approached the cliffs beneath Marmouth Beacon, which are notoriously the finest on the south coast, that Mr. Stevens seemed to take but little interest in them, and, on the contrary, expressed a wish that the cutter should at that very point make a circuit round the Dutchwoman, an isolated rock of considerable size, but no great beauty.

True, it was peopled by legions of sea-birds, whose proceedings were most varied and extraordinary; some of the whitest, like undergraduates in their corpses, just returned from church to an untinished wine-party, seemed never to be able sufficiently to express their satisfaction as Mr. Stevens and his friend drew near; others, on the contrary, with uplifted beak and wing, gave utterance to the most vigorous protests against such an infringement of the laws of property. The island was theirs, they contended, "theirs, theirs, theirs," and even the water within forty fathoms of the place was private property; "it was all theirs ful, it was diagraceful, and no bird worthy of the name of Larus Marinus should put up with it for a moment." Some of these feathered sticklers for their rights so grievously exhausted themselves by their degressive stairs-and-graces, that and in the meantime confined themselves to scrutinizing the strangers with suspicion, and shaking their heads. The young people, who presented the appearance of solid tinsiledown—little round balls of feathers—exhibited in their transitious figures all the their straining necks, and their gaping mouths, such astonishment as only the young are capable of. The solemn gulfmotes sat all of a row upon the ledges, coming to no decision upon the matter whatever, but, like the noblesse in revolution time, gradually increased by new accession to their number, until the space grew insufficient for them, and the original members were tipped off, croaking feebly, as for the sacrements, they never ceased to take their "sensation headers," one after the other, like patriots who, perceiving their native soil is about to be violated by the foot of the foe, determine that there is nothing for it but suicide.

The fool of no fee, however—not even that of a bird-catcher—had ever been placed upon the brawny shoulders of the Dutchwoman. Steep and smooth she rose for many a yard from the deep blue sea, before the jutting ledges commenced which led, like inverted stairs to the crown of the rock, upon which grew some scanty herbage. Ages ago, perhaps, ere the island had been divorced from the land, some four-footed creature might have pastured on it; but henceforward, while the world lasted, neither sheep nor kine would crop a mouthful there. Any cliffs, too, were green with samphire, doomed to grow there unpicked to the end of time; otherwise, the mighty rock was without a trace of vegetation, and, in its inaccessible isolation, looked unspeakably stern and lone.

"There's just as many birds, sir, in those cliffs yonder, and they are as steep as this, and three times as high," observed the cockswain, who had been engaged in the boat-hook, and did not much relish the voyage home being lengthened by any more circuits or examine islands, of which there was quite an archipelago yet to come.

"I know it," replied Mr. Stevens, quietly; "we will keep in shore for the present. I can see with the Beacon cliffs very well from here through your telescope."

"Do you see a very steep place, just under the Beacon, sir—for I can't myself without the glass—where the chalk projects all the way down so as to form a sort of step or ledge?"

Mr. Stevens, as it so happened, was attentively regarding the very spot thus indicated, but he replied, carelessly, that all the cliffs seemed much alike to him.

"Nay, but the place that's steeper than most," insisted the cockswain, "and so I desired to me, who lost a friend there, like one great gravestone. He was pushed over by a lady in a smuggler's murdered man, sir. If you'll hand me my glass, I'll find the place out for you in a minnit——" Why, bless me, there's a boat dropped it in the water; it's one of Dollard's best on a fifteen guinea one. Who the devil am I to talk to for making it goods?

"To me," returned Mr. Stevens, coolly, producing a well-stuffed leather purse. It was exceedingly necessary of me; but I have sometimes come up so close to me from his long dive, that he startled me out of my senses. You shall bone them, my lads, and while I'm about it, sir, let me add a couple of sovereigns, that my friends here may have the wherewithal to drink my health in Marmouth. I can scarcely have deserved a friend that an infernal noise and cisager these birds do make!"

"Yes, sir; I am sure, if we could have made them quiet, we should have done it for you, a most liberal gentleman, I'm sure. But they do say the living-gulls only give a hundred per hour's rest in the twenty-four, and, for my part, I've always found it so, for they're very apt just as nosy on the main land as they are here."

"Well, then, let us give 'em a wide berth for the present, for here's one that's making for the other glance," replied the stranger; "the colony does not extend much beyond the Beacon Head, I believe?"

"No, sir; they are very partial in their breeding haunts. If I steer out to sea for the next five minutes, and keep well off the Beacon, we shall be no more annoyed with their chattering. If it wasn't for their young uns, one would think that all quite was females."

Whether the ear of Mr. Stevens was really so delicate as to suffer from the dissonance of neighbor, or not, it was clear that he was annoyed by something. He lay back in the stern-sheets, drawing heavily, and breathing spasmodically, and ever and anon he shaded his eyes with his hand, and looked back through his fingers, as through a closed shutter, upon the white line of cliffs the cutter was fast leaving behind it.

Thus he remained, lost in his own meditations, and only fitfully conscious of what was going on, or what people about him were saying, when suddenly the cockswain nudged him:

"Do you see that speck of a boat, sir, yonder?"

"No, no!" cried Mr. Stevens, leaping to his feet as though he were on dry land, and thereby nearly falling overboard; "I see nothing. Stop her out, I say! I beg your pardon," said he, perceiving that they were by this time far out to sea; "I only startled me from my dream. What was it you were saying?"

"I merely wanted to draw your attention, sir, to that white thing yonder, gliding under the white cliff; you would scarcely think it to be a boat, I dare say, but it is one of Dollard's fifteen guinea craft, the cunning thief; it is almost impossible to see her, painted white as she is, when she's moving between us and the cliffs; and, since we've caught sight of us, look you how she hugs the land! I'll wager she has been to Marmouth for no good. Nobody but that rascal Dollard Dick, you would venture so close in shore, with such a sea on. You may take your oath he has contraband goods on board."

"Fire on her! Sink her! Run her down!" exclaimed Mr. Stevens, excitedly. "Why do you let the fellow escape?"

"Well, we must keep on the right side of the law, you see, sir, and Dollard's not the man to run than you, sir, I fancy—asking your pardon for the liberty—for it strikes me you have worn the anchor bottom: one of us should go, sir, and I'm getting up the tree," added the cockswain, touching his cap.

"I'll bear you harmless if you will stop that boat," replied the stranger, passionately. "I will give you fifty pounds if you catch her before she passes the Beacon Head. Do you hear me, I say, and cut her off."

But the cockswain made no inclination to obey.

"Lor bless you, sir, we'd be glad to do it for half the money, and, indeed for nothing at all, since you would take the risk. But it ain't no manner of use; the Saucy Sall runs three feet to our two. She'll be at Sandby, with the wind against her, a'most as quick as we were coming with the ebb and all. And, by-the-by, the tide is on the turn by this, and you will have less time, because we have steered out so far, before the Mermaid's Cavern than you had calculated upon. However, we'll land you just below the point there, and we shall come in view of the bay in a very few minutes. 'Tis the prettiest sight to be seen in all these parts, to my mind."

CHAPTER XXIV.—WAITING FOR THE PREY.

THE cockswain was right, although not particularly happy in his allusion, for there is not a more glorious sight in all the coast-scenery of Britain than Mermaid Bay. There are grander scenes, more picturesque scenes, but no one excels it for a combination of the beautiful and the grand. It cannot be viewed from above to any advantage, because the cliffs are there, except in one spot, where a zigzag path leads to the lofty Down; but from the sea and from the beach it is beheld under the most favorable aspect. It is enough totally different in character. Approaching the bay from the north, as in the present case, a crescent of chalk cliffs formed the background of a picture in which everything for that reason stood out as if in relief. Immense masses of outlying fragments still bid defiance to the waves, which furiously beat against them, and then, as if maddened by their resistance, thundered, white-tipped, on, and were the cliff itself into a hundred caverns. At one point in particular, it seemed as though the charging sea had made a regular battering-ram strategy, whereby the precipice had been pierced in more than one place, and a junction of its watery foes had been effected far within it. Sooner or later, the high cliff, for many a yard, was doomed, thus undermined, to fall; and on its face, the oblique layers of white flint—that grim own hieroglyphics—showed, like Belshazzar's warning. Small use it was to set those mighty warders, clothed in white, as if for their funeral column, when with every wave the precipice had been pierced in more than one place, and a junction of its watery foes had been effected far within it. The outlook from the extremity of this natural excavation was indeed exceeding fine. Left and right the light streamed in under rugged archways, each making a framework for the picture of the sparkling bay, the deep-blue mass of waters stretched unbroken till it met the sky; in the other, a line of jagged cliffs, about two furlongs distant, broke the monotony of the scene, and pencilled, it in weird and fantastic forms. But what was to be seen within the Mermaid's Cavern was still more exceeding beautiful, for the arches, broken and intersected by a thousand shadows, whose open walls of rainbow hues, such as no artist could ever hope to compass of the brown barnacle, 'picked out' with scarlet and yellow sponges, and dotted as the firmament with stars by the glittering specimens of ruddiest tint. Amethyst and ruby, garnet and emerald, all were there, standing out like bosses on a shield; and indeed the floor, a stone, which was a soft gold yielding substance, fresh as a flower, and bright as the glittering sands of a fifth island can yield. The ceiling of this treasure-house of nature was equally gorgeous; but the floor was of softest sand, which was only disturbed by the twinkling feet of the sea-fairies, after whom the place was named the "Mermaid's Cavern."

The tide was now at its ebb, at very low spring tides, were mortals admitted within this exquisite chamber, and then only for a very little while. Immediately after the turn of the tide, its beauties were hidden beneath the unconscious wave, to which, nevertheless, they owed their brightness and their bloom, but gladdening who shall say what eye?

Even on this occasion, the most opportune in all the year, there existed but two hours between the time that the last reluctant wave left the silver fringe of the floor of the cave and when the first wave of the flood-tide began silently to creep, to begin to haunt its echoing walls; and as the keel of the cutter clove the yielding sand to land its passenger——

"If you stay with the mermaids, sir, beyond an hour, you will be cut off from the land," were the man's warning, "you will not leave their company without wet feet."

He then leaped into the sea, and pushing the boat into deep water, climbed himself within it, and the sail filled once more, and lessened, and was lost, as the man Stevens watched it from the land.

With an evil glance up at the zigzag path, and a shrinking from the steep's tardiness, he sat down on the narrow beach, and drawing a letter from his pocket, read the contents slowly to himself: "Shall see me to-day, and perhaps may see with his hand—" she's quite wrong there. When you have made sure of it. Well, I have done that. "Will be at the Cavern at low tide." I myself am his dying look; an ugly sight, that haunts me still. It was a fool just now for shoving——. It must have been what had that conscience, I suppose; but I did see it—saw it as plain as I see this letter. Well, the end of all such nonsense, for I have a worse job in hand than that of yesterday. When you have made sure of it, do not risk more than is necessary. That's good to say, and, indeed, almost indispensable. I can only calm R. C. by promising that she shall still be his; as, indeed, she will be, if he has proofs. He is obstinate as a mule, and mad as the maddest, unless this lure is dangled before his eyes. Again, I say, do not risk more with M., and as for the child, it will be invaluable. We will find means to bring it hither, and then to foolish mother will follow, I warrant, as a matter of course. Well, I do not think me a milksop, nor that I forget my debts and yours: they will be paid all in time. But again, I say, when you have made sure of R., risk nothing more at present. I do risk nothing," soliloquized Gideon Carr, impatiently. "This business I have now in hand is certainly. Never again is it possible that such an opportunity will occur for killing both birds with one stone. Rupert Clifford will then be left without birth or kin. Mad as the maddest, she says—I doubt it not; but I think I know a way to circumvent even madness. As for what I will. If his fingers have joints in them, they shall write the words I dictate; and, at all events, sign his name in the right place on the parchment. How strange it seems that Grace and I, who have made so many sane folks appear mad, should now be striving to show this madman sane! I daresay Clement takes credit to himself for this, and calls it reparation. Poor creature—poor fool! However, most of us have our hours of weakness, or at least our moments—as I had mine a while ago. It must have been some touch of—what do they call it? Remorse; ay, some mawkishness which I myself know not to whom me, that caused me to think I saw through that man's glass—what? —pshaw! the thing must be a score of miles away by this time—half-way between the shingle and the foam; just as he said he would not have it be; of all fates, that the worst, he said—to welter on, shipwrecked, in the boundless main. I am sorry that I dropped that telescope. If the man had looked, what then? There was nothing for him to see; and nothing for that Dickens, either. I was a fool! and now am I a fool to stand here on the open beach, and let you fellows see that I care nothing for this Mermaid's Cavern, which I have come so far to explore."

He walked to the nearest opening, and looked in. "A dainty place for any lot of the land, and being a mermaid," muttered he, with a grim smile, "to die in. What a soft silver couch! What splendid hangings, and how rich the roof! Somewhat low, it's faith, but else how could one see the jewels? And they were precious stones indeed, and that I alone knew of this Aladdin's cave! Why, I would almost be worth while to adopt Clement's profession, if I could see, when he gets rich enough, to become pious, good—to make investments in the way of charity which may repay him in the other world. Methinks my own world should be high indeed, where the security is so problematical. Why does not this woman come? She will come, I feel certain, that confounded weapon from her husband, reminding her not to fail, was an excellent thought; she is a good wife, and she will come. Then, afterwards a little, that boon for, as if in a passion: "Why should she have thrust herself between my ends and me? Why have removed that man my victim? Why, as it turned him, of all men in the world most hateful to us? True, she is our niece; but, for that very reason, most unfitted for such bidding. No, curse her, she shall die! Will she bring the child herself, or will she leave it here to be the nursemaid? Or will that woman, the lieutenant's wife, who is now staying at her house, come with her?—that slowwitted fool, with a sentence of twice as much sense, entertains no favor for Mr. Stevens. I trust she may. There is room for all three to drown in this cavern, and it looks a dozen of years the same. It is a question of five minutes, more or less, with anybody; that is all. Mildred is tallest, and will be the first to reach her child and Grace. Ah! what fine crabs are here. Why, there's not a stone but roofs its tenant. That's what they talked of in the outlook, I suppose, along: but I was thinking of—I mean I was playing the fool. Well, these sidelong gaulty will have some pretty pickings on the day to come, late their guests are, who will also be their suppers! They will scarcely arrive before daybreak. If they see me standing without, that will be an excuse for them not to enter. They will merely beckon me up the cliff, and beckoning will be answer enough; therefore, I shall stand within here, Come, Mr. Crab, thou art so very large, that I have a desire to kill thee."

This he said as one of the monsters stretched a mailed arm from under a huge rock (for with great rocks, bearded, with trailing weed, the sand was studded), and then, with a terrified scream, made its hard projecting eye had seen some danger. "Come, friend, come out of thy hole."

But the crab, drawing back its claws and strove with might and main to turn it over; but it did but move in its damp setting a hair's-breadth. Then the fool, in his fiery pain, and angry at his failed, Gideon Carr made another attempt to gain his end. He knelt down, and scratched the sand away with both hands, as a terrier-animal at the burrow of a rabbit; but when he had made a considerable hole, he desisted. "I am a coward, he, "she will take it for a grave, perchance, as, indeed, it looks like one. But, nevertheless, this sand will fall in. The hole was not made, but bared his brawny arm, and, lying down into the hollow he had made, thrust it into the very recesses of the burrow reached the crab's weight, but, as he grasped it, the crab, in its turn, with its toothed claw, seized them like a rack and vice in one, and extracted the man his left hand. Angry, but rage soon conquered pain. "When I get out, my friend in armor," muttered he, "although I shall be obliged to make you know me, I will drive wedges into these claws of yours (a thing which I am told you do not like), and leave you to die where you found me. Ah! you are very certain dainty fare. Yes, you will come, notwithstanding that you struggle, and are very large and strong, and have a terrible claw. Ah! you are a brave, the giant strength of Gideon Carr was dragging it from its hole. He brought it down to the very mouth of its dwelling, when suddenly the huge stone itself, undermined by the previous digging, was shaken by the present contest, toppled and fell forward—only a few inches, but within them was included Gideon's naked wrist, on which it pressed like a new world on Atlas. Taken even at this frightful disadvantage, the man could still, perhaps, have wrenched out his maimed limb, but for the sudden flash of terror which shot into his mind recently that ever; his closed fist forming with the creature itself a sort of solid wedge, it was impossible to withdraw through the now narrowed aperture.

For the first time in his long life—in view, at least, of any material danger—the damps of fear gathered upon the brow of Gideon Carr. The frightful thought. What if this creature holds me till the tide comes up and drowns me? sped with a sharp agony through his brain. But, straightway, his mind was himself again—tenacious, indomitable, calm. Without motion—for was not every moment now a loss of priceless strength?—he lay, calculating his chances. She would surely come, this Mildred for whom he had been waiting long, but not until now, impatiently. He had felt quite certain of her coming, a minute ago, or so, when he was free and out of all danger; then, why should he doubt now? His own misadventure could not have altered her plans. No; she must needs come. He would set her to dig at the sand about his wrist, and then, when he was loose—yes, he would drown her still. He was not like Clement to cry: "Ye powers of good, if ye will help me now, I will henceforth serve you." Why, was it not through this woman's tardiness—curse her!—that he was now lying humbled and racked with pain. There was no bone, however, broken—he knew that; nothing to prevent his swimming away when the time came. But suppose she could not free him with all her efforts. Then he would hold her there, and they should drown together. Ay, but they should. There should be no lying stories of righteous retribution, forsooth, told about Gideon Carr. As he had lived, implacable, unbelieving, defiant, so would he —— But, pshaw! why think of death? He should not, could not die! Were all his mighty plans for the future to be shattered by a paltry creature that was sold in the market for sixpence! Was Cliffe Hall to be plucked from his grasp for ever, and tens of thousands of pounds to be lost—for if he did not get them, were they not lost?—and thirst for vengeance not to be slaked, after all, but only whetted? For what was Raymond's death? He had written to Grace last night: The first step of the road you think so perilous has been taken. R. C. is gone. The first step! And was it, could it be fated that he was not to take a second? Fated? that word, though unformed by his lips, sent a tremor throughout his frame. What had the fool Raymond meant in his last agony by saying that he saw the winding-sheet bound high about him, the token of black doom immediately impending? Doubtless, a last malicious effort to give him discomfort—that was all. Ha! the rustling of a dress, and that of more than one! They are coming at last; the more the better, for the time is getting short, and the —— Gideon Carr did not conclude the thought, but, groaning, passed his disengaged arm for the second time across his forehead. It was no rustle of a dress which he had heard, but the echo of the first sibilating wave as it swept the sandy threshold of the Mermaid's Cavern; yes, that herald of the rising spring-tide had given its fatal warning. By that he knew, although he could not turn to see it, that the rim of beach was now no longer visible. Then, for a moment, his iron heart gave way, and a shrill scream of terror broke from his laboring lungs. Such a sound—the inarticulate confession of defeat—they had never sent forth before, and even now he did not appeal to heaven, nor yet to man.

The coast-guardsmen, sitting lazily upon the cliff above, were startled by it, and looked out sharply for the strange sea-bird who had uttered so harsh a note; and Mrs. Hepburn heard it on the Down beyond, and asked her friend what sound it was, who told her it was but the west wind. If he had repeated it—but no voice could have framed a second time a cry so terrible, the concentrated anguish of a hopeless heart—perhaps help might have come. No woman could possibly have released him from his position, but the strong arm of Robert Andrews might have done it. Even as it was, unaided, this imprisoned wretch, made frenzied by his peril, heaved up the rock by a tremendous effort some quarter of an inch, so that he saw the creature that was his jailer. Then back the mighty mass sunk down, and pinioned him as closely as before.

And now, when he knew that his own efforts must be unavailing, a curious change came over him; he had never—that is to say, within the last ten minutes, in which his whole life seemed to have been comprised—he had never felt so confident of rescue. Mildred would come, of course, and seeing the tide up, would conclude that an accident had occurred—that he had had a fit, or sprained an ankle, and would hasten down at once, for what was getting her feet wet in comparison with saving a fellow-creature's life? That was the way the woman would reason; doubtless, she must be positively certain he was there. She must have seen the cutter that brought him pass by Sandby. Where else could he be? And had not her husband told her—— Once more the guilty wretch shuddered from head to heel, for as his thoughts touched on Raymond, an icy hand was laid upon his limbs, as though a corpse had clasped them. Up, up it crept, and with it a stealthy sound. The tide had reached his feet, and higher yet. Though the floor of the cavern sloped upward, his very mouth was only a little higher than his feet, as there he lay; nay, the hollow of the sand which his own hands had dug, would cause him to drown more quickly. He had said that it looked like a grave, but never dreamed that his own form would fill it. He had jested of a few inches more or less making all the difference as to the survivorship in such a case as this, and now thus prostrate, he was doomed to drown sooner than any child of one year old. He remarked for the first time that the cavern was growing dark, and that a greenish tinge was mixed with what light there was; and turning as well as he could, he saw the two approaches to the place half filled with the rising tide, and only a jagged crescent of blue sky above it. Even while he looked, a tall, white-crested wave hissed in, and swept him to the very neck, and dashed his face with spray. The freshness of the foam seemed to revive him; and with a gleam of hope in his worn and anguished face, but with a cruel look upon it, too, even though the coming pain was to be his own, he drew forth a clasp-knife from his pocket; then dragging it open with his teeth, he began to saw the blade against the sinews of his captive wrist. He would escape still, ay, that he would. What was a hand more or less compared with life? If he had but thought of this a little earlier; but even now it was not too late. A mighty wave here whelmed him from foot to head. "Too late, too late!" it echoed, thundering in. "Too late, too late!" the screaming beach replied, dragged down by its return. Blinded by the salt water, Gideon could not find the place to aim at, but like an inexperienced woodman, cut and hacked the limb at random. Then another wave swept in, and roamed about the cave at leisure, and fell back upon him from the splendid roof and wall; and then another, and another, thundering Doom!

CHAPTER XXV.—DESOLATE.
